ready stated at sufficient length the principles that should guide this court in determining how far it should consider itself bound by this decision of the court of errors and appeals of New Jersey. The question whether the defendant owed any duty, as respected the children of tender years on said street and near said piles of beams, which, to the knowledge of the defendant, had proved attractive to such children to rest or play upon, other than and different from that which it owed to persons using the street and who were vis juris, was clearly a question of the common or unwritten law of the state of New Jersey. It was not a question of statute law, or of title to land, or of merely local law or custom, but belonged to that domain of jurisprudence to which we have above alluded, which prevails generally in all states and countries where the common law is recognized, and is so often referred to in the decisions of the Supreme Court. It is well settled that the general question of liability for negligence, when not modified or regulated by statute law, belongs to this domain. In Gardner v. Michigan C. R. Co. supra, Chief Justice Fuller, in speaking for the Supreme Court, says: "But in the present case, only the responsibility of a railroad company to its employees was involved, and it is settled that that question is a matter of general law, and that, in the absence of statutory regulations by the state in which this cause of action arises, this court is not required to follow the decisions of the state courts. New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627; Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. 612; Myrick v. Michigan C. R. Co. 107 U. S. 102, 27 L. ed. 325, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 425; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 101, 37 L. ed. 97, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 261; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 37 L. ed. 772, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914."

In ascertaining what this unwritten or common law prevailing in New Jersey, as well as widely elsewhere, requires in the premises, the court below had the right to exercise its independent judgment. In doing so, it might explore the sources and scrutinize the evidence of that law, precisely as the state court has done. However reluctant it may be to differ with, it was not bound by, the decision of the state court in such a case, although judicial comity might require it to bow to a line of decisions so uniform and well settled, and extending through so long a time, as to establish a rule of conduct which "it would be wrong to disturb." The only question, then, is, Was the judgment of the court of errors and appeals of New Jersey, in the case referred to, declaratory of a rule of law so established as to be peculiar to that state? In accordance with the principles above stated, its decision that the title of the abutting owners on a street in New Jersey extends to the middle thereof, subject to the public easement, and that, by the law of that state, such abutting owners have the right to the temporary and reasonable use of the street for storing materials to be used in building and repair of structures on such abutting land, as a matter of local law, should be and was respected as conclusive by the circuit court, especially as its decision in this respect was supported by the authority of a uniform line of state decisions.

With reference, however, to the general question of negligence, and the duty owed under the circumstances by defendant to plaintiff, the only New Jersey cases referred to by the learned justice who delivered the opinion of the court of errors and appeals are the cases of Turess v. New York, S. & W. R. Co. 61 N. J. L. 314, 40 Atl. 614, decided by the supreme court, and Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Reich, 61 N. J. L. 635, 41 L.R.A. 831, 68 Am. St. Rep. 727, 40 Atl. 682, decided by the court of errors and appeals.

The case first cited was in the supreme court, not the court of last resort. It was a turntable case, and squarely took issue with the doctrine of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout and the Turntable Cases, so called, that have followed it. The case was decided in 1898, and it was said by Chief Justice Magie, who rendered the opinion, that the question was for the first time presented for consideration to the courts of New Jersey.

The second case was in the court of errors and appeals, and was also a turntable case. Mr. Justice Gummere, in delivering the opinion of the court, in speaking of the doctrine of the Turntable Cases, said that "although this doctrine has received the support of many courts of high distinction, it has been absolutely repudiated by other courts whose decisions rank equally high."

He also says that "this court," the court of errors and appeals, "has, up to the present time, never been called upon to decide the question, and we are free to adopt either the view taken by the United States Supreme Court in Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745, and the cases which have followed it, or that taken by" other courts. It was accordingly held by the court that the owner of the turntable and of the land on which it was built owed no duty to a child of tender years who was hurt by playing thereon, on the ground that it was a trespasser at the time of the accident.

In addition to these, counsel for the plaintiff in error has referred us to the cases of Vanderbeck v. Hendry, 34 N. J. L. 467; Fitzpatrick v. Cumberland Glass Mfg. Co. 61 N. J. L. 378, 39 Atl. 675, and Taylor v. Haddonfield & C. Turnp. Co. 65 N. J. L. 102, 46 Atl. 707. These cases all refer to the duties of landholders with reference to persons sui juris who enter upon their lands as licensees, and do not at all touch the question with which we are here concerned. It is evident, therefore, that there is no such settled rule of law established by the decisions of the new Jersey tribunal of last resort, as would be binding upon the United States circuit court, or relieve it from the duty of forming an independent judgment as to what the unwritten or common law of New Jersey required of the defendant in the premises. That the law was not so settled in New Jersey is further evidenced by the strongly reasoned dissenting opinion of Fort and Bogert, JJ., in the case of Friedman v. Snare & T. Co. 71 N. J. L. 605, 70 L.R.A. 147, 108 Am. St. Rep. 764, 61 Atl. 401, 2 Ann. Cas. 497, and by the view taken by that eminent jurist, the late Mr. Justice Dixon, in the trial of this same case in the supreme court, and whose opinion, as approved by the learned judge of the court below, we have already quoted. With the highest respect for the court of errors and appeals of the state of New Jersey, and for the learned members of that court who announced its opinion in the case referred to, we are compelled to the conclusion that the rule of law, as announced in the case of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, supra, and in the subsequent approving cases, is the law applicable to the present case and the assignments of error in that regard must be overruled.

It is only necessary in conclusion to refer briefly to the contention of the plaintiff in error, that because the case of Friedman v. Snare & T. Co. in the court of errors and appeals of New Jersey, grew out of the identical facts and circumstances upon which the present case is founded, it was in some peculiar sense binding upon this court, as well as upon the court below. In view of what has already been said, we can give no weight to this suggestion. It still remains a matter in which two courts of concurrent and independent jurisdiction have arrived at a different view of the law.

In the case of Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co. 125 U. S. 555, 31 L. ed. 795, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 974, the plaintiff in error was plaintiff below in the circuit court of the United States, and sought to recover from defendants for injuries which he sustained by reason of their negligence, while traveling upon their roads. The court on the trial substantially instructed the jury that the plaintiff could not recover, because the injury complained of occurred while he was traveling upon the Sabbath day, in violation of the law of the state of Massachusetts. A suit between the same parties in regard to the same transaction had been brought in the supreme court of that state, in which, on a trial before a jury, the plaintiff obtained a verdict. This was carried to the court in banc, and was there reversed and sent back for a new trial. The plaintiff then became nonsuit in the state court, and brought his action in the circuit court of the United States. Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court, discussed the general question as to the binding effect of decisions of the state courts upon the courts of the United States, and we have already cited a passage from his opinion. He nowhere, however, gives any weight to the fact that there had been an opinion of the Massachusetts court of last resort, in the very case then before the Supreme Court, but confines himself to the inquiry whether any settled rule in the premises had been established by the decisions of the Massachusetts courts. He concludes as follows: "The decisions on this subject by the Massachusetts court are numerous enough and of sufficiently long standing to establish the rule, so far as they can establish it, and we think that, taken in connection with the relation which they bear to the statute itself, though giving an effect to it which may not meet the approval of this court, they nevertheless determine the law of Massachusetts on that subject."

In the case at bar, no statute of the state was involved.

As we have seen in the case of Gardner v. Michigan C. R. Co. 150 U. S. 349, 37 L. ed. 1107, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140, there was the same situation to be dealt with. The Supreme Court of the United States refused to be bound by the decision of the supreme court of Michigan, on the same facts and between the same parties, and said: "We therefore conclude that the opinion of the state supreme court should be given only such weight as its reasoning and the respectability of the source from which it proceeds entitle it to receive."

Nearly all the other contentions founded upon the assignments of error are disposed of by what we have already said, and as to those that are not so disposed of, we content ourselves with saying that they are without merit and present no reversible error. We think the questions we have discussed were properly submitted to the alleged to be due on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Sanborn and Van Devanter, Circuit Judges, and William H. Munger, District Judge.

Messrs. Gibson Clark and William A. Riner, with Mr. John D. Clark, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Charles W. Burdick, with Mr. Edgar M. Morsman, Jr., for defendant in error.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by the owner of a promissory note payable in Canada, made and indorsed in Illinois, to recover the amount due upon the note from the indorser. Presentment, demand, and protest were made, and notice of dishonor was given in compliance with the law of Canada, but the indorser claims, and it is conceded, but neither admitted nor decided, that the notice would have been insufficient to charge the indorser if the note had been payable in Illinois. The court below held that the notice was good and rendered a judgment against the indorser. The latter's counsel insist that this ruling is error, on the ground that the sufficiency of the notice is governed by the law of the place of indorsement, and not by the law of the place of payment. To this contention there is a short and conclusive answer. The place of the indorsement was the state of Illinois. The law of that state was, when the indorsement was made, and it still is, that when commercial paper is indorsed in one jurisdiction and is payable in another, the law of the place where it is payable governs the time and mode of presentment for payment, the manner of protest, and the time and manner of giving notice of dishonor, and the law of the place of indorsement is inapplicable to them. Wooley v. Lyon, 117 Ill. 248, 250, 57 Am. Rep. 867, 6 N. E. 885, 886. If, therefore, as counsel contend, the law of the place where the indorsement was made, the law of Illinois, governs the sufficiency of the notice of dishonor in this case, that notice was good, for it was sufficient under the law of Canada where the note was payable, and the law of Illinois was that in a case of this character the law of the place where the note was payable governed the time and manner of giving the notice of dishonor.

There is another reason why the position of counsel for the indorser is not sound. The rule that the manner of giving and the sufficiency of the notice of dishonor are governed by the law of the place of indorsement is impractical, unfair, and unjust, because the notary at the place of payment must give the notice, and it is often impossible, in the time allowed to him by the law, for him to find out where each indorsement was made and what the law of the place of each indorsement is upon the subject of notice of dishonor. On the other hand, commercial paper shows on its face where it is payable. Each indorser, when it is presented to him for his indorsement, has time and opportunity before he signs it to learn where it is payable, to ascertain if he desires the law of that place, and to decide for himself, with full knowledge and upon due consideration, whether or not he will agree to pay the amount specified therein if the maker fails to do so, and the paper is presented, the payment is demanded, the protest is made, and the notice of dishonor is given, according to that law. In the decisions upon this question there is a direct and irreconcilable conflict. The established rule in England, the rule in Illinois, and the stronger and better reasons, are that, where an indorsement is made in one jurisdiction, and the commercial paper is payable in another, the manner of giving notice of dishonor and the sufficiency thereof are governed by the law of the place where the paper is payable. Rothschild v. Currie, 1 Q. B. 43, 49, 50, 4 Perry & D. 737, 10 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 77; Rouquette v. Overmann L. R. 10 Q. B. 525, 44 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 221, 33 L. T. N. S. 420, 4 Eng. Rul. Cas. 287; Hirschfield v. Smith, L. R. 1 C. P. 340, 350, 352, 1 Harr. & R. 284, 35 L. J. C. P. N. S. 177, 12 Jur. N. S. 523, 14 Week. Rep. 455; Wiseman v. Chiappella, 23 How. 368, 380, 16 L. ed. 466, 470; Pierce v. Indaeth, 106 U. S. 546, 550, 27 L. ed. 254, 256, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418; Wooley v. Lyon, 117 Ill. 248, 250, 57 Am. Rep. 867, 6 N. E. 885, 886; Union Nat. Bank v. Chapman, 169 N. Y. 538, 543, 57 L.R.A. 513, 88 Am. St. Rep. 614, 62 N. E. 672. This rule commends itself to the judgments of the writers of the text-books; they approve it and urge its maintenance in preference to its opposite. Wood's Byles, Bills & Notes, 8th ed. 404, 405; 2 Parsons, Bills & Notes, 2d ed. 344, 345; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 5th ed. § 901. There are, however, many authorities to the contrary. Aymar v. Sheldon, 12 Wend. 439, 444, 27 Am. Dec. 137; Huse v. Hamblin, 29 Iowa, 501, 504, 4 Am. Rep. 244; Allen v. Merchants' Bank, 22 Wend. 215, 34 Am. Dec. 289; Carroll v. Upton, 2 Sandf. 171; Snow v. Perkins, 2 Mich. 238, 241.

But the question is one of commercial law upon which the decisions of the state courts, though persuasive, are not controlling, in the national courts. It is a duty of the Federal courts which they may not renounce, to form independent opinions and to render independent judgments upon questions of commercial law, of general law, and of right under the Constitution and laws of the nation. Every citizen of the United States who has the right to prosecute his suit in a Federal court has also the right to the independent opinion and decision of that court upon every determining question of commercial or general law which he presents for its consideration. Independent School Dist. v. Rew, 55 L.R.A. 364, 49 C. C. A. 193, 208, 111 Fed. 1, 11; New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 368, 21 L. ed. 627, 636; Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. 1, 10, 10 L. ed. 865, 868; Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 33, 27 L. ed. 359, 365, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10.

Upon the question in hand the decisions of the state courts are in conflict. The decisions of the Supreme Court tend toward the adoption of the more reasonable and practicable rule. In Musson v. Lake, 4 How. 262, 278, 11 L. ed. 967, 973, cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error, the only question presented for decision was whether or not the certificate of a notary of New Orleans that he had there protested a note payable in that city, but indorsed in Mississippi, was evidence in a Mississippi court of the presentment of the note when the certificate failed to mention the presentment, and the court held that it was not such evidence. It is true that there is a statement in the opinion in that case that the contract of indorsement was made and was to be performed in Mississippi, and that the construction of the contract and the diligence necessary to be used by the plaintiffs to entitle them to a recovery must be governed by the law of that state. But this remark was unnecessary to the decision of the case, and, if it referred to the manner of charging the indorser by protest and notice of dishonor, it has been overruled by the subsequent decisions of that court. Thus, in Wiseman v. Chiappella, 23 How. 368, 380, 16 L. ed. 466, 470, in an action by the holder of an acceptance drawn by Durden & Company in Mississippi, payable in New Orleans and indorsed by the payees, against the notary, for negligence in presenting the paper and demanding its payment, the Supreme Court said:

"There has always been a requirement in both countries, and everywhere acknowledged in the United States, which protects the defendant in this suit from any responsibility to the plaintiff. The requirement is this: That the protest was made in this case in conformity with the practice and law of Louisiana, where the bill was payable."

And the court cited in support of this proposition, Rothschild v. Caine, 1 Ad. & El. 43 (which is the same case cited above as Rothschild v. Currie, 1 Q. B. 43, 4 Perry & D. 737, 10 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 77, wherein the court of Queen's bench held that the manner of giving and the sufficiency of the notice of dishonor of a bill of exchange indorsed in England, payable in France, was governed by the law of France); Chew v. Read, 11 Smedes & M. 182.

In Pierce v. Indseth, 106 U. S. 546, 550, 27 L. ed. 254, 256, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418, an acceptance drawn in Minnesota on a bank in Norway, payable in Norway, was presented and protested according to the law of Norway, and the Supreme Court decided that the law of the place where the bill was payable, and not the law of the place where it was drawn, governed the time and manner of the presentation of the bill and of its protest, and added: "It sometimes happens that the several parties to a bill, as drawers or indorsers, reside in different countries, and much embarrassment might arise in such cases if the protest was required to conform to the laws of each of the countries. One protest is sufficient, and that must be in accordance with the laws of the place where the bill is payable."

For the same reasons one manner of giving notice of dishonor, and that in accordance with the laws of the place where the bill is payable, is sufficient, and notices in the different methods prescribed by all the laws of all the countries and states in which drawers or indorsers may happen to sign bills or notes are not required to charge them with their intended liability. The conclusion is that, where a bill is drawn or a note is indorsed in one jurisdiction, and is payable in another, the laws of the place where it is payable govern the manner of giving and the sufficiency of the notice of dishonor, the time and manner of the presentation and demand, and the manner of the protest thereof.

The argument for the opposite rule is based on the conceded fact that the indorsement is an independent contract that, on condition that the paper is presented, demanded, and protested, and notice of dishonor is given, the drawer or indorser will pay the note if the drawee or the maker fails so to do. The next step in the argument is the assertion which is sustained by many and respectable authorities, that the indorser does not agree to pay the note where it is payable, but at the place where he signs or delivers it. Dan. Neg. Inst. 5th ed. § 899. From this statement, without more, the argument jumps to the conclusion that the manner of giving and the sufficiency of the notice of dishonor is 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

governed by the law of the place of the making or of the delivery of the indorsement. It is not easy, however, to find in the contract of indorsement an agreement not to pay at the place where the note is payable, or at any other place except at the place where the indorsement happens to be signed and delivered. Take the case in hand. This note was payable on its face at the bank in Canada, and the indorser must have known it when he signed it. He resided in Wyoming, he made his indorsement in Chicago, he did not write into his contract of indorsement any limitation to the effect that he would pay the note where he signed it, but would not pay it where it was payable, and no sound reason occurs to us why his contract was not to pay the note in Canada, where it was payable by its plain terms, if the maker failed to do so and he was properly charged as indorser. The purpose of an indorsement is the promise to do what the maker undertakes to do if the latter fails, and that is to pay the note where it is payable. After the maker failed to pay this note, and the protest had been made and the notice had been given, it was not necessary to the maintenance of an action against the indorser, to present this note or to demand payment of it in the state of Illinois. An action against him could have been maintained immediately wherever process could have been served upon him, in Canada, in Illinois, or in Wyoming. For these reasons the position that the indorser agrees to pay the note where he happens to sign or deliver it, and not where it is payable, when the note is a contract of the maker to pay it at the specified place, does not commend itself to our judgment. If, however, that were the import of the indorsement, it would not follow that the manner of giving and the sufficiency of the notice of dishonor are governed by the law of the place of indorsement, and not by the law of the place where the note is payable. The authorities which relate to the laws applicable to the validity and extent of indorsements, the necessity of presentment, demand, protest, and notice of dishonor, and the manner of making the presentment, demand, and protest, and of giving the notice, are too numerous for review; but from the stronger and better reasons, and from these decisions, these rules may be safely deduced.

The laws of the place where the indorsement is signed or is delivered so that it becomes a contract govern the validity and extent of the contract, and therefore the necessity of some presentment, protest, and notice of dishonor. Aymar v. Sheldon, 12 Wend. 439, 27 Am. Dec. 137. It is a curious fact that the remark in the opinion in this case, that notice of dishonor is governed by the law of the place of indorsement, which is the real foundation of that doctrine announced in subsequent cases, was an obiter dictum. The question did not arise in the case at all. Story, Conf. L. 7th ed. § 360; Musson v. Lake, 4 How. 262, 11 L. ed. 967; Columbia Finance & T. Co. v. Purcell (C. C.) 142 Fed. 984; Hatcher v. McMorine, 15 N. C. (4 Dev. L.) 122; Raymond v. Holmes, 11 Tex. 54; Briggs v. Latham, 36 Kan. 255, 259, 59 Am. Rep. 546, 13 Pac. 393; Williams v. Wade, 1 Met. 82; Am-sinck v. Rogers, 189 N. Y. 252, 257, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 875, 121 Am. St. Rep. 858, 82 N. E. 134, 12 Ann. Cas. 450; Givens v. Western Bank, 2 Ala. 397, 400; Holbrook v. Vibbard, 3 Ill. 465, 468; Artisans' Bank v. Park Bank, 41 Barb. 599; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Simpson, 90 N. C. 467, 471; Douglas v. Bank of Commerce, 97 Tenn. 133, 36 S. W. 874.

But the law of the place where the note is payable governs the days of grace, the time and the manner of making the presentment, the demand and the protest, and the time and manner of giving the notice of dishonor. Rothschild v. Currie, 1 Q. B. 43, 49, 50, 4 Perry & D. 737, 10 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 77; Rouquette v. Overmann, L. R. 10 Q. B. 525, 44 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 221, 33 L. T. N. S. 420, 4 Eng. Rul. Cas. 287; Hirschfeld v. Smith, L. R. 1 C. P. 350, 1 Harr. & R. 284, 35 L. J. C. P. N. S. 177, 12 Jur. N. S. 523, 14 Week. Rep. 455; Wiseman v. Chiappella, 23 How. 368, 380, 16 L. ed. 466, 470; Pierce v. Indseth, 106 U. St. Rep. 614, 62 N. E. 672.

Other questions were presented and argued in this case, but the conclusion which has been reached renders them all immaterial, and the judgment below must be affirmed.

Scope.

It will be observed that the scope assigned to the note by its title confines it exclusively to questions of state law as distinguished from Federal law, that is, to questions that would concededly have been controlled by local state precedents if the action had been in the state court, or as to which a state statute explicit in terms would concededly have bound the Federal courts as well as the state courts. Hence, questions as to the constitutionality, construction, or effect of Federal statutes are beyond its scope. Many cases that might upon first impression seem to be within the scope of the note, because they held the decisions of the state court were not binding, are excluded for the reason that the question was one of Federal law, so that even an explicit state statute on the point would not have been controlling. It is obvious that to be of any value on the distinctive point under annotation, a case must proceed upon the assumption that an explicit state statute expressly covering the point would have been binding upon the Federal courts as well as upon the state courts. The note is not therefore concerned with any question as to respective domains of the Federal and state governments.

For the most part the cases here considered are those in which the jurisdiction of the Federal court was dependent not upon the existence of a Federal question, but simply upon diversity of citizenship of the parties.¹ It, however, includes some cases which, though involving a Federal question sufficient to confer jurisdiction, presented also questions of state law whose character as such was entirely unaffected by the Federal question. For example, bankruptcy cases are included so far as they involve the point whether the decisions of the state court are binding upon the Federal courts in determining those questions which, by the express terms of the bankruptcy act, are referred to the law of the states.² The question, however, as to the extent to which the state laws apply in bankruptcy cases, as distinguished from the question how the state law, when concededly applicable, is to be ascertained, is entirely beyond the scope of the note. So the note includes some cases where the Federal court had jurisdiction because one of the parties was a corporation chartered by the Federal government. Even when a case originating in a Federal court involves a question that in itself is one of state, e. g., the construction of a state statute, it may be excluded for the reason that such question may be so associated with the ultimate Federal question decisive of the case as to partake of its character and become, for the purposes of the case, a question of Federal law. A convenient illustration is afforded by a United States Supreme Court case³ which, while conceding that, if no Federal law were involved, the question whether a log boom was authorized by a state law, or complied with its provisions, would be a state question, said in effect that it became a Federal question when considered in its bearing on the ultimate question whether the boom was exempt from the Federal river and harbor act.

Again, cases coming before the Federal Supreme Court on writ of error to the state court do not present the distinctive question under annotation, and are not included, or are mentioned merely incidentally in order to note distinctions. In such cases, a question that would otherwise be one of state law, either becomes a Federal question by its association with the Federal question that confers jurisdiction upon the Stat. 1901, p. 503, with subsequent amendment and changes (now Judicial Code, chap. 2, § 24, act of March 3, 1911, 36 Stat. at L. 1091, chap. 231, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 135).

² For example, the question of exemptions. No attempt has been made to classify the bankruptcy cases by themselves, and they are distributed according to the particular questions involved.

Supreme Court, or is concluded by the very judgment of the state court which is sought to be reviewed, and therefore presents nothing for the decision of the Supreme Court. A convenient illustration of the first alternative is afforded by the decisions to the effect that when the jurisdiction of the Federal Supreme Court is invoked on the ground of an unconstitutional impairment of the obligation of a contract, that court may determine for itself, without reference to the state decisions, the existence of the contract rights claimed to have been impaired.⁴

As to the second alternative: The distinction is obvious between accepting a decision of the state court for the reason that it is not subject to review at all by the Federal court, and determining, by reference to state court decisions, a question that must be decided by the Federal court. Even when the language employed by the court in such cases, if taken literally, would imply that the question was disposed of under the rule that the Federal courts must follow the state court decisions on questions of state law, rather than that it was concluded by the very judgment sought to be reviewed, it is clear that they do not stand on the same footing as cases which come up from the lower Federal courts. The distinction is well illustrated by two cases that came before the Federal Supreme Court at the same time, and were passed upon in a single opinion,⁵ one arising on writ of error to the state court, and the other on appeal from a lower Federal court, upon substantially the same state of facts, in habeas corpus proceedings instituted in those respective courts. The Supreme Court remarked that in the case brought before it by writ of error, its jurisdiction was limited to the question whether there had been a denial of a right under the Federal Constitution, laws, and treaties, and the question whether the imprisonment was illegal under the state Constitution and laws was not open, but that the latter question might be considered on the appeal from the decision of the lower Federal court, although it was of the opinion that the judicial propriety was best consulted by accepting the judgment of the state court upon that point. While the decisions of the state court were thus practically decisive in both cases as to the question arising under the state Constitution and statutes, it is apparent that this was so in the first case, because the question was not before the Federal Supreme Court at all, whereas in the second case the question was legitimately before that court, and the decision of the state court served merely as a judicial precedent.

The question whether the Federal court should follow an earlier decision of the state court in the same case or between the same parties, on the ground that it is the "law of the case," or on the principle of res judicata, is also beyond the scope of the note.^{5a}

The note, being concerned merely with the nature or character of questions of state law as to which the Federal courts must follow the decisions of the state court, presupposes that the state decisions in question were rendered by the highest court of the state, and were in other respects sufficient to establish a rule of decision for the Federal courts, if the nature of the questions involved, and the time of their rendition relatively to the transactions involved in the case before the Federal courts, were sufficient to make them such. Hence, questions in relation to decisions of intermediate appellate courts, opinions by divided courts, dissenting opinions, and the like are not discussed, though the point may be occasionally referred to by way of explanation. It is also,

Upon this precise point it was said in Percy Summer Club v. Astle, 90 C. C. A. 527, 163 Fed. 1: "The decisions of the Supreme Court which review upon writ of error the decision of a state court upholding a statute which is alleged to impair a contract are not here in point. There the Supreme Court exercises no right of general review, but must affirm the judgment of the state court unless it contravenes the Constitution of the United States. Hence, the Supreme Court in those cases neither follows, nor refuses to follow, the course of decisions of the state court, but, having a particular judgment of that court before it, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) reverses the judgment or leaves it undisturbed, according as it does or does not contravene the Federal Constitution."

^{5a} The distinction between the effect of judgments of the state court as res judicata, and decisions of the state court as rules of decision for the Federal court, is clearly brought out in the opinion in Fuller v. Hamilton County, 53 Fed. 411, and the court there points out that a judgment of the state court between the same parties on the same issue is binding on the Federal court, even though based on general principles of commercial law as to which the Federal courts are not bound to follow the state court decisions merely as rules of decision.

of course, to be understood that the subject under annotation is confined to the duty of the Federal court to follow the decisions of the courts of the state in which the Federal action originated, or at least those of the state in which the transaction in question had its situs. The note is in the main confined to cases which expressly pass upon the question as to the duty of the Federal court to follow the state court decisions, as a distinct point, to the exclusion, in general, of cases that merely follow, or decline to follow, such decisions, without any statement as to the duty of the Federal court in this respect.

And, finally, the note proceeds upon the assumption that the rules established by the state decisions which the Federal court is asked to follow are not in conflict with any provision of the Federal Constitution or statutes. Of course, in the event of such a conflict, local precedents cannot be given effect.

I. Introduction.

Of the many legal anomalies and practical difficulties incident to our dual system of state and Federal courts, none is more curious or more serious in its consequences than the refusal of the Federal courts, when exercising the jurisdiction which they enjoy merely by reason of the adventitious circumstance of diversity of citizenship, to follow the decisions of the highest court of the state in which the action originates, in determining the law of that state, and their assertion in many cases of their right and duty to determine that law, when nonstatutory, according to their own independent views.

That the Federal courts, even when they decide general questions of common law for themselves, and decline to follow the decisions of the highest court of the state in which they sit, nevertheless profess to ascertain and apply the true rule of law of the state, is apparent from the reasoning by which they seek to justify such course, and from the concession that a state statute in explicit terms upon the point in question would necessarily control.⁶

The result, both in theory and practice, is that in the event of a difference of views between the Federal and state courts upon questions of general law, it is impossible for the parties to determine with certainty in advance what substantive rights and incidents will attach to a particular contract

In Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. v. Reliance M. Ins. Co. 106 Fed. 116, after stating that the policy of marine insurance involved was a Massachusetts contract, the court said: "So far, therefore, as any local usages which have become a part of the subject-matter of underwriting marine risks in Massachusetts are concerned, this court would be bound to adopt the law as established by the decisions of the state court; yet, so far as a question comes up which is not one of mere local usage, but of general law, or a question of the interpretation of a commercial instrument, like a policy of insurance, although what we are seeking to discover is, of course, the law in Massachusetts, yet, nevertheless, we are not governed by the decisions of the courts of Massachusetts, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

but by those of the Supreme Court of the United States, so far as we can find decisions bearing on the questions involved, and, so far as we do not find them, by the general trend of authority." (Italics ours.)

In SNARE & T. Co. v. FRIEDMAN, Gray, J., said: "There is no common law of the United States. . . . In any trial at common law, a circuit court of the United States, where its jurisdiction is founded on diverse citizenship, has to inquire what the law of the state in which its jurisdiction is exercised may be, and it is the law of that state, whether statute or common law, that it is called upon to administer. . . . And as to what the common law of a state may be, the best evidence is generally found in the settled line of decisions of the state court, so accepted and recognized as to constitute a general rule of property or conduct. More latitude, however, is practised in questions that depend upon a common law, not merely part of the local and customary law of the state, but common to all states and countries where what is known as the 'common law' prevails. . . . In deciding what the common law of a state may be, they [Federal courts] will resort to the same sources of information as are open to the state courts, and find the evidence of the law where the state courts must seek it, in that general jurisprudence of which we have spoken. . . . In other words, they may differ from a state court in determining what the common law of the state, thus derived, and applicable to the given case, may be." (Italics ours.)

or transaction, since that will depend on the court in which the question may be presented. Again, under such a practice, it is possible for one in effect to create against another an obligation which is denied by the uniform course of decisions of the courts of the state in which the transaction occurred, and in which both parties resided at the time, by acquiring a bona fide residence in another state, and thus qualifying himself to bring an action in the Federal court.

There seems to be no parallel in jurisprudence for the practice of the Federal courts in this respect, with the exception of a few sporadic cases that have not been consistently followed, even in the states in which they were decided, where a court of one state under the influence of, and in supposed analogy to, the Federal practice, has assumed the right to determine for itself, and according to its own precedents, the true rule of the common law, irrespective of the decisions of the courts of another state in which the contract or transaction in question had its situs, and whose law, if statutory, would concededly have governed.⁷ It is true that the dual system of courts, deriving their powers from different sovereignties, but sitting within the same territorial boundaries, enjoying a partially concurrent jurisdiction within those limits, and professing to administer the same law, is itself unique; and it is to be conceded that on the theoretical side there are some arguments that may be advanced for the Federal practice that do not apply to the occasional practice of the state courts to which allusion has just been made. But even so, and in spite of the vast array of authority in its support, it seems to open to serious doubt,—a doubt which has often been voiced, and with notable ability in a recent article⁸ by Professor William M. Meigs, whether the Federal practice is sound either in theory or practice.

With the exceptions just alluded to, it is the universal rule for a court of the state or country in which an action is brought, if it determines that the contract or transaction in question had its situs in another state or country, and is properly governed by its law, to determine the substantive rights of the parties not according to the precedents at the forum, but as nearly as may be in the way in which the courts of the other state or country would determine them, and to that end it will abide by a foreign statute, or by the decisions of the foreign courts in the absence of statute, if they are properly proved in the case, and would be accepted in the courts of the foreign jurisdiction as embodying the law of that jurisdiction on the subject. The only apparent exceptions are when the proper law is not proved, and the court is obliged either to apply its own law, because it is the only law before it, or to proceed upon presumptions as to the foreign law; or when, in a particular case, it is deemed contrary to the public policy of the forum to give effect to the foreign law. In neither of these exceptional instances, however, is there any pretense, like that indulged by the Federal courts with reference to the state law, that the court is asserting and applying the true rule of law of the foreign state or country. While it is to be conceded that the determination even of the substantive rights of the parties to a contract or transaction having international or interstate features may vary with the jurisdiction in which the action is brought, that is generally due either to one of the exceptional causes just mentioned or more often to differences of opinion as to what jurisdiction should furnish the governing law, and not to any theory that the decisions of the courts of the forum, rather than those of the other state or country, embody the true rule of law of the latter. For example, the courts of the state in which a contract is made may be of the opinion that the lex loci contractus should govern, and if the action is brought in that state, the decision will naturally be in accordance with its judicial precedents, but the courts of the state in which the contract is performable may be of the contrary opinion, that the lex loci solutionis should govern, and if the action is brought in the state where the contract is performable, the decision will be in accordance with its precedents, and they may be opposed to those of the other state. But the difference in results is due to a difference of opinion as to what state or country should furnish the governing law, and not to any difference of opinion as to how the law of the state or country chosen is to be ascertained. If it were otherwise, the function of the elaborate and complicated system of principles and rules comprehended under the general phrase "Conflict of laws" would belief that the supposed analogy between this occasional practice of the state court, and the well-established practice of the Federal courts, is not sound, even if the Federal practice were conceded to be well founded in principle.

be very much curtailed, and of no practical importance in the many cases in which the particular point in question is conceded to be one of general jurisprudence, dependent in each of the jurisdictions involved upon the unwritten law, even if it were also to be conceded that rules on the point as established by the courts of the respective jurisdictions were diametrically opposed, since there can be no practical purpose served in referring a contract or transaction to the law of its proper jurisdiction, if that law is in any event to be determined by reference to the precedents at the forum. The possibility of a diversity of results dependent upon the forum in which the action happens to be brought is sufficiently deplorable, and has been frequently deplored as a reproach to jurisprudence even when it results from the causes alluded to; but how much more to be deplored, both from a theoretical and practical standpoint, is the Federal theory which makes the substantive rights of the parties depend upon the court in which the action happens to be brought, even though the transaction involved bears no interstate or international features at all, and there is therefore no possible difference of opinion as to what jurisdiction should furnish the governing law, but merely a difference of opinion as to what the true rule of law of that jurisdiction is, and how it shall be ascertained. It would seem that the desirability, even the necessity, of a practice that shall insure the application of the same rule of decision to questions of substantive law in whatever court the action is brought, to a transaction concededly governed by the law of a particular state, must be conceded. To accomplish that result, however, either the Federal court must yield to the state court decisions, or the state court must yield to the Federal court decisions. As the very thing which the Federal court attempts to determine in the class of cases now under consideration, i. e., those in which the Federal court's jurisdiction rests simply upon the diversity of citizenship, and not upon the existence of a question of Federal law,—is the law of the state, although it professes to find it not in the judicial precedents of the courts of the state, but in its own precedents or those of other states or in general principles having no local habitation, it is not apparent why the state courts should yield, especially as all such cases may be litigated in the state courts, and the great majority of them must be, owing to the lack of diversity of citizenship necessary to take them into the Federal courts. As Prof. Meigs ably argues in the article already referred to, there is no reason to suppose that concurrent jurisdiction was conferred upon the Federal courts in case of diversity of citizenship to enable those courts to apply a different rule in case of a nonresident litigant than in case of a resident litigant, or to give the nonresident either a larger or smaller measure of justice than the resident. The natural supposition is that the purpose in conferring such jurisdiction was to protect the nonresident against possible inequality with residents in the application of the general rules of law in individual cases, owing to possible partisanship of the state courts, or their subjection to local and sectional influences and antagonisms.⁹

Surely a nonresident has no just cause of complaint if his rights are measured by the same rule that has been adopted as a standard for residents in the same situation, particularly as he may insist that the rule shall be applied by the Federal court; but the application of a shorter measure aggrieves the nonresident, and the application of a longer one aggrieves the resident, and thus brings about the very result intended to be guarded against by conferring jurisdiction upon the Federal courts, or at least one that is equally mischievous.

If it be feared that local prejudices or sectional interests may influence state courts to establish precedents which, though nominally applicable alike to residents and nonresidents, will in practice operate mainly or exclusively against nonresidents, as perhaps, may have been true of some decisions of the state courts adverse to the validity of municipal or county bonds largely in the hands of foreign holders, the mischief would at most seem only to justify the Federal courts in refusing to abide by state court precedents established after rights had vested under pre-existing contracts and transactions. As will subsequently appear, however, the Federal courts go far beyond this, and in cases of diverse citizenship assert their independence of the state court precedents on questions of general law, even though they antedated the contracts or transactions in question, and had established well-settled rules of law applied by the state courts without discrimination between residents and nonresidents. The theory frequently invoked to justify the refusal of the Federal courts to follow the state court decisions, that such decisions are not themselves the law, but merely evidence of the law, has often been plausibly supported in argument, and has received other practical applications, as, or example, in the doctrine that a change of judicial decisions after the making of a contract cannot be regarded as impairing the obligation of the contract, within the meaning of the Federal Constitution.¹⁰ It is not the purpose here to re-examine or discuss that general theory. Conceding it to be sound, it might afford a foundation in principle for a rule of decision found to be expedient in practice, but it can scarcely require a rule of decision found to be practically inexpedient. Adherence to the state decisions might be justified consistently with that theory by adopting the position that the decisions of the state court, if not the law of the state, are at least to be accepted for the purpose in hand as the exclusive and conclusive evidence of the law of the state.

Since, with the possible exception above noted, there can be no real apprehension that a general rule established by the decisions of the state court, and on its face applicable to residents and nonresidents alike, will in practice work a discrimination against nonresidents, especially as the latter are secured against possible prejudice on the part of the state court in its application, by their right of recourse to the Federal courts, the reasons for the Federal practice, apart from the theory above referred to and the cumulative weight of precedent, seem to be (1) the feeling that it is beneath the dignity of the Federal court to decide a case according to the decisions of the state court, when it is convinced that those decisions are wrong on principle; (2) the hope that what is deemed the better opinion of the Federal court may induce the state court to overrule the decisions which the Federal court regard as erroneous; (3) the possible apprehension that deference to the decisions of the courts of the particular state in which the action arises will create an apparently conflicting body of Federal precedents, and destroy uniformity of decision in that court; (4) the hope that a uniform body of Federal precedents unvaried by the state in which the action originates, and which the contract or transaction in question had its situs, may in time form the nucleus of a general and uniform body of nonstatutory law, to which the state courts as well as the Federal courts may gradually conform.

The first reason has doubtless exerted a very considerable influence in determining the departure from the rule of following the state decisions, but seems to have no basis in fact, and in any event is hardly a justification for the departure. It is not apparent why it is any more derogatory to the dignity of a Federal court to decide a case in accordance with the common-law precedents of the state courts on a question which is concededly one of state law, than it is to follow the decisions of the state courts as to the construction of a state statute, when, as an independent proposition, the court would reach a different result, or the decisions of the courts of a foreign country on a question of foreign law.

The validity of the second reason rests upon two assumptions, neither of which is likely to be conceded by the state courts, viz., that the Federal courts are more likely to reach a correct result than the state court, and that the latter court will act upon that probability.

The third reason has perhaps some apparent justification. Upon the hypothesis there assumed, however, the Federal decisions should be treated as no value as precedents other than their interpretation of the decisions of the state court, and in this view the apparent conflict is entirely innocuous. At all events that reason can hardly justify a practice which entails such a diversity of results dependent upon the more adventitious circumstance of a diversity of citizenship. And this applies also to the fourth reason above suggested, which in any event is probably too visionary to merit serious consideration.

It is true that decisions of the state courts, at least those upon questions of general common law, have been declared by the United States Supreme Court not to be "laws" within the 34th section of the original judiciary act,¹¹ which declares that "the laws of the several states, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply."¹² But the duty of the Federal court to follow decisions of the state court on questions which would concededly be governed by those decisions, if the action had been brought in the state court, may safely be allowed to rest upon the same principles of comity by virtue of which the courts of one state or country follow the decisions of the courts of another, in determining substantive questions of law arising under contracts or transactions having their situs in the latter.¹³

Comity, it is true, implies a certain freedom of action that may justify a court in refusing to abide by the decisions of the courts of another jurisdiction, upon the ground that the enforcement of the rule of law established by them would be contrary to the public policy of the forum; but can scarcely justify a uniform practice of refusing to abide by the decisions of the courts of the jurisdiction in which the contract or transaction had its situs, upon the theory that the true rule of law of that jurisdiction is to be found not in the pronouncements of its own courts, but in general principles whose interpretation and application are to be determined by reference to precedents established by the courts of the forum, or by precedents borrowed from such other sources as those courts may select.

The objection to the Federal practice, because of the impossibility of determining one's substantive rights until it is determined in which court the action is to be brought, has been alluded to; but there is another serious objection which, in a large number of cases, survives the determination to bring the action in the Federal court, viz., the extreme difficulty, not to say impossibility, of forecasting with any degree of certainty whether the Federal court will regard a particular question as one of general law, as to which it is not bound to follow the decisions of the state courts, or one of local law, as to which it is bound to follow them. The difficulty is easily illustrated by observing the conflicting opinions of Federal courts and judges in the same case as it passes from one court to another.¹⁴

But in spite of the very serious contribution which the practice makes to the uncertainties and perplexities of substantive conceded to be one of state law and which comes before the Federal court merely because of the diversity of citizenship of the parties.

cantile law, or of general jurisprudence. As it happened the stipulation was held valid in all three courts, as there was no conflict between the Federal rule and the state rule as applied to this particular stipulation.

Again, when the Kuhn Case was before the circuit court (152 Fed. 1013), Dayton, D. J., expressed the opinion that no better case could be found to illustrate the wisdom of the rule that state court decisions must be followed on questions in relation to the title to real property. When the case came before the circuit court of appeals, that court, apparently being in doubt as to whether or not it was bound to follow the state court decision, certified it to the United States Supreme Court; and the majority of that court (Kuhn v. Fairmont Coal Co. 215 U. S. 349, 44 L. ed. 228, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140), held that the state court decision was not controlling; but to this there was a vigorous dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Holmes, in which Mr. Justices White and McKenna concurred. When the case was returned to the circuit court of appeals (102 C. C. A. 457, 179 Fed. 191), that court, despite the ruling of the Supreme Court, was so impressed with the practical disadvantages incident to the existence of one rule in the state court for residents, and another rule in the Federal court for non-residents, that it remarked that even if it did not find itself in accord with the state court as to the principle of its decision, it would be inclined to follow the same, and as a matter of fact did follow it. The history of this case suggests the famous exploit of the "King of France and 10,000 men."

law, and notwithstanding the many practical difficulties which attend its operation, it is not to be disputed that there is a wide range of questions of state law which seems to expand, rather than contract, as to which the Federal courts feel bound, neither by the provisions of the judiciary act nor by the principles of comity, to follow the decisions of the state courts. Their right to pursue this course is as well established by precedent as any point of law of doubtful justification in principle, and apparent expediency in practice, can be. Commentators may at most but point out the objections to the practice, and aid in their measure to create a sentiment, if not for narrower restrictions, at least against further extension of the practice. The main purpose of the note, however, is to show, without bias or prejudice, the extent to which the practice has been carried by the courts, and to note the tendencies indicated either toward its restriction or extension.

II. Unwritten or common law

a. In general.

Originally, the United States Supreme Court seems tacitly to have assumed that the Federal courts, in the exercise of their jurisdiction based on diversity of citizenship, were bound by the decisions of the highest courts of the state in which the action originated, if there were such decisions on the point in question, whether they rested upon local statute or upon general principles of common law.¹⁵

Thus, in a case¹⁶ decided as early as 1803, Chief Justice Marshall, though relying on his own reasoning—apparently because there were no state decisions on the point—in support of his conclusion that an assignee of a note made in Virginia could not maintain an action at law thereon against a remote assignor, clearly assumed that the Virginia decisions had conclusively established the liability of the assignor to the assignee as the law of that state, although that was a question of general commercial law; and, in a later case¹⁷ between the same parties on the same note, accepted that proposition, apparently as a point conclusively established, as the basis of his conclusion that a suit would lie in equity.

In many of the early cases the Federal courts not only followed the state decisions, but expressly declared that it was their duty to do so.¹⁸

In a case¹⁹ decided in 1827, the court said: "This court adopts the state decisions because they settle the law applicable to the case, and the reasons assigned for this course apply as well to the rules of construction growing out of the common law as the statute law of the state, when applied to the title of lands;" and in a case²⁰ decided in 1833, we find the following language: "Now the relation in which our circuit courts stand to the states in which they respectively sit and act is precisely that of their own courts, especially when adjudicating on cases where state lands or state statutes come under adjudication. When we find principles distinctly settled by adjudications, and known and acted upon as the law of the land, we have no more right to question them or deviate from them, than could be correctly exercised by their own tribunals." It will be noted that the language just quoted implies, or at least suggests, a doubt whether the rule announced applies with similar force to general questions of common or commercial law, as to statutory questions or questions of a simply local character, like those in relation to real property; and even before Swift v. Tyson,²¹ there were occasional intimations that the rule did not apply to questions of general unwritten law.²² But it was not until that case that the right and duty of the Federal courts to depart from the decisions of the state court on such general questions received the formal sanction and approval of the Federal Supreme Court, and became a recognized rule of decision for Federal courts. The question involved in that case related to commercial paper, but Justice Story's opinion reaches far beyond questions of commercial law and embraces practically all general questions of common law. Indeed, the only questions the language of that opinion seems to leave under the binding effect of the state decisions are those in relation to "rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate and other matters immovable and interterritorial in their nature and character."

While the doctrine declared in that case has steadily advanced beyond the class of questions then before the court, and has drawn within operation one question after another, its progress has been marked all along its course by doubt and uncertainty as to its practical application. Nor is the difficulty confined to nonstatutory or common-law questions. Many exceptions have in course of time been ingrafted upon the rule that the decisions of the state courts construing or interpreting state statutes must be followed by the Federal courts. The realization of the difficulties experienced by the courts and the profession generally, both in respect to statutory and nonstatutory questions, and the consciousness of conflicting and ambiguous statements to be found in the opinions, have led the courts, from time to time, to attempt a restatement of the doctrine in somewhat formal and precise terms, with the idea of defining accurately its scope and extent and definitely marking its limitations and boundaries. That these attempts have not been entirely satisfactory is apparent from the differences of opinion on the part of courts and judges, sometimes reflected in the same case as it passes from court to court, as to whether a particular question is to be deemed one of local law, concerning which the decisions of the state court are controlling, or of general law, as to which the Federal court may decide according to its independent views.²³ The practical impossibility, as to many questions, of deducing from the general principles and criteria on the subject, whether the decisions of the state court will be regarded as establishing a local rule or rule of property binding upon the Federal courts, or a rule of general law, as to which the Federal courts are not bound, has rendered it necessary in the later parts of the note to set forth in some detail the actual results as to different classes of questions. In the meantime, however, attention is directed to some of the general statements that have been formulated on the subject, with the caution that boundary lines that are well marked in one case frequently disappear in the next. Though the present division of the note is concerned primarily with unwritten or common law, the statements in question are presented in the form in which they were made, without attempting to eliminate at this point the portions thereof that refer to constitutional law. In a later case presenting the same question of commercial law that was involved in Swift v. Tyson, the Federal Supreme Court, in declaring its independence of the rule as declared by the New York courts, said: "It is a law not peculiar to one state, or dependent upon local authority, but one arising out of the usages of the commercial world."²⁴ In a case decided shortly afterwards,²⁵ that court, for the express purpose of obviating any misapprehension that might arise from language used in previous decisions, undertook to state the rule on the subject somewhat formally, thus: "Since the ordinary administration of the law is carried on by the state courts, it necessarily happens that by the course of their decisions certain rules are established which become rules of property and action in the state, and have all the effect of law, and which it would be wrong to disturb. This is especially true with regard to the law of real estate and the construction of state Constitutions and statutes. Such established rules are always regarded by the Federal courts, no less than by the state courts themselves, as authoritative declarations of what the law is. But where the law has not been thus settled, it is the right and duty of the Federal courts to exercise their own judgment, as they also always do in reference to the doctrines of commercial law and general jurisprudence. So, when contracts and transactions have been entered into, and rights have accrued thereon, under a particular state of the decisions, or when there has been no decision of the state tribunals, the Federal courts properly claim the right to adopt their own interpretation of the law applicable to the case, although a different interpretation may be adopted by the state courts after such rights have accrued. But even in such cases, for the sake of harmony and to avoid confusion, the Federal courts will lean towards an agreement of views with the state courts if the question seems to them balanced with doubt. Acting on these principles, founded as they are on comity and good sense, the courts of the United States, without sacrificing their own dignity as independent tribunals, endeavor to avoid, and in most cases do avoid, any unseemly conflict with the well-considered decisions of the state courts. As, however, the every object of giving to the national courts jurisdiction to administer the laws of the states in controversies between citizens of different states was to institute independent tribunals which it might be supposed would be unaffected by local prejudices and sectional views, it would be a dereliction of their duty not to exercise an independent judgment in cases not foreclosed by previous adjudication."

A little later the same court,²⁶ after remarking that the utterances of the court on this subject had not been entirely harmonious, and that the subject had not been ascertained and defined with that uniformity and precision desirable in a matter of such great importance, said: "It is also well settled that where a course of decisions, whether founded upon statutes or not, have become rules of property as laid down by the highest courts of the state, by which is meant those rules governing the descent, transfer, or sale of property, and the rules which affect the title and possession thereto, they are to be treated as laws of that state by the Federal courts. . . . There are, undoubtedly, exceptions to the principle that the decisions of the state courts as to what are the laws of that state are in all cases binding upon the Federal courts. The case of Swift v. Tyson, which has been often followed, established the principle that if this court took a different view of what the law was in certain classes of cases which ought to be governed by the general principles of commercial law, from the state court, it was not bound to follow the latter. There is therefore a large field of jurisprudence left, in which the question of how far the decisions of state courts constitute the law of those states is an embarrassing one."

In another case, involving the question of fellow servants, the court thus indicates the nature of a general question as to which the decisions of the state courts are not conclusive.²⁷ "According to the decisions of this court, it is not open to doubt that the responsibility of a railroad company to its employees is a matter of general law. . . . But passing beyond the matter of authorities, the question is essentially one of general law. It does not depend upon any statute; it does not spring from any local usage or custom; there is in it no rule of property, but it rests upon those considerations of right and justice which have been gathered into the great body of the rules and principles known as the 'common law.' There is no question as to the power of the states to legislate and change the rules of the common law in this respect, as in others; but in the absence of such legislation, the question is one determinable only by the general principles of that law. Further than that, it is a question in which the nation as a whole is interested. It enters into the commerce of the country. . . . Whatever may be accomplished by statute,—and of that we have now nothing to say,—it is obvious that the relations between the company and employee are not in any sense of the term local in character, but are of a general nature and to be determined by the general rules of the common law."

In one of its latest utterances on the subject,²⁸ the court, speaking by Harlan, J., said that the following principles can be no longer questioned: "1. When administering state laws and determining rights accruing under those laws, the jurisdiction of the Federal court is an independent one, not subordinate to, but co-ordinate and concurrent with, the jurisdiction of the state courts. 2. Where, before the rights of the parties accrued, certain rules relating to real estate have been so established by state decisions as to become rules of property and action in the state, those rules are accepted by the Federal court as authoritative declarations of the law of the state. 3. But where the law of the state has not been thus settled, it is not only the right, but the duty, of the Federal court to exercise its own judgment, as it also always does when the case before it depends upon the doctrines of commercial law and general jurisprudence. 4. So, when contracts and transactions are entered into, and rights have accrued under a particular state of the local decisions, or when there has been no decision by the state court on the particular question involved, then the Federal courts properly claim the right to give effect to their own judgment as to what is the law of the state applicable to the case, even where a different view has been expressed by the state court after the rights of parties accrued. But even in such cases, for the sake of comity and to avoid confusion, the Federal court should always lean to an agreement with the state court if the question is balanced with doubt."

Even when a question of nonstatutory law is in its nature local, so that a settled line of state court decisions with reference to it will be binding upon the state courts, there is authority for the position that a single decision of the state court is not controlling, in other words that more than one decision is essential to establish a rule as a rule of property binding upon the Federal courts.²⁹ And a recent decision of the United States Supreme Court³⁰ asserts the same right of the Federal court to refuse to follow a decision of the state court on the question of unwritten law,—otherwise one of a local character, as to which the state court decisions would be controlling,—rendered after the rights of the parties had accrued, that has been frequently exercised in respect of decisions under state statutes.³¹

b. Local rules; rules of property.

So far as nonstatutory law is concerned, it may be safely deduced from the statements of general principles in the cases cited in the last subdivision, that the Federal courts are not bound to follow the decisions of the state courts on questions of general law,³² but are bound to follow the decisions of those courts on questions of local law³³ and decisions constituting rules of property.³⁴ The difficulty however is to determine what questions are general, and ²⁹ As a precedent the decision of the supreme court of a state, though single, is entitled to peculiar respect in a case involving questions in relation to real property, but it is not conclusive in the courts of the United States unless it has become a rule of property. Gibson v. Lyon, 115 U. S. 439, 29 L. ed. 440, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 129; Fretts v. Shriver, 181 Fed. 279.

A well-defined distinction exists between the establishment of a rule of property by means of the interpretation of the highest court of a state, of the general principles of the common law, and the construction by such a court of a local statute. In the former case, a settled course of decisions of the state court is generally requisite. A single decision, though always persuasive, may not be controlling. Yocum v. Parker, 67 C. C. A. 227, 134 Fed. 205, holding that a decision of a state court construing a statute of wills was binding upon the Federal court, although rendered in a case involving the same devise that was before the Federal court. This, of course, upon the assumption that the judgment of the state court was not res judicata.

In Messinger v. Anderson, 96 C. C. A. 445, 171 Fed. 785, the circuit court of appeals, speaking by Lurton, J., stated that an additional reason for refusing to retract a previous decision in the Federal court construing a will, and follow a subsequent construction placed upon the same will by the state court, was found in the fact that at the time of the earlier Federal decision there was no settled line of state decisions applicable to the devise in question, saying: "This was a controversy between citizens of different states, and when, as was our duty, we reached a conclusion upon common-law principles in the exercise of our independent judgment, we are now under no obligation to recede from that opinion merely because in another case the supreme court of Ohio has since reached a different result." (Citing Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 27 L. ed. 359.) See cases cited in opinion on this point. This case, however, was reversed by the Supreme Court. See infra, III. d. note.

what are local, within the meaning of these principles,³⁵ and what is meant by the phrase "rules of property" as here used. The difficulty of distinguishing between general and local questions may be illustrated by a comparison of a few cases. In one case³⁶ the United States Supreme Court held that the liability of a municipality for injuries from defects in sidewalks was a local question, as to which the decisions of the state court were controlling, though those decisions did not involve any specific statute, and turned upon the distinction between the public and private functions of municipalities,—a distinction that is by no means peculiar to the law of the particular state in which the action originated, but is very generally recognized as the test of municipal liability in this class of cases. Upon the other hand, as subsequently shown,³⁷ the fact that the state court decisions on questions of common law, e. g., those in relation to commercial contracts or the liability of master to servant, turn upon considerations that are of general applicability and recognition, is regarded as a sufficient reason for holding that they relate to questions of general law rather than local law, and so are not binding upon the Federal courts. If it be supposed that it was the fact that the rule in the former case related to municipalities, that impressed it with a local character, we are confronted with a case holding that the question, "What is a public purpose for which a county or municipality may issue bonds," is one of general law, as to which the decisions of the state court are not controlling.³⁸

Occasionally, language is used by the courts that state decisions, even upon a question of common law which in its nature is general, and which arises in substantially the same way in all common-law jurisdictions, may have so clearly established a settled rule in the premises as to make it a part of the peculiar and local law of the state.^{39a} This limitation of the rule, if it were sustained by the cases, would remove or at least mitigate one serious objection to it, which lies in the possibility that one who has contracted or otherwise acted in reliance upon the decisions of the highest state court upon a question of general law may find that his reasonable expectations are defeated by the accidental circumstance that the action is brought in the Federal court. The view, however, that a question which in its nature is a general question of common law, e. g., questions in relation to commercial papers or in relation to a master's liability for injury to a servant, may become a local question, as to which the Federal court is bound to follow the state court decisions, merely because those decisions have established a settled rule on the point, has but little support from the cases. And it will be observed that in general the Federal courts justify their refusal to follow the state court on general questions of common law, because they are in their nature general questions, and not because they have not been settled by the decisions of the state court. In many cases, of course, it was the very fact that the state court decisions had settled the question contrary to the doctrine of the Federal cases, that made it necessary to invoke that doctrine. It may be, however, that the fact whether or not a question has been settled by a uniform and recognized course of decisions in the state courts may exert some influence in determining whether it should be regarded as general or local within the rule under discussion, if, from its nature and the elements which enter into it, its character in that respect might otherwise be open to doubt.

Again, the significance of the expression "rules of property" in the statements of the principles governing the duty of the Federal courts to follow the decisions of the state court is not entirely clear. Rules established by the decisions of the state courts in respect of tangible real or personal property are doubtless in general rules of property within the meaning of those general principles. Occasionally, the expression seems to be used in a broader sense and as the equivalent of rules of action or conduct,³⁹ in which event it would seem to embrace general rules as to the validity, construction, or effect, even of personal contracts, which have become so established by the decisions of the state courts that they may be assumed to have been generally acted upon. The expression, however, cannot, for the purposes now under consideration, be ordinarily given that broader significance, as is apparent from the well-established rule that the Federal courts are not bound to follow the decisions of the state court with respect to common-law questions in relation to commercial contracts. Doubtless, a rule established by the decisions of the state courts on a question of unwritten law in relation to intangible personal contractual rights may be regarded as a local rule, and so binding upon the Federal courts if based on conditions or considerations peculiar to the state in which the action originates; and it may be that in some instances a rule established by the decisions of the state court in the relation to such rights will be regarded as a rule of property by which the Federal courts are bound notwithstanding that it rests upon general reasoning and considerations not peculiar to the particular state. For the purposes of a general rule, however, it is not safe to extend the expression "rules of property" as employed in the statement of principles in relation to the subject under consideration, beyond rules in relation to tangible real or personal property.⁴⁰ But upon the other hand, according to a recent decision of the United States Supreme Court,^{40a} the mere fact that a decision of the state court relates to tangible real or personal property is not in itself sufficient to characterize it as a "rule of property" binding upon the Federal court; it must, in addition, be a decision, or part of a line of decisions, antedating the accrual of the rights under investigation. In other words, to bear the undoubted and unquestioned character of a rule of property binding upon the Federal court, it would seem that a decision must not only relate to tangible real or personal property, but must also have acquired the character of a rule of action or rule of conduct.⁴¹

As a matter of fact, however, while the courts, even when speaking of decisions of the state courts in relation to tangible real or personal property, frequently employ language implying that a rule of property which is binding upon the Federal courts is the product of repeated decisions, or a line of decisions, in reliance upon which parties may be assumed to have acted, yet it is believed that, with the exception just noted, the courts have rarely declined—perhaps because they have had no occasion to do so—to follow decisions of the state courts in relation to tangible real or personal property solely upon the ground that they were rendered after the rights of the parties had accrued, though, as as subsequently shown, this course is frequently pursued with respect to decisions in relation to state Constitutions or statutes. The rule⁴² that Federal courts are not bound to follow decisions of the state court construing particular wills (assuming, of course, that the decisions are not res judicata), as they are the decisions of courts construing particular state statutes, can hardly be regarded as an application of the exception under consideration, since such decisions, when they deal merely with the peculiar language of the particular will before the court,—and that is as far as the rule goes,—scarcely purport to be judicial precedents, even for subsequent cases in the state court, and in that respect are unlike the decision of the state court involved in the Kuhn Case, which purported to decide a general question in relation to real property, and concededly established a binding precedent for subsequent cases in the state court, irrespective of any question whether the rights in question accrued before or after the decision.

III. Constitutional and statutory questions.

a. In general.

It was early recognized by the United States Supreme Court that a "fixed and received construction by state courts of their respective statute laws" makes in fact a part of the statute law of the country, however we may doubt the propriety of that construction.⁴³ question of general law, concerning which the Federal courts are entitled to express an independent judgment, unless the contract is one relating to the sale or conveyance of real or personal property, and it contains words or phrases that, in virtue of local decisions, have acquired a definite meaning, and have thus become rules of property within the state."

And Chief Justice Marshall in an early case,⁴⁴ after observing that if the point in question, which related to the construction of a Kentucky statute, were to be decided by the court for the first time, there would be a considerable contrariety of opinion, remarked that if the point shall appear to have been settled in Kentucky, it would be unnecessary to discuss it; and added: "This court has uniformly professed its disposition, in cases depending on the laws of a particular state, to adopt the construction which the courts of the state have given to those laws. This course is founded on the principle, supposed to be universally recognized, that the judicial department of every government, where such department exists, is the appropriate organ for construing the legislative acts of that government. Thus, no court in the universe which professed to be governed by principle would, we presume, undertake to say that the courts of Great Britain or of France or of any other nation had misunderstood their own statutes, and therefore erect itself into a tribunal which should correct such misunderstanding. We receive the construction given by the courts of the nation as the true sense of the law, and feel ourselves no more at liberty to depart from that construction than to depart from the words of the statute. On this principle, the construction given by this court to the Constitution and laws of the United States is received by all as the true construction; and on the same principle, the construction given by the courts of the several states to the legislative acts of those states is received as true, unless they come in conflict with the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. If, then, this question has been settled in Kentucky, we must suppose it to be rightly settled." And this rule of decision had become so firmly fixed by 1832 that, in a case⁴⁵ decided in that year, the Federal Supreme Court accepted and followed the last construction placed upon a state statute by the state supreme court, which had become a rule of property in the state, notwithstanding that, in reliance upon earlier state decisions, it had previously placed a contrary construction upon the very statute. And Chief Justice Marshall, while sitting in circuit, —in marked contrast to the disposition manifested by the courts in the later Federal cases to restrict the rule which calls upon them to follow the decisions of the state upon questions arising under state Constitutions and statutes,—expressed his reluctance to construe state statutes, even when there has been no construction thereof by the state courts. Thus: "It is always with much reluctance that I break away in expounding the statute of a state; for the exposition of the acts of every legislature is, I think, the peculiar and appropriate duty of the tribunals created by that legislature."⁴⁶

But this rule, like the rule in relation to nonstatutory questions, though not to the same extent, has been gradually restricted in its scope until there are now a variety of circumstances that may defeat its operation. In one case, the Federal Supreme Court went so far as to declare that it had never hesitated in cases brought there under the 25th section of the judiciary act, to determine for itself the construction and effect of any statute of a state brought under review, without reference to the previous adjudications of the highest courts of the state, though it added that what it had said did not apply where the settled decisions in relation to a statute local in its character have become rules of property.⁴⁷ And in a case involving the constitutionality of a state statute, it was declared by the United States Supreme Court that "in matters of contract especially, the right of citizens of different states to litigate in the Federal courts of the various states is a right to demand the independent judgments of those courts."⁴⁸ Some of these cases, taken by themselves,

There was a vigorous dissenting opinion by Miller, J., in which Chase, Ch. J., concurred, pointing out that Swayne, who wrote the prevailing opinion, had previously held in Leffingwell v. Warren, 2 Black, 599, 17 L. ed. 261, that the Federal court would follow the latest settled adjudications of the state courts, and in Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175, 17 L. ed. 520, had only claimed to modify that doctrine so far as to hold contracts valid which had the support of some prior decisions of the state court.

would certainly lend color to the view that the general rule is for the Federal courts to decide for themselves questions arising under state Constitutions and statutes, and the exception is to follow the decisions of the state courts when the state decisions have become rules of property. In spite, however, of the constant tendency of the Federal courts to deny the conclusive effect of state decisions under various circumstances, it may be said that to follow the state decisions is the general rule, and to refuse to follow them the exception, so far as questions under state Constitutions and statutes are concerned. That respect for rules of property is not the ground, and does not define the limits, of the duty of the Federal courts to follow state decisions under state Constitutions or statutes, but may in some circumstances afford a justification for a departure therefrom is illustrated by a comparison of the cases subsequently cited,⁴⁹ in which the Federal courts have declined to follow the latest decisions of the court as to the validity or effect of a statute, when they would have the effect to invalidate contracts valid according to the earlier state decisions in force when they were made, with cases⁵⁰ where later state decisions upholding the validity of the contracts were followed, even upon the assumption that the earlier state decisions would have invalidated them. As the later decisions were rendered after the contracts in question were made they could hardly be regarded as rules of property. The reason they were followed was that there was nothing to prevent the application of the general rule, which has been formulated as follows: "In determining what the laws of the several states are, which will be regarded as rules of decision, we are bound to look not only at their Constitutions and statutes, but at the decisions of their highest courts giving construction to them. . . . If there be any inconsistency in the opinions of these courts, the general rule is that we follow the latest settled adjudications in preference to the earlier ones."⁵¹

Other statements of the rule as to state court decisions in respect of questions arising under state Constitutions and statutes are comprehended in the formulation of the general principles on this subject covering both written and unwritten law, to be found in the text of subdivision II. a. It is to be remembered, as stated at the beginning of the note, that we have reference only to questions as to which a state statute explicit in terms would concededly govern. The exceptions to the general rule, however, are numerous and of constant application. They embrace two classes: (1) Those depending not upon the nature of the question, but upon the time of the state decisions relatively to the accrual of the right of the parties, or to other earlier decisions, and (2) those depending upon the nature of the question, or at least upon the nature or ground of the state court's decisions. The form and scope of the exception applied in a given case are apt to be determined by the necessities of the case.

The general rules and exceptions apply equally to the question whether the statute is in conformity to or in violation of the al, although they were rendered after the contracts in question were made in reliance upon the statute.

state Constitution, as to the question of its construction and effect.⁵² It has been held that the Federal courts are not bound by the decisions of the state court as to private acts, ^{52a} and that they will adopt what appears to them to be the correct view as to the constitutionality of a state statute where the state courts are not agreed upon a settled construction.^{52b}

b. Change of state decisions after rights of parties accrued.

The original exception, and the one that has perhaps been most frequently applied, though it is by no means the most comprehensive in its scope, is that which asserts the right of the Federal courts to decline to follow the latest decisions of the state courts as to the validity or construction of a state statute, which overrule earlier decisions that were in force when the rights of the parties in question accrued.⁵³ It was at one time supposed that the decisions of the Federal court in such situation rested upon the ground that the change of decisions of the state court as applied to rights that had already accrued impaired the obligation of contracts, in violation of the Federal Constitution; but later decisions were explained as resting not upon the provision of the Federal Constitution referred to, but upon an exception to the rule that the Federal courts are bound to follow the decisions of the state courts. And while there have been intimations in some of the recent opinions of a disposition to return to the earlier view, that view can hardly be regarded as re-established.⁵⁴

The most frequent application of this exception has been in cases dealing with state, county, or municipal bonds, and is discussed in detail in the subdivision dealing with that class of contracts. The exception is applied only for the protection of rights which have become vested in conformity with the earlier decisions. The mere fact that the earlier decisions were in force at the time of the transaction or events out of which the case before the Federal court arose does not necessarily call for an application of the exception. Thus, in one case

⁵² This is apparent from the many cases cited in subsequent sections dealing with the validity of state statutes under state constitutions. Among the many cases that formally declare the general rule that the Federal courts are bound to follow the construction placed on the state Constitution by the highest state courts, the following may be mentioned: Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Vance, 96 U. S. 450, 24 L. ed. 752; Nesmith v. Sheldon, 7 How. 812, 12 L. ed. 925; Amoskeag Nat. Bank v. Ottawa, 105 U. S. 667, 26 L. ed. 1204; *Gilman v. Rep. 69; and many other cases cited in subdivisions of this note, especially IV. a, 3; IV. c, note 26.

In a recent case (Loeb v. Columbia Twp. 179 U. S. 472, 45 L. ed. 280, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174) Harlan, J., speaking of the rule that the Federal courts, in determining contract rights as affected by a state Constitution, will enforce the contract in accordance with the Constitution of the state as interpreted at the time the contract was made, by the highest court of the state, without regard to a contrary interpretation made by such court after the contract was made,—said that that doctrine was not in any wise changed or impaired by the decision in Central Land Co. v. Laidley, 159 U. S. 103, 111, 40 L. ed. 91, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 80, holding that a mere change of decision in the state court does not present a question of Federal right, under the clause of the Federal Constitution prohibiting a state from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts; and added: "As, however, the circuit courts of the United States are courts of 'an independent jurisdiction in the administration of state laws, co-ordinate with, and not subordinate to, that of the state courts, and are bound to exercise their own judgment as to the meaning and effect of those laws, . . . they may, in suits within their jurisdiction, properly hold, as in numerous cases this court has held, that the rights of parties arising under contracts not involving questions of a Federal nature are to be determined in accordance with the settled principles of local law as maintained by the highest court of the state at the time such rights accrued. The statutory provision that the laws of the several states, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in courts of the United States, in cases where they apply (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 721, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 581), has not been construed as absolutely requiring conformity in such cases to decisions of the state courts rendered after the rights of parties have accrued under the previous decisions of those courts of a contrary character."

the Federal court followed the latest decision of the state court, placing a construction upon a statute in relation to wills, which had the effect, as against the issue of the devisee, to give the latter the fee, although under the construction placed upon the statute by the earlier decisions which were in force at the time the will took effect, the devisee would have taken but a life estate with remainder in fee to the issue.⁵⁵ And so, notwithstanding an earlier Federal decision holding a statute void as in violation of the state Constitution, it has been held that a later state decision upholding the statute will be followed by the Federal court in a subsequent case involving no rights of contract entered into on faith of the prior decision of the Federal court.⁵⁶

c. Questions decided for the first time after rights of parties accrued.

Another exception that has not been so frequently applied as the one considered in the last subdivision, but which is more comprehensive in its scope, because it is not dependent upon a change of decisions in the state courts, is found in the assertion by the Federal courts of their right to decline to follow decisions of the state courts rendered after the accrual of the rights of the parties in question, although there were no decisions of the state court on the subject when those rights accrued. In statement this exception has not always been differentiated from the one considered in the last subdivision, and sometimes the courts, while declining to follow state decisions because rendered after the rights in question had accrued, although there was no change of decisions upon the part of the state court, have apparently relied upon Federal cases where there was a change in the state decisions after the accrual of the rights in question. Nevertheless this exception, as a distinct exception, in addition to that based upon a change of decision in the state court, is now well established.⁵⁷ The Federal court will, however, follow decisions of the state court, even as to prior transactions, where they are sustained by earlier decisions in force at the time of such transactions, establishing the general principle, though not rendered with reference to the particular constitutional pro

⁵⁵ Yocum v. Parker, 67 C. C. A. 227, 134 Fed. 205. It will be observed that the decision was against the children (issue) of the devisee, who claimed directly under the will, and not by virtue of any contract or conveyance. A different point would have been presented if the question had arisen between the purchaser of the devisee's interest and one who had purchased the supposed interests of the children in assumed reliance on the earlier state court decisions; or if the situation had been reversed, and the earlier decisions had been favorable to the purchaser of the devisee's interest and the later decisions had been unfavorable. In either of those events, it would seem that the case would have fallen within the exception. See, in this connection, Wade v. Travis County, 174 U. S. 499, 43 L. ed. 1060, 19 Sup. Ct. (2) Neither are such decisions obligatory upon courts of the United States when thereby the validity of contracts between a citizen of the state and a citizen of another state is affected, which were executed before there was any judicial construction of the statute or Constitution which seemed to authorize the contract in question."

vision or statute in question.⁵⁸ And to entitle one to invoke this exception and procure the independent opinion of the Federal court, his rights must have rested upon the constitutional or statutory provision in question; in other words the Constitution or statute must have entered into the contract or transaction and be necessary to the support of the right claimed.⁵⁹

d. State court decision rendered after earlier Federal decision.

Sometimes earlier Federal decisions rendered before any decision of the state court on the subject,⁶⁰ or before a change in state decisions,⁶¹ are advanced as reasons why the later state decisions should not be followed. Thus, the United States Supreme Court has declared that it would not feel bound in any case in which the point was first raised in the courts of the United States, and has been decided in a circuit court, to reverse the decision contrary to its own conviction, in order to conform to a state decision made in the meantime.⁶² And the fact that the state decision was not rendered until after the Federal case had been tried and submitted,⁶³ or until after the Federal case had been argued on appeal, and the court had agreed upon their decision, though before that decision had been rendered,⁶⁴ has been assigned as a reason for refusing to follow the state court decisions. It may be doubted, however, whether the mere fact of prior Federal decisions, either in the same cases or in other cases, constitutes an independent ground of exception to the general rule that the Federal courts must follow the decisions of the state courts construing their own Constitution and statutes, or does more than to furnish an additional reason for the application of one or the other of the exceptions considered in the last two subdivisions that is, where there was a change in the state decisions after the rights of the parties had accrued, or no state decisions at all upon the point in question until after such rights had accrued. And so, in cases that were not deemed to fall within either of these exceptions, we find the higher Federal courts reversing the decisions of the lower Federal courts on the strength of the decisions of the state court rendered after the decisions in the lower Federal court.⁶⁵ It is apparent, however, that where the Federal decisions, whether in the same or in other cases, were rendered prior to the latest state decision, the case is likely to fall within one or the other of the exceptions thus referred to. That, however, is not necessarily true, since it may be that, though the Federal decisions were first in point of time, the contrary state court decisions were nevertheless rendered prior to the accrual of the rights of the parties in question. It has been held that the pendency of an action in the state court, in which the construction of a state statute is involved, is no defense to an action in the Federal court between the same parties, involving the same question,⁶⁶ though doubtless in some circumstances the Federal court may deem it advisable to defer its decision until the state court has passed upon the point.⁶⁷ It should be observed that an entirely different point, and one not within the scope of the present note, is presented by the question as to the effect of a subsequent reversal by a state court of a judgment of a lower court which a Federal court has in the meantime held to operate as an estoppel.⁶⁸

e. Effect as distinguished from construction; decisions resting on general reasoning; scope of decision.

The exception, previously discussed, to the general rule that the Federal courts will follow the latest decisions of the state courts as to the validity and construction of state statutes, rests upon considerations affecting the time of the state decisions relatively to earlier decisions or to the accrual of the rights of the parties. There are, however, two exceptions, or perhaps two variations of the same exception, that have been applied in a number of cases, that do not depend at all upon these

And so, in Moores v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 104 U. S. 625, 26 L. ed. 870, a decision of the circuit court based upon a construction of the statute of limitations by the inferior state court was reversed because of a decision by the state supreme court pending the appeal.

And in American Sugar Ref. Co. v. New Orleans, 55 C. C. A. 328, 119 Fed. 691, a decision of the lower Federal court was reversed upon the strength of a decision of the state supreme court overruling the prior state court decisions, which had been followed by the lower Federal court.

And in Tefft v. Stern, 21 C. C. A. 73, 43 U. S. App. 442, 74 Fed. 755, reaffirming 21 C. C. A. 67, 43 U. S. App. 148, 73 Fed. 591, an order allowing extra costs was reversed because of a decision of the state court after the order was made.

demurrer adverse to the constitutionality of a state taxing statute, will be reversed where before final hearing the statute is held constitutional by the state court. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Poe, 64 Fed. 9.

In Messinger v. Anderson, 96 C. C. A. 445, 171 Fed. 785, the circuit court of appeals followed its own decision on a prior appeal construing a will, notwithstanding that in the meantime a contrary construction had been placed on the same will by a decision of the state supreme court, upon the ground, inter alia, that the decision on the prior appeal in the Federal court was the "law of the case," from which the court was not at liberty to depart even if it wished to do so. The decision on the last appeal was reversed by the Federal Supreme Court (225 U. S. 436, 56 L. ed. 1152, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 739.) The latter court said in effect that the phrase, "law of the case," as applied to the effect of previous orders in the same case, merely expresses the practice of the courts generally not to reopen what has already been decided, not a limit to their power; that in any event the Supreme Court was free when the case came before it. The court added that in its opinion, even apart from the state judgment as an adjudication, it should have been followed, if for no other reason, because, at least against the decision of the court of appeals, it was right.

considerations, but rather upon the nature of the question involved, or at least upon the grounds of the state court's decision. Thus, in a number of cases the Federal courts have refused to abide by decisions of the state courts, although the question involved, or at least was involved in, the state constitution or statutes upon the ground that they were as to the effect, rather than the construction, of the Constitution or statute; and did not rest upon nor involve the particular language employed, but proceeded upon general principles. This exception is well illustrated by the cases subsequently cited,⁶⁹ where the Federal courts have declined to follow state decisions so far as they held that the failure to comply with statutory requirements in the issuance of county or municipal bonds rendered them unenforceable in the hands of purchasers without notice, upon the ground that to that extent the state decisions did not rest upon the statute, but upon general principles. Thus, the Federal Supreme Court, in declining to follow decisions of the state court that municipal bonds were unenforceable even in the hands of bona fide purchasers, where they were delivered directly to an improvement company for whose benefit they were issued, or were not authorized by the requisite number of voters, said that the state cases made no attempt at interpretation of the statute, but asserted general principles, and therefore presented no such case of the construction of a state statute as to make them binding upon the Federal court.⁷⁰ So, the fact that the state decisions holding a statute unconstitutional did not turn upon constitutional principles peculiar to the state has been alluded to as a reason why they should not be allowed by the Federal courts.⁷¹ And it has been held that the question whether railroad aid is a public purpose for which the power of taxation may be exercised is not a local question of constitutional or statutory construction, but a general question, as to which the Federal courts were not bound though the question arose under the state Constitution.⁷² And in another case Judge Lurton, now of the United States Supreme Court, as a reason for declining to follow a decision of the Ohio supreme court against the constitutionality of a mechanics' lien statute, mentions the fact that it was not placed upon any merely local or peculiar provision of the Ohio Constitution, but upon the general ground that it was an unreasonable and oppressive restraint upon the owner's right of contract.⁷³ So, in declining to follow a decision of the state court that certain defects rendered a judgment void, and not merely erroneous, the Federal court remarked that the state decision was based mainly, if not entirely, on a consideration of the principles of the common law as they had been stated and applied by the courts of other states, and did not place or attempt to place a definite construction upon any statute of the state.⁷⁴ Again the question whether a provision of contract prescribing a shorter period of limitation than is prescribed by the state statute of limitations has been held to be one of general public policy, as to which the Federal courts are not bound to follow the state court decisions not based upon any peculiar feature of the statute of limitations of the particular state.⁷⁵ And the same has been held as to the question when a cause of action for fraud is deemed to accrue for the purposes of the statute of limitations.⁷⁶

In another case⁷⁷ the court, while conceding that the Federal courts would be bound by the decisions of the state court

The fact that the rights of the parties in this case accrued before the decisions of the state court furnished another reason for declining to follow them. But see *Zeiger v. Pennsylvania R. ⁷² Olcott v. Fond du Lac County, 16 Wall. 678, 21 L. ed. 382. There was another ground for the decision in this case, however, in that there had been a change in the state decisions after the contract in question. But see IV. a, and IV. v.

construing a state statute as conferring a right to recover at least nominal damages for unreasonable delay in the delivery of a telegram, although no such damages are averred, nevertheless held that the Federal courts would not be bound by the further position of the state court that such right to nominal damages was a sufficient predicate for the right to recover for injury to the feelings, since the question, after conceding the premise based on the construction of the statute, was one of general law, and not of the construction of a statute.

It will be perceived that the exception suggested and exemplified by the foregoing cases opens an almost unlimited field for conjecture and speculation as to the view which the Federal courts may take of questions which, though settled by the state court as questions of statutory construction, did not turn upon language peculiar to the statute, and in the solution of which the state court applied general reasoning and invoked the aid of general principles. A concrete illustration of the practical difficulty of forecasting the view of the Federal court is afforded by contrasting the cases just referred to, with the decision of the United States Supreme Court holding that the Federal courts were bound to follow the decision of the state court that one traveling on Sunday in violation of the state statute could not recover for injuries received through the negligence of a carrier, although the statute did not purport to deal with the question of liability.⁷⁸

of the exceptions or variations of the same exception now under discussion are disclosed in subsequent parts of the note.⁷⁹ It is to be said, however, that the possibility of applying these exceptions has been apparently overlooked or ignored in numerous cases which presented at least as good an opportunity for invoking them as those in which they have been applied.⁸⁰

Another element of uncertainty is involved in the statement of Judge Lurton that the opinion of the state court as to construction of a statute is authoritative to the extent of the precise question decided, and no further.^{80a}

f. Application of general rule of construction to particular facts.

A slightly different exception or variation from those considered in the last subdivision is made by the position that, though the construction or interpretation of a state statute by the state court is binding upon the Federal court, yet when it becomes necessary to apply the statute as thus construed by the local courts, to a particular contract, and determine, upon a consideration of all its provisions, whether it is violative of the statute, a Federal court is entitled to express an independent judgment.⁸¹ So the question as to what constitutes an indebtedness within a constitutional limitation of municipal indebtedness, or at least the question whether a particular contract or enterprise creates such an indebtedness, has been held to be one for the independent judgment of the Federal courts.⁸² And in

⁷⁹ See, for example, Spinks v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 137 Fed. 169, infra, IV. a, 4, note 43; and cases cited infra, IV. f, notes 68-70; IV. j, note 12; IV. kk, note 68, 69; IV. m, note 90 et seq.; IV. q, 2 (b) IV. q, 3, notes 63, 64.

⁸⁰ See, for example, Yarrington v. Delaware & H. Co. 143 Fed. 565, infra, IV. a, 5, note 64. So it would seem that this exception might have been invoked as to some of the questions as to which the decisions of the state courts were held controlling in infra, IV. d; IV. dd; IV. e; IV. f; IV. h, note 1; IV. j; IV. k; IV. m (especially 40 L.R.A. ⁸¹ Casserleigh v. Wood, 56 C. C. A. 212, 119 Fed. 308, holding that a state court decision that, under the local statutes, bad faith was necessary to render a contract champertous, was binding, but that the decision of the state court as to the applicability of the statute so construed, to a contract precisely like that before the Federal court, was not binding upon the latter.

one case the court, while conceding the construction by the state court of a state statute in relation to champerty to be binding upon the Federal court, yet held that when it becomes necessary to apply the statute as thus construed by the state court, to a particular contract, and determine, upon a consideration of all its provisions, whether it is violative of the state statute, the Federal court is entitled to express an independent judgment.⁸³

g. Statutes declaratory of common law; codification.

Another exception or special application of the exceptions already discussed, which is destined to be of increasing importance with the growth of the codification of the common law, is suggested by the refusal of a Federal court to follow decisions of the state courts as to the construction of state statutes,⁸⁴ upon the ground that they are merely declaratory of the common law. In another case, the court, while not deeming an expression of an opinion on the point necessary, remarked that an interesting point was presented by the question as to how far the Federal courts would be bound by decisions of a state court construing a statute occupying the peculiar position of the negotiable instrument act, that is to say, attempting to codify and make uniform the rules that govern an important topic of general commercial law.⁸⁵ So, Judge Taft, while conceding that if the rule established by the state court decisions as to the effect of contributory negligence grew out of the peculiar liability imposed by statute, as distinguished from that imposed for negligence at common law, it was binding on the Federal court, remarked that if the statute were held to be merely declaratory of the common law, the question as to the effect of contributory negligences would be a question of general common law, as to which the Federal court might exercise its own independent judgment.^{86, 87}

h. Passage or repeal of statute; conclusiveness of enrolled bill.

The decisions of the highest state court are binding upon the Federal courts upon the question as to the manner and legality of the passage of a statute;⁸⁸ as to whether an enrolled or engrossed bill may be impeached by resort to the legislative journals;⁸⁹ as to the repeal of a statute, assuming that there is no question as to violation of the Federal Constitution.⁹⁰

IV. Particular subjects.

a. Personal contracts.

1. In general.

As to contracts other than commercial paper and those in relation to specific real or personal property not affected by statute, it is frequently difficult to forecast with certainty whether the Federal court will feel bound to follow the decisions of the highest state court, or will treat the question as one of general law, as to which those decisions are not controlling. Sometimes, this uncertainty is reflected in a single case binding upon the Federal court unless in harmony with the plain language of the Constitution or the settled judicial construction existing at the time the contract was entered into or the bonds issued and sold.

⁸³ Casserleigh v. Wood, 56 C. C. A. 212, 119 Fed. 308. The court declined to follow the decision of the state court, although the contract before it was precisely like the one before the state court.

Francisco Sugar Co.* 193 Fed. 825.

It is only where the provision of the earlier act is irrepealable, thus constituting a contract, that it becomes the duty of the Federal court to decide for itself whether the subsequent act did or did not impair the obligation of the contract. Wicomico County v. Bancroft, 203 U. S. 112, 51 L. ed. 112, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 21.

as it passes through the different Federal courts.⁹¹

The tendency of the Federal courts seems to be to regard questions concerning contracts not in relation to specific real or personal property, and not dependent upon local statute or any peculiar local usage, to be questions of general jurisprudence, as to which the decisions of the highest state court are not controlling. It has been so held as to the liability of the lessor of a railroad company for negligence of a lessee,⁹² whether a bill of sale in restraint of trade may be collaterally assailed on that ground;⁹³ the validity of a contract payable in Confederate money;⁹⁴ whether a contract by a lunatic is void or voidable;⁹⁵ whether an absolute refusal to perform a contract gives the other party an immediate right to maintain an action for his entire damages, although the contract period has not expired;⁹⁶ whether an implied contract arises upon the owner's waiver of his remedy in tort for the conversion of goods;⁹⁷

whether under the terms of a contract one party was primarily and individually liable for the salary of another;⁹⁸ the construction and effect of contracts of guaranty;⁹⁹ the rights of laborers and materialmen to recover upon a contractor's bond, as affected by the invalidity of the contract as between the contractor and the municipality.¹⁰⁰

But the United States Supreme Court has declared generally that questions of public policy as affecting the liability for acts done or upon contracts made and to be performed within one of the states of the Union, when not controlled by the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, or by the principles of commercial or mercantile law, or of general jurisprudence, of national or universal application, are governed by the law of the state as expressed by its own Constitution and statutes, or declared by its highest court.¹ And the decisions of the highest state court have been held to be binding on the question whether a third person may sue on a con-

⁹⁸ Bancroft v. Hambly, 36 C. C. A. 595, 94 Fed. 975, reversing 83 Fed. 444. The court said: "As a precedent, the opinion of the supreme court of the state in the case cited is entitled, as are all of its opinions, to great respect. The present case, however, involves the interpretation of a contract not in any way dependent upon the construction of any state law, and that being so, we are not at liberty to follow the decision of that court construing the contract, if such construction does not meet with our approval, but are bound to exercise our independent judgment."

⁹⁹ Johnson v. Charles D. Norton Co. 86 C. C. A. 361, 159 Fed. 361. In this case, which involved the specific question whether the liability of the guarantor was conditional upon the prosecution of the principal to insolvency, Lurton, J., said: "With respect of such a question of general law, involving as this does the construction and effect of commercial obligations so much used in commercial transactions, the courts of the United States, while inclined to agreement with the decisions of the court of the state of the solution of the contract, are not compelled to follow such decisions when they do not profess to be based upon a local statute nor any local usage having the force of local law." But see Re Merrill & Baker, 108 C. C. A. 390, 186 Fed. 312, a bankruptcy case, holding that a contract of guaranty is to be construed in the light of New York decisions that, when the meaning of the words used has been ascertained, the guarantor's liability is strictissimi juris, and not to be extended beyond its precise import.

tract made for his benefit;² as to the effect upon contracts of a statute prohibiting labor on Sunday;³ as to what constitutes a breach of a contract for services;⁴ as to the right of the lowest bidder to the award of a contract for a public improvement.⁵ And the validity, under the state Constitution, and the construction, of statutes in relation to the payment of wages of employees, are, of course, matters as to which the decisions of the highest state courts are binding upon the Federal courts.⁶

2. Commercial paper.

As has been seen, the doctrine that the Federal courts are not bound to follow the decision of the state court on questions of tion in lease exempting railroad company from liability for negligence in setting fire to a storage warehouse on the right of way). But see supra, note 14, for a history of this case.

"But in special contracts not governed by the rules of commercial law, but provided for by special legislation of a state, conferring special rights and vested interests enforceable alone under such state legislation, we must, under the ruling in Whitfield v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 205 U. S. 489, 51 L. ed. 895, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 578, be governed by the law of that state touching the application of this doctrine of public policy, for, under such circumstances, the state has a right to adopt the view entertained by the supreme court or to reject it. In other words, the state, by its own legislation and the decisions of its own courts, can establish its own public policy, 'provided it does not, in doing so, come into conflict with the Constitution of the state or the Constitution of the United States,' although such policy, so established, may be, in the opinion of the Federal courts, 'inconsistent with public policy or sound morality.'" So in McCue v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 93 C. C. A. 71, 167 Fed. 435, it was said: The judgment in the McCue Case was reversed by the United States Supreme Court (223 U. S. 234, 56 L. ed. 419, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 57, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 220), but that court held that the contract in question was governed by the law of Virginia, the decisions of whose courts on the point in question did not differ from those of the Federal courts, rather than by the law of Wisconsin, as held by the lower court. The Supreme Court said that it was not called upon to decide whether it would have had to yield to the public policy of Virginia if it were the same as it was contended that the policy of Wisconsin was on the point involved in the case. See also Spinks v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 137 Fed. 160, supra, III. e, note 75.

But in Sheppey v. Stevens, 177 Fed. 484 (involving a contract attacked as contrary to public policy as in restraint of marriage), it is declared generally that the general law, but may exercise their own independent judgment, in the absence of statutory provision on the point in question, was first declared with reference to the general principles of commercial law, and specifically with reference to the question whether one who takes negotiable paper in payment of, or as collateral security for, an existing indebtedness, is entitled to protection as a bona fide holder. The right of the Federal court in the absence of statute on the subject, to decide this question for itself, irrespective of the decisions of the court of the state in which the action arose, has been held in a number of cases since the original decision to that effect in Swift v. Tyson.⁷ And this right of the Federal courts, in the absence of a local statute, to question whether a contract is contrary to public policy is one of general law, and not dependent upon any local statute or usage, and in determining such question the Federal courts will exercise their own judgment. The court, however, apparently fails to take account of the possible difference in this respect between commercial or mercantile contracts, and contracts not of that character.

There is an obvious distinction bearing on the subject of this note, between the question whether a contract is invalid because contrary to public policy, and the question referred to infra, IV. b, whether it is contrary to the public policy of one state to entertain an action upon a particular contract or transaction having its situs in another.

determine the questions of general commercial law in accordance with their own independent judgment, and upon general principles of commercial law, without reference to the decisions of the state court, clearly attaches to all questions relating to commercial paper, and has been specifically declared and applied to the questions concerning the character and negotiability of paper;⁸ whether one who places his name on the back of a note before delivery is a maker or indorser;⁹ the liability of accommodation parties;¹⁰ whether the transfer of a note having valid inception, from indorser to indorsee at an excessive rate of interest, is usurious;¹¹ the right of the holder to maintain an action against the drawer as soon as the drawee refuses to accept, without awaiting the maturity of the bill;¹² the rate of interest ex more for default in paying a bill of exchange;¹³ whether a contract created by indorsement and delivery

Thus far questions referred to in this section have been dealt with upon the assumption that there was no local statute affecting them. It has been held that even an explicit state statute cannot affect the right or duty of the Federal court to decide a question of commercial law upon general principles, when it affects the jurisdiction of that court, and the statute, if binding upon it, would diminish its jurisdiction.¹⁸ And assumed that the Federal rule on this subject was to be followed by the Federal court irrespective of the views of the state court. See note in 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 289, et seq.

Rep. 399, holding that the fact that notes of a municipality constituted an overissue was no defense as against a bona fide holder. The court said: "It has long been held by the Supreme Court that special local laws do not apply to all phases of commercial paper in the hands of innocent bona fide holders; and the reason for this is plain. Commercial paper is governed by the law merchant, and the law merchant is a part of the private international law; and, commercial paper being intended to circulate into the hands of citizens of different states and nonresidents, it is not always possible to apply peculiar local law with justice." And in Watson v. Tarpley, supra, it was held that a state statute providing that no action shall be commenced on a bill of exchange until maturity thereof could not restrict the

there are obiter expressions in some of the cases, lending some color to the view that so far as Federal courts are concerned it is beyond the power of the state legislature to change the general commercial law, even so far as questions of purely substantive law are concerned.¹⁹ That view, however, in respect of questions of substantive law, has not been sanctioned by the adjudicated cases; and is opposed to the tacit assumption of most of them, and has been expressly repudiated in at least one case decided by the circuit court of appeals.²⁰ And it has been expressly held by the Federal Supreme Court that a state statute of frauds, even as applied to commercial paper, is such a law of the state as has been declared by Congress to be a rule of decision in courts of the United States.²¹ There seems, therefore, to be no serious doubt that an explicit state statute on a particular point in relation to commercial paper must prevail in the Federal courts so far as the substantive rights of the parties are concerned, though it may be opposed to the general principles of commercial law which the Federal court would apply in the absence of such statute.²² And doubtless the decisions of the highest state court as to the construction or effect of such a statute will in general be regarded as conclusive upon the Federal court.²³ The question arises, however, whether the Federal courts will feel bound by the decisions of the state courts construing the uniform negotiable instrument act as adopted in the respective states. Doubtless many of the questions of the law merchant as to which there was formerly a conflict of authority in the several states have been definitely settled by the explicit terms of such act, leaving no room for construction or interpretation. But upon some points there is the same opportunity for difference of opinion that there was before the adoption of the act, or at least the courts of some states which have adopted the act have so held. For example, the very question involved in the case in which the Federal Supreme Court first authoritatively declared its independence of the state decisions, viz., whether one who takes paper as collateral security for a pre-existing indebtedness is a bona fide holder, has been held by some of the lower courts in New York to be unaffected by the act.²⁴ And if the court of appeals of that right of the holder of such a bill (assuring diversity of citizenship) to bring an action thereon against the drawee in the Federal court immediately upon the drawee's refusal to accept it and before its maturity.

a state statute which entitles one who signs a note on the back thereof before delivery to notice of dishonor as a surety.

So, in Farmers' Nat. Bank v. Sutton Mfg. Co. 17 L.R.A. 595, 3 C. C. A. 1, 6 U. S. App. 312, 52 Fed. 191, Judge Taft, while declaring in effect that Federal courts were not bound by the state decisions on general question of commercial law, "except so far as the rights of the parties are affected by statute," said a decision of the state court as to construction of a statute in relation to agreements for attorneys' fees in bills of exchange was "conclusive." And in H. Scherer & Co. v. Everest, 94 C. C. A. 346, 168 Fed. 822, the court, after asserting the right of the Federal courts to determine questions of general commercial law on general principles, remarked that so far as its conclusions rested upon a construction of a state statute limiting recovery by the holder of commercial paper procured by fraud, to the amount paid therefor, it was not inconsistent with the decisions of the state court.

state should adopt that view, a Federal court in a case arising there would be called upon to determine whether its right to follow the Federal rule rather than the New York rule on that point had been lost, because the New York decisions no longer rest solely upon the law merchant, but involve the construction of a statute. In view of their apparent reluctance to yield their right to decide commercial questions for themselves, it seems probable that the Federal courts would hold that the New York court doctrine still rests affirmatively upon their view of the principles of the law merchant, and only negatively upon the construction of the statute, which if not necessarily subversive of the New York doctrine, as is held in some states where that doctrine formerly prevailed, certainly lends no affirmative support thereto.²⁵

The general question as to whether the Federal courts are bound to follow the decisions of the state courts on questions under statutes codifying the common law has been touched upon in a previous subdivision.²⁶

²⁵ In Re Hopper-Morgan Co. 154 Fed. 249, the court held that the uniform negotiable instrument law as adopted in New York had not changed the New York rule as laid down by cases in that state holding that, in the absence of a diversion of the paper from the purposes intended, even one who took merely as collateral security for a pre-existing indebtedness may enforce the same against an accommodation party. There is, however, no conflict between the New York rule and the Federal rule in such a situation. The conflict, so far as concerns the right of such a holder as against an accommodation party, is in relation to cases where the paper had been diverted. See note in 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 287, 296. In Trust Co. v. Markee, 179 Fed. 764, and Melton v. Pensacola Bank & T. Co. 111 C. C. A. 166, 190 Fed. 126, it was assumed that the Federal rule had been put in force by the adoption of the negotiable instrument law, even if it had not formerly prevailed in the particular state; and as there were apparently no decisions of the state court to the contrary, the situation suggested in the text was not presented.

3. Municipal and county bonds.

Upon no other questions relating to the validity and construction of state statutes have there been so many departures by the Federal courts from the rule of following the decisions of the highest state court, as upon the questions relating to the constitutionality, construction, and effect of statutes under which commercial bonds have been issued by municipalities, or counties, or other public bodies. The Federal courts nearly always follow the decisions of the highest state court upon these questions, when those decisions sustain the validity of the bonds.²⁷

In some cases, the decisions of the highest state court have been followed notwithstanding they were such as to render the bonds in question invalid. But it generally appears in such cases that the state decisions relied on were rendered before the issuance of the bonds in question, or that, even as an independent proposition, the Federal court would have reached the same conclusion as the state court.²⁸

In the last case, the court said that the question must be determined by the construction placed upon the Constitution at the time the statute under which the bonds were issued was passed. It does not appear, however, that there had been any change of decision. See also Wade v. Travis County, 174 U. S. 499, 43 L. ed. 1060, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 715, infra, note 33.

But see Quaker City Nat. Bank v. Nolan County, 59 Fed. 660, where the Federal court refused to follow a decision of the state court upholding the validity of the bonds issued without compliance with a constitutional requirement, the point not having been called to the attention of the state court.

²⁸ In Pleasant Twp. v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 138 U. S. 67, 34 L. ed. 864, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 215, the Federal court, while agreeing with the decisions of the state courts rendered after the rights of the parties had accrued, against the validity of the bonds, expressly declared that the state decisions were not conclusive.

In the following cases, in which the de-

But when the latest decisions of the highest state court as to the validity or construction of a statute under which such bonds were issued are such, if followed, as to render the bonds invalid, the Federal court, at least unless, as an independent proposition, they would reach the same conclusion as the state court, generally finds some way of upholding the bonds notwithstanding the state court decisions. The precise ground of exception to the general rule, is apt to be dictated by the exigencies of the particular case. The exception most frequently applied is that the Federal courts, in case of a change of judicial decision by the state courts, will follow the earlier decisions in favor of the validity of the bonds in force at the time they were issued, or when the right of the parties accrued, rather than the later decisions unfavorable to their validity;²⁹ thus, applying specifically the exception discussed in subdivision III. b. supra.

In other cases, where there were prior Federal decisions favorable to the bonds, the Federal courts have refused to follow later state decisions unfavorable thereto, rendered after the accrual of the rights in question.³⁰ In one case, the Federal Supreme Court declined to reverse a decision of the Federal circuit court favorable to the bonds, in consequence of a contrary decision rendered by the state court after the decision in the circuit court.³¹ The same court, however, upon another occasion, changed its prior decision unfavorable to the validity cisions of the state court were followed, although they were unfavorable to the validity of the bonds, it appeared that they were rendered before the issuance of the bonds in question, or at least before the rights in question had accrued: South Ottawa v. Perkins, 94 U. S. 260, 24 L. ed. 154 (the principle was decided before the bonds were issued, though the decisions as to the specific question were later); Post v. Kendall County, 105 U. S. 667, 26 L. ed. 1204 (the principle was decided before the bonds were issued, though the decisions as to the specific question were later); German Sav. Bank v. Franklin County, 128 U. S. 526, 32 L. ed. 519, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159 (the court expressly states that the state decisions were rendered before the bonds were issued); Rich v. Mentz, 134 U. S. 632, 33 L. ed. 1074, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 610; Raymond v. Terrebonne, 28 Fed. 773, affirmed in 132 U. S. 192, 33 L. ed. 309, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67 (expressly states that plaintiff took title to bonds after the state court decision was made public). While the state decision which was followed in Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U. S. 425, 30 L. ed. 178, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1121, was apparently rendered after the issuance of the bonds, they seem to have been issued during the pendency of the appeal in which the decision was made.

In East Oakland v. Skinner, 94 U. S. 255, 24 L. ed. 125; Liebman v. San Francisco, 11 Sawy. 158, 24 Fed. 705, and Katzenberger v. Aberdeen, 16 Fed. 745, affirmed in 121 U. S. 172, 30 L. ed. 911, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 947, following state court decisions unfavorable to the validity of bonds, although apparently rendered after the bonds in question were issued, the Federal courts were of the same opinion as the state courts, on the merits of the question. And see Claiborne County v. Brooks, 111 U. S. 400, 28 L. ed. 470, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 489.

In Willis v. Wyandotte County, 30 C. C. A. 445, 58 U. S. App. 665, 86 Fed. 872, holding that a state decision declaring a statute under which road certificates were issued by a county unconstitutional would be adopted by the Federal court, it does not appear whether the certificates were issued before or after the state decision. As a matter of fact, however, the plaintiff was allowed to recover in this case on the ground of estoppel, so that no practical consequences followed from the adoption of the state decision.

In Lytle v. Lansing, 147 U. S. 59, 37 L. ed. 78, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 254, the state decision against the validity of the bond was perhaps res judicata, though that is not clear. However, it does not appear but that the Federal court would have reached the same conclusion as an independent proposition.

While, as just shown, the Federal courts ordinarily decline to follow later state court decisions unfavorable to the validity of the bonds, overruling earlier decisions in force when the bonds were issued and the rights of the parties accrued, the converse of that proposition is not true. Thus, the United States Supreme Court has followed the latest state court decisions favorable to the validity of the bonds in preference to earlier state court decisions unfavorable thereto.³³

Another and broader exception than either of those already referred to, has been frequently invoked to enable the Federal courts to avoid following decisions of the highest state court unfavorable to the bonds in question, when the Federal courts would hold otherwise as an independent proposition, viz., that the Federal courts are not bound to follow a decision of the state court as to the validity or construction of a statute under which bonds were issued, rendered after the issuance of the bonds and after the rights of the party had accrued.³⁴ It is doubtless essential to the application

In Carroll County v. Smith, 111 U. S. 556, 28 L. ed. 517, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 539, where the state decision was rendered upon the very bonds in suit in the Federal case, though the state action was between different parties and the judgment was not res judicata, the Federal court said: The state decision is not a judgment construing the Constitution and laws of the state which, without regard to its opinion, the Federal court is bound to adopt and apply, it not being a rule previously established so as to become recognized as settled law, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) knowledge of which would be imputed to the party.

A number of the foregoing cases cite Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 27 L. ed. 359, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10, which, as shown in another section, recognizes a case where there were no state decisions prior to the contract in question, as well as a case where there was a change of judicial position by the state court after the contract, as an exception to the general rule that the Federal courts will follow the decisions of the highest state court. And so, upon the authority of that case, the court in Anderson v. Santa Anna Twp. 116 U. S. 356, 29 L. ed. 633, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 413, after holding that the rights of the parties upon municipal bonds representing negotiable securities were to be determined according to the law as declared by the state court at the time the securities were issued, further expressly said that, assuming that, at the time the bonds were issued, the state court had not passed upon the validity of the statute, the Federal courts could adopt their own interpretation of the law applicable to the case, although a different interpretation may have been adopted by the state court after such rights accrued.

In Elmwood Twp. v. Marcy, 92 U. S. 289, 23 L. ed. 710, however, following state decisions holding bonds void and as in violation of the state Constitution, and a curative act unconstitutional, the court said: "We have always followed the highest court of the state in its construction of its own Constitution and laws. It is only where they have been construed differently at different times that, in cases like this, we have adopted as a rule of action the first decision and rejected the last." Although the state decisions upon the specific question as to the validity of bonds issued under the circumstances involved in the Federal case were subsequent to the issuance of the bonds in question, they were apparently in harmony with earlier state decisions preceding the bonds. It seems probable, therefore, that the court did not have in mind a case where there had been no state decision on the subject at all prior to the issuance of the bonds in question. At all events, any implication that it is only when there has been a change of decision by the state courts that the Federal courts may of this broader exception that, at the time of the issuance of the bonds, there shall have been no intimations from an authoritative source, legislative or judicial, casting any serious doubt upon their validity, and that the holders, upon the facts then existing, shall have been justified in assuming that the bonds were valid; but it is not essential that they should have acted upon affirmative decisions of the state tribunals to that effect. This is a specific application of the exception discussed in subdivision III. c.

In some cases, the Federal courts have decided in favor of the holder of the bonds, notwithstanding state decisions to the effect that they were invalid even in the hands of bona fide holders, upon the ground that the right of bona fide holders of such instruments is a general question of commercial law, as to which the Federal courts are not bound by the decisions of the state court.³⁵ This position is apparently not dependent upon the time of the state decisions relatively to the issuance of the bonds. The theory underlying these cases appears to be that, while the decisions of the state courts may be regarded as decisions upon a question of local, constitutional, or statutory law so far as they hold in general that the bonds are invalid, yet they are but decisions on a question of commercial law so far as they hold that the defects in the bonds are available as against bona fide holders, at least when they are mere deductions from the general holding as to the in-refuse to follow the state decision is against the weight of authority of the later cases.

In this connection, however, attention is called to the case of Zane v. Hamilton County, 189 U. S. 370, 47 L. ed. 858, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 538, affirming a decision of the circuit court of appeals (43 C. C. A. 416, 104 Fed. 63), which, upon the authority of state decisions apparently rendered after the issuance of the bonds in question, held that the bonds were void. The point made in the Supreme Court was that the holder of the bonds had no contract right protected by the Federal Constitution, because the purchase was made on the faith of prior decisions of the state courts that municipal subscriptions to railroad stock were so far germane to railroad incorporation as not to require specific mention in the title of an act providing for the incorporation of a railroad. There is no suggestion in the opinion of the Supreme Court that the Federal court was not bound to follow the decision of the state court holding that the statute under which the bonds were issued was unconstitutional; and, as stated, the decision in the lower court against the validity of the bonds was expressly based on the decisions of the state court, although it would seem that they were rendered after the issuance of the bonds in question. It may be, however, that the Federal court, even as an independent question, would have come to the same conclusion as the state court.

In Pana v. Bowler, 107 U. S. 529, 27 L. ed. 424, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 704, the court said that it might be required to yield, against its own judgment, to the proposition that, under the charter of the railway company, the election in this case was irregular and void; but that it was not bound to accept the inference drawn by the state court that, in consequence of such irregularity, the bonds were void in the hands of a bona fide holder.

In Presidio County v. Noel-Young Bond & Stock Co. the court said that since the decision in Swift v. Tyson, it has been the accepted doctrine that, in respect of questions of commercial law and general jurisprudence, the courts of the United States will exercise their own independent judgment, and in respect to such questions will not be controlled by decisions based upon local statutes or local usage, although, if the question is balanced with doubt, the courts of the United States, for the sake of harmony, will lean toward an agreement of views with the state court.

In Independent School Dist. v. Rew, 55 L.R.A. 364, 49 C. C. A. 198, 111 Fed. 1, the court said that the question under consideration was not one of the construction of the Constitution or of the statute of the state of Iowa, but simply involved the construction and effect of recitals in negotiable instruments, and was a question of commercial law, as to which the decisions of the state court were not controlling on the Federal court.

In Citizens' Sav. Bank v. Newburyport, 95 C. C. A. 232, 169 Fed. 766, involving the right of an innocent purchaser to recover on city notes representing an overissue, a fact which was not known to him and which did not appear on the face of the notes, the court said that if the whole question was one merely of authority on the part of the city treasurer, and if all the validity of the bonds, and do not turn upon any statutory language on this point as to rights of bona fide holders. This, it will be observed, is a specific application of the exception considered in subdivision III. e.

So a decision of the state court that a statute authorizing issuance of railroad aid bonds was unconstitutional has been held not to be binding upon a Federal court, because the question determinative of the decision whether railroad aid is a public purpose for which taxation may be authorized is a general one, as to which the decisions of the state court are not controlling.³⁶ The question as to the negotiability of county bonds has been held a question of general commercial or mercantile law, as to which the decisions of the state courts are not binding.³⁷ But the right to interest on overdue interest coupons of railroad aid bonds has been held a question of local law, as to which state decisions are controlling.³⁸

4. Insurance contracts.

At the same term of court at which Swift v. Tyson was decided, Justice Story in another case³⁹ extended the doctrine announced in the former case, to contracts of insurance, remarking, in this connection: "The questions under our consideration are questions of general commercial law, and depend upon the construction of a contract of insurance, which is by no means local in its character or regulated by any local policy or customs. Whatever respect, therefore, the decisions of state tribunals may have on such a subject, they are certainly are entitled to great respect, they cannot conclude the judgment of this court. On the contrary, we are bound to interpret this instrument according to our own opinion of its true intent and objects, aided by all the lights which can be obtained from all external sources whatsoever; and if the result to which we have arrived differs from that of these learned state courts, we may regret it, but it cannot be permitted to alter our judgment." Under this doctrine, it has been specifically held or declared that the Federal courts may decide with reference to general principles, and without regard to the decisions of the particular state court, the questions as to the mortgagor's interest in a policy taken out in his name and assigned to the mortgagee, and whether such insurance falls within the clause of another policy upon the mortgagor's interest, requiring notice of other insurance;⁴⁰ whether a policy procured by misrepresentation amounts to other insurance within such a provision;⁴¹ the necessity of an insurable interest as a condition of a valid assignment of a policy of life insurance;⁴² the validity of a stipulation prescribing a shorter period of limitation than that fixed by the statute of limitations;⁴³ whether an insurance facts concerning the same were known to the purchaser of the notes when the title was acquired, the question might be a local one in the ordinary sense of the expression, but that the facts not being exhibited on the face of the notes, and not being known to the holder at the time the title was acquired, the question was not one as to which it was necessary to examine the local decisions.

In German Sav. Bank v. Franklin County, 128 U. S. 526, 32 L. ed. 519, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159, however, state decisions rendered before the bonds in question were issued, which rendered them invalid whether in the hands of a bona fide holder or not, unless certain conditions were complied with, were followed by the Federal court.

So, in Scipio v. Wright, 101 U. S. 665, 25 L. ed. 1037, the state court decisions to the effect that purchasers of railroad aid bonds, with notice that they had been directly issued to a railroad company in exchange for stock, could not recover thereon, were followed and to the same effect is Thompson v. Perrine, 103 U. S. 806, 26 L. ed. 612.

as expounded when they were issued. But see Sutherland-Innes Co. v. Ewart, 30 C. C. A. 305, 58 U. S. App. 335, 86 Fed. 597, infra IV. a, note 77.

³⁷ Mercer County v. Hackett, 1 Wall. 83, 17 L. ed. 548. The court, however, said that if the decision of the state court had been founded upon the construction of the Constitution or statute law of the state, the Supreme Court would have felt bound to follow it.

The last case was reversed by the United States Supreme Court, in 222 U. S. 140, 56 L. ed. 133, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 642, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58; but that court also seems to have assumed that the question was a general one for the independent judgment of the Federal court although it expressed its gratification that the conclusion reached by it was sustained by a decision of the state court.

broker is the agent of the insurer or of the insured; ⁴⁴ whether an action for the cancellation of a life policy may be maintained after the death of the insured; ⁴⁵ what amounts to double insurance requiring contribution between insurers; ⁴⁶ the validity of an agreement for arbitration.⁴⁷ And the doctrine has been applied in numerous cases involving policies of marine insurance.⁴⁸

But the decisions of the highest state court construing statutes in relation to insurance are in general binding upon the Federal courts. It has been specifically so held or declared with reference to the construction of a state statute penalizing life insurance companies for failure to pay losses; ⁴⁹ as to statutes relating to suicide as a defense; ⁵⁰ excluding applications from evidence when a copy is not attached to the policy; ⁵¹ the applicability to policies issued by a foreign company, of a state statute making policies nonforfeitable for default in payment of premium.⁵² So, the construction of the charter of an insurance company, although obtained under a general law, pertains to the state court, just as if it were granted by a special act of the legislature.⁵³ And it has been held by the circuit court of appeals that the decisions of the state court are controlling on the question whether the public policy of the state precludes recovery under a policy issued by a mutual insurance company created by a special act of the legislature, where the insured was executed for crime.⁵⁴ But it has been held that when a state statute is merely declaratory of a general principle in relation to insurance, is clear and unambiguous in its terms, and the state court, by apparent construction, writes into the statute a fundamental change in such general law, its decisions will not be regarded as binding upon the Federal courts.⁵⁴

by counsel was not based upon any peculiar feature of the statutes of limitation differentiating them from similar statutes in other jurisdictions; and that the reasoning upon which it was based was equally applicable to any jurisdiction. This decision was reversed by the Supreme Court in 223 U. S. 234, 56 L. ed. 419, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 57, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 220. The latter court, however, was of the opinion that the policy was governed, not by the law of Wisconsin, but by the law of Virginia, and as there was no conflict between the Virginia decisions and the Federal decisions on the point, the court said in effect that it was not called upon to decide whether it would have had to yield to the Virginia decisions if they had been contrary to the Federal decisions.

See further, as to the exception applied in this case, supra, III. g.

5. Carriers' contracts.

In the absence of local statutes, questions affecting the contracts of carriers and their liability ex contractu or ex delicto are regarded as questions of general law, as to which the decisions of the state court are not binding upon the Federal court. Thus, the Federal courts will exercise their own independent judgment upon the question what constitutes a contract of carriage;⁵⁵ as to the character of a passenger's legal rights and the carrier's liability;^{55a} and specifically whether the mistake of a ticket agent excuses the act of a conductor in ejecting a passenger;⁵⁶ as to the liability of the carrier for punitive or exemplary damages for the wanton misconduct of a conductor toward a passenger;⁵⁷ the duty which the carrier owes to the shipper in respect of the condition of cars;⁵⁸ the validity of a stipulation against liability for negligence.⁵⁹ It has been said, however, that upon considerations of comity and in the orderly administration of law, the decisions of the highest state court in an action between the same parties and upon the same facts, though not controlling, will be followed by the Federal court, even though it may not be wholly in accord upon the question of negligence presented.⁶⁰

The duty of the Federal courts to abide by the decisions of the highest state court construing statutes in relation to carriers has been declared in a number of cases in the United States Supreme Court, which are not in point in this note, because the cases came up on error to the state court, and upon a question under the Federal Constitution.⁶¹ However, in actions in which the jurisdiction of the Federal courts rested upon diversity of citizenship, it has been held that they are bound by decisions of the highest state court as to validity, under the state Constitution, of a statute imposing an absolute liability upon carriers for injuries to passengers;⁶² whether a stipulation limiting liability to a fixed valuation violates a provision of the state Code declaring that a common carrier shall not exempt itself from liability for gross negligence by any contract made in anticipation thereof.⁶³ And so, while recognizing that the question whether a railway mail clerk is to be regarded as a passenger is, in the absence of statute, a general question, as to which the decisions of the state court are not controlling upon the Federal court, it has been held that a decision of the state court on that point, under a statute providing in effect that when one not an employee is injured while lawfully employed in or about any train or car, the right to recover shall be such only as would exist if such person were an employee, but that the provision shall not apply to passengers, is binding upon the Federal court.⁶⁴

The decision of the state court was followed notwithstanding that in the opinion of the Federal court it was erroneous. The Federal court said that if the state court had merely decided that a railway mail clerk was not a passenger, that being a question of general law, the

6. Telegraphs.

The liability of a telegraph company for failure promptly to deliver a message,⁶⁵ and the validity of a contract exempting the company from liability beyond the amount paid,⁶⁶ are questions of general law, as to which, in the absence of a local statute, the decisions of the state court are not controlling. And the same is true of the right to recover for mental anguish on account of the breach of duty of a telegraph company.⁶⁷

And it has even been held that the Federal court does not lose its right to decide, as an independent question, whether damages for mental anguish may be recovered by reason of state decisions upholding such right under a statute which does not deal with that particular question, but declares generally that a telegraph company shall be liable in case of unreasonable delay in delivering a telegram.⁶⁸

b. Contracts in relation to property.

1. Deeds, mortgages, and leases of real property.

As has been seen, the tendency is to regard questions concerning real property as local questions, as to which the decisions of the state court are controlling. Questions concerning the construction or effect of deeds and mortgages of real property have, however, in some instances, been regarded as general questions, as to which the Federal courts may exercise their own independent judgment, and are not concluded by the decisions of the state court. Thus, in a case⁶⁹ decided shortly after Swift v. Tyson, the United States Supreme Court declared that the decisions of the state court upon the construction of a deed as to matters and language belonging to the common law, and not to any local statute, although entitled to high respect, are not conclusive upon the Supreme Court. And in another early case⁷⁰ the question whether an instrument which purports on its face to be an absolute conveyance may be shown by extrinsic evidence to be a mortgage was declared to be one depending upon general principles of equity jurisprudence, concerning which the court would be governed by its own view of those principles, and would not hold itself bound by the decision of the state court.

Upon the other hand, it has been declared to be well settled that the Federal court will adopt the local law of real property as sustained by the decisions of the state court, whether those decisions are grounded upon the construction of state statutes or form a part of the unwritten law, and therefore, where it appears that, by a course of decision in the courts of the state, certain language found in a deed, will, or other muniment of title, is there held to grant a certain estate or to confer certain rights, the Federal courts will give the same effect to the language.⁷¹ So it has been held that the decisions of the highest state court are binding upon the question whether a deed reserving a vendors' lien vests title in the grantee;⁷² whether an eviction was by virtue of the act of a holder of a paramount title, so as to come within the operation of a covenant in a deed;⁷³ whether the granting clause will prevail in case of a conflict with the other parts of the deed.⁷⁴

So it has been declared generally that the settled law of a state on the subject of mortgages is regarded as a rule of property, and the Federal courts are governed by the statute and decision of the court

Federal court would not be bound by it, but that the decision of the state court was that a railway mail clerk was not a passenger within the meaning of the statute whereby the company's responsibility is defined, and the decision therefore interpreted the statute, and could not be disregarded.

of last resort of the state where the mortgaged property is situated.⁷⁵ And the rule has been applied to the nature and extent of the mortgagee's rights;⁷⁶ and specifically to his right to possession;⁷⁷ to the validity of a stipulation for attorneys' fees in case of foreclosure;⁷⁸ and the rights of the assignee of a bond and mortgage as against defenses available between the original parties.⁷⁹ So the Federal courts will follow the decisions of the state court upon question peculiar to mining leases;^{79a} as to interest recoverable on arrears of ground rent.^{79b} So the question whether a written contract amounts to an option or a sale of a vein of coal underlying land is one as to which decisions of the state court establishing a local rule are controlling upon the Federal court.^{79c} And, a fortiori, the Federal courts are ordinarily bound to follow the decisions of the highest state courts as to the construction and effect

So, in Lewis v. Herrera, 208 U. S. 309, 52 L. ed. 506, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 412, it was held that the construction of a territorial statute on this subject by the local courts was of great, if not controlling, weight.

In the following cases, the decision on this point is simply to the effect that the state statutes relating to redemption are binding upon the Federal courts in suits to foreclose, there apparently being no question as to the effect of state decisions under those statutes: Brine v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 96 U. S. 627, 24 L. ed. 858; Swift v. Smith, 102 U. S. 442, 26 L. ed. 193; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Cushman, 108 U. S. 51, 27 L. ed. 648, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 236; Parker v. Dacres, 130 U. S. 43, 32 L. ed. 848, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 433.

But the Federal courts, in giving substantial effect to the right of redemption secured by a state statute, may adhere to their own mode of procedure. Allis v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 97 U. S. 144, 24 L. ed. 1008. As stated at the beginning of the note, it does not purport to deal with the question whether a particular statute is binding upon the Federal courts; but presupposes that a statute explicit in terms would be binding. Otherwise, of course, the distinctive question presented in this note could not arise.

But in Julian v. Central Trust Co. 193

Supreme Court in the Kuhn Case,⁸⁹ they are at liberty to decline to do so as to decisions of the state court that had not become rules of property at the time the rights in question accrued; and this notwithstanding that there has been no change in decisions in the state court.

2. Chattel mortgages; conditional sales.

Questions relating to chattel mortgages are, in general, regarded as local questions, as to which the decisions of the state court are controlling upon the Federal courts, assuming that the particular question is not affected by the Federal law. It has been so held as to the question whether taking possession under an unrecorded chattel mortgage amounts to a fraudulent preference;⁹⁰ the validity of a chattel mortgage covering after-acquired property,⁹¹ or property consumable in the use;⁹² its validity as affected by a provision giving the mortgagor the right to retain possession and make sales,⁹³ or by the reservation of the mortgagor's exemption.⁹⁴

So, the question as to the validity and effect of a chattel mortgage which is not filed as provided by statute is a local question, as to which the decisions of the state court are controlling, assuming that the statute itself is binding upon the Federal courts.⁹⁵

The Federal courts will also follow the decision of the highest state court as to the construction of statutes in relation to conditional sales, and the effect of the failure to file the contract.⁹⁶

So, the question whether a contract in relation to personal property is one for a conditional sale or a lease,⁹⁷ or a bailment or sale,⁹⁸ has been held a question of local state law. It is to be understood that this subdivision, in conformity to the scope of the note as outlined at the beginning, deals only with cases that proceed upon the as-

U. S. 93, 48 L. ed. 629, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 399, holding that the determination by a state court that the property covered by a mortgage of all property and franchises of a railroad company remains liable after a sale under a Federal court decree of foreclosure, for the debts thereafter accruing against the mortgagor, because of the purchaser's failure to organize a domestic corporation, is not conclusive on the Federal Supreme Court in determining the rights secured by the purchaser under such a decree, the court said: "This decision of the highest court of the state was made after the rights of the Southern Railway Company, whatever they may be, had accrued in the property and franchise of the Western North Carolina Railroad Company, and, while entitled to the highest respect and consideration, is not conclusive upon this court in determining the rights secured to the purchaser under the decree of foreclosure in a Federal court."

In Re Hurley, 185 Fed. 851, the court expressly states that had the chattel mortgagee taken possession of after-acquired property before the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings, her right to hold it as against the trustee would have been a question of Massachusetts law, and not a question depending upon the bankruptcy act. Apparently the decision that she could not hold as against the trustee was referred 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sumption that an explicit state statute on the point in question would have been binding upon the Federal as well as the state court, and merely inquire whether the Federal court is bound to follow the decisions of the highest state court when the point is not explicitly covered by such a statute. It has no concern with the question whether the provision of the Federal bankruptcy act displaces the state law on a particular question.

c. Title and incidents of real property, generally; water rights.

Most questions relating to real property, though depending upon common-law principles, are regarded as local questions, as to which the decisions of the highest state court are binding upon the Federal court, at least if they have become rules of property, and assuming, of course, that the question is one as to which an explicit state statute would concededly govern to the exclusion of any Federal statute.

It was said in an early case: "There is no principle better established and more uniformly adhered to in this court, than that the circuit courts, in deciding on titles to real property in the different states, are bound to decide precisely as the state courts ought to do. . . . The rules of property and of evidence, whether derived from the laws or adjudications of the judicial tribunals of a state, furnish the guides and rules of decision in those of the Union in all cases to which they apply, where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States do not otherwise provide."⁹⁹

The rule has been specifically applied to the sufficiency of an equitable title to support ejectment; ¹⁰⁰ questions of boundary; ¹ and specifically the question whether the title of an abutting owner extends to the middle of the street, and his rights therein; ^{1a} priority of state grants; ² and generally as to questions and rights incident to the title of real property, as, for example, what constitutes a water course; ³ the rights of riparian owners; ⁴ including

But in Davis v. Commonwealth Land & Lumber Co. 141 Fed. 711, it was held that the decision of the state court on a question of boundary, though entitled to the highest consideration, was not binding upon the Federal court, where the state action was not seriously contested, and was apparently brought with a view to its effect on pending Federal actions, and the decision gave the tract only about one half the area given it by a prior decision in the Federal court.

the question as to the extent of the title of a riparian or littoral proprietor on navigable waters, to the extent that an explicit state statute on the subject would be binding;⁵ rights and liabilities respecting surface water;⁶ questions as to fixtures.⁷

In one case, however, it was held that the question as to dedication of real property did not depend upon a local statute or local state law, but upon general principles of common law, as to which the decisions of the state court are not controlling.⁸

Occasionally, the courts, in declaring the controlling effect of the decisions of the state courts on questions as to real property, have by their form of statement implied that something like a settled rule in the state court was necessary.⁹ Until the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Kuhn v. Fairmont Coal Co. Case,¹⁰ however, there seems to have been no express authority for refusing to follow the decision of the highest state court as to a question affecting real property, upon the ground that the state decision in question was rendered after the right of the parties to the Federal suit had accrued; although as previously shown, such an exception has been frequently applied in case of state decisions based on statute. The exception was applied in the Kuhn Case by holding that the Federal court was not bound by a decision of the highest court of the state as to the duty of subjacent support, where an estate in mineral is severed from an estate in the surface.

In construing local statutes respecting real property, the Federal courts are governed by state decisions.¹¹ Thus, the Federal court will follow the decision of the state court construing state statutes with reference to the public lands of the state,¹² and

In the former case, Field, J., said that the courts of the United States will construe the grants of the general government without reference to the rules of construction adopted by the states for their grant; but whatever incidents or rights attach to the ownership of property conveyed by the government will be determined by the states, subject to the condition that their rules do not impair the efficacy of grants or the use and enjoyment of the property by the grantee.

The right of riparian owners on navigable streams, and the question of navigability as affecting such right, have been held (Cairo, V. & C. R. Co. v. Caines, 87 Fed. 285) not local questions, but questions depending upon general principles, as to which the decisions of the state court are not controlling. It would seem, however, that such questions are really Federal questions, and not questions of state law at all.

dam, 6 Wall. 723, 18 L. ed. 967, is: "Where any principle of law establishing a rule of real property is settled in the state court, the same rule will be applied by this court in the same or analogous cases."

And in Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co. 125 U. S. 555, 31 L. ed. 795, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 974, the statement is: "It is also well settled that where a course of decisions, whether founded upon statutes or not, have become rules of property as laid down by the highest courts of the state,—by which is meant those rules governing the descent, transfer, or sale of property, and the rules which affect the title and possession thereto,—they are to be treated as laws of that state by the Federal courts."

The statement in Phelps v. Harris, 101 U. S. 370, 25 L. ed. 855, that the opinion expressed by the state courts in a case growing out of the same transaction as that involved in the Federal case, though entitled to great weight, was not absolutely controlling, was apparently prompted by the assumption that the point was not necessarily involved in the state case.

¹¹ In Polk v. Wendal, 9 Cranch, 87, 3 L. ed. 665, Chief Justice Marshall said: "In cases depending on the statutes of a state, and more especially in those respecting titles to land, this court adopts the construction of the state where that construction is settled and can be ascertained." The question involved, i. e., right to impeach a grant for a cause anterior to its issuance, not having been passed upon by the state court, it was decided as an independent question.

The rule, of course, does not apply where any question under the Federal Constitution or statutes is presented, even though the construction of a state statute may be incidentally involved.²⁴ And the rule is subject to the exceptions previously pointed out, that attach to the general rule that the decisions of the state courts are to be followed upon questions as to the validity and construction of local statutes.²⁵ Thus, Federal courts have refused to follow decisions of the highest state court, with which they did not agree, construing state statutes in relation to real property, because of contrary decisions of the state court in force when the rights of the parties accrued;²⁶ or upon the broader ground that the state decisions were rendered after spect by the Federal courts, are not absolutely binding on it as to whether the statute in question meets the requirement of due process of law.

the rights of the parties accrued.²⁷ The question whether a decision of the state court depending upon the meaning and construction of a patent granted by the Crown, under which certain rights were claimed by the state on the one hand, and by private individuals on the other, falls within the rule in relation to the decisions of the state court when expounding their own Constitution and laws, was mooted, but not decided, by Chief Justice Taney.²⁸

d. Recording laws.

The Federal courts are bound to follow the decisions of the state courts in the construction of their local recording acts, if there has been a uniform course of decision respecting them; ²⁹ and such decisions have been followed as to the validity of an unregistered mortgage as between the parties; ³⁰ or as against creditors; ³¹ as to the sufficiency of the record to impart constructive notice; ³² the necessity of truly describing the debt intended to be secured; ³³ the necessity of re-recording; ³⁴ the effect of knowledge of unrecorded mortgage, or mortgage not properly acknowledged; ³⁵ the necessity of recording vendor's privilege.³⁶

dd. Fraudulent transfers of property.

Questions in relation to conveyances or transfers of property in fraud of creditors are generally regarded as local questions, as to which the decisions of the state court are controlling; ³⁷ and this is true even in bankruptcy cases, in so far as the bankruptcy act does not undertake itself to avoid transfers, but relegates the matter to the state law. Thus, it has been held that the policy of the state law not to permit the owner of personal property to sell it and still continue in possession, so as to exempt it from seizure or attachment by the creditors of the vendor, will be followed by the Federal court.^{37a} And the same is true of the general question as to the validity of a conveyance made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors; ³⁸ and specifically whether a deed of trust is void for that reason; ³⁹ the validity of an assignment in trust, vesting the assignee with discretion as to disposal of the property; ⁴⁰ the validity and effect of a voluntary settlement or conveyance between husband and wife as against the former creditors; ⁴¹ as to the acquisition of a lien from the date of filing a bill to set aside a fraudulent transfer; ⁴² the right of a simple contract creditor to attack a conveyance as fraudulent.^{42a}

Though the state court decisions which were thus followed purported to be rendered under state statutes, the statutory provisions involved were for the most part of the type common to most of the states, being taken from the original statute in relation to fraudulent conveyances. The query occurs whether, if the exception referred to in subdivision III. e, is sound, it could not have been invoked as to some of the questions considered in the present subdivision.

e. Statute of frauds.

In an early case, Justice Story, considering the question as to the admissibility of parol evidence to supply the defect, in the written instrument as to the consideration, remarked that what might be his own view of the question, unaffected by any local decision, it was not necessary to suggest, because the point had been settled by the decisions of the state court and they were controlling.⁴³

And the Federal courts have consistently followed the decisions of the highest state court in the construction of the statute of frauds, even as to questions which are common to all such statutes. This doctrine has been applied specifically to the question whether one who did not sign a contract or memorandum for the sale of land may enforce the same against a party who did sign;⁴⁴ as to the necessity of naming or designating the party who does not sign an agreement for sale of land;⁴⁵ whether a contract not in writing, as required by the statute, is so absolutely void as to enable the vendee to recover the purchase price paid, when the vendor is willing to perform;⁴⁶ the sufficiency of the writing to satisfy the requirements of the statute of frauds in relation to contracts not to be performed within a year;⁴⁷ the right to hold an undisclosed principal upon a contract required to be in writing, when signed by his agent in his own name.⁴⁸

Here again, the query presents itself whether it would not have been possible to invoke the exception considered in supra, III. e, to the general rule that the decisions of the state court upon statutory questions are controlling.

f. Statute of limitations.

1. Actions at law.

This section, being concerned only with the question whether the Federal courts will follow state decisions as to the effect and construction of state statutes of limitations, which if explicit on the point would concededly have governed, does not purport to deal with the question as to when state statutes are applicable, nor with cases in which the refusal to follow the state decisions is upon the ground that the statutes themselves are not controlling.

As a predicate for the decision of the questions within the scope of this subdivision, however, it is proper to point out that even before the conformity act, so called,⁴⁹ statutes of limitations, even in personal actions, were regarded as "laws of the several states" which, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise required, must, under the judiciary act,⁵⁰ "be regarded as rules of decisions in trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply."⁵¹ Nor is the applicability of state statutes of limitations confined to actions arising under the state law, but extends to actions arising under Federal statutes, if there is no Federal statute of limitations applicable.⁵²

In general, though there are occasionally exceptions, the Federal courts will follow the decisions of the highest state court as to the construction and effect of state statutes of limitations, in actions at law in which the statutes themselves are controlling.⁵³ And this applies to statutes of nonclaim.⁵⁴ The rule has been applied to a wide variety of questions including the questions what are statutes of limitation;⁵⁵ the right of a foreign corporation to avail itself of the statute;⁵⁶ what period of limitations applies to a particular claim or cause of action;⁵⁷ applicability of the statute to judgments rendered before its passage;⁵⁸ the effect of the statute on a right of set-off;⁵⁹ meaning of term "beyond seas" as affecting running of statute;⁶⁰ and, generally, as to construction and effect of provisions suspending running of statute in case of absence or nonresidence, including the meaning of the words "residence," "departure" from state, and the like;⁶¹ when the statute commences to run;⁶² when action is deemed commenced for purposes of the statute;⁶³ sufficiency of an

from the statute of James, the Federal court would, in conformity with its general practice, follow the local law and administer the same justice which the state court would administer between the same parties.

The rule is thus formulated in Leffingwell v. Warren, 2 Black, 599, 17 L. ed. 261: "The courts of the United States, in the absence of legislation upon the subject by Congress, recognize the statutes of limitations of the several states, and give them the same construction and effect which are given by the local tribunals. They are a rule of decision under the 34th section of the judiciary act of 1789."

In Moore v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 104 U. S. 625, 26 L. ed. 870, the Supreme Court, speaking by Mr. Justice Gray, declared that the construction given by the supreme court of a state to a statute of limitations will be followed by the Federal Supreme Court, even in a case decided the other way in the Federal circuit court, in harmony with a decision of a lower state court before the decision of the state supreme court. Great Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Purdy, 162 U. S. 329, 40 L. ed. 986, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 810, holding that the question when the statute commenced to run against an action upon a subscription to corporate stock was a local question, as to which the judgment of the state supreme court could not be reviewed, is not in point, as the case came up on error to the state court, and not from a lower Federal court.

In Sohn v. Waterson, 17 Wall. 596, 21 L. ed. 737, the court followed its own views in holding that a statute of limitation commences to run when the cause of action is first subjected to the operation of the statute, unless the legislature has otherwise provided; but the court remarked that in the present case it was not bound by any decisive construction of the state court. In Brigham-Hopkins Co. v. Gross, 107 Fed. 769, the Federal circuit court, having held that a decision of the circuit court of appeals that an action might be maintained against the surviving partners on a firm debt, without making the administrator of the partnership estate a party, was controlling, notwithstanding an intervening decision of the state court to the contrary, further held that the decision of the state court did not operate to suspend the running of limitation against such an action in the Federal court.

acknowledgment or new promise to take a debt out of the statute; ⁶⁴ effect of minority upon the running of the statute; ⁶⁵ the right to recommence an action after limitation period, where original action failed for reasons not affecting the merits; ⁶⁶ the right to raise defense by demurrer.⁶⁷

It has been held, however, that the Federal courts are not bound by decisions of the state court based on general reasoning, and not on particular terms of the statute, as to the effect of the concealment of the cause of action upon the running of the statute; ⁶⁸ or as to the maturity of the debt for the purposes of the running of the statute.⁶⁹

So, the United States Supreme Court has refused to follow decisions of the state court based on general principles, and not upon any provisions of the local statute, holding that the Civil War did not have the effect to suspend the statute.⁷⁰

It will be observed that the cases just cited refusing to follow the decisions of the state court apply the exception discussed in subdivision III. e. It may perhaps be doubted whether there was not equal opportunity to invoke that exception as to some of the questions previously referred to in the present subdivision, as to which the decisions of the state court were held controlling, if that exception is to be admitted at all.

2. In equity.

As stated at the beginning of the note, the question as to when a state statute explicit in terms is binding upon the Federal courts is not within its scope, nor does it purport to cover cases in which it is held or assumed, whether correctly or incorrectly, that such a statute would not have been binding, although the actual decision was that the state court decisions were not binding. As a predicate for the discussion in this subdivision, however, it is proper to point out that state statutes of limitations, if applied at all in Federal suits in equity, are in general applied upon principles of analogy; ⁷¹ though it has been held otherwise where the statute, by its ex-

It will be observed that the decision is upon the ground that the statute itself does not apply, and not upon the ground that decisions of the state court are not binding as to the construction of a statute which would itself be applicable if construction or interpretation were unnecessary.

The court said that the decisions of the state courts are claimed to be controlling did not deal in any respect with the construction of local statute, but exclusively with the meaning, scope, and effect of a provision found in a private contract; that the statute on the subject (i. e., the statute of limitations) was plain and its application obvious, when the time that the indebtedness became due or accrued was ascertained. In answer to an argument based 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) on the stipulation in the principal note, that the rights of parties should be determined according to the laws of the state of Kansas, the court said that in the first place the stipulation related to the note, and not to the mortgage, and that in the second place the phrase, "the laws of the state of Kansas," meant the statutes of the state lawfully enacted, and there was no local statute declaring what effect should be given to such a provision in the mortgage or other agreement. The dissent of Caldwell, J., was based on the stipulation in the note referring it to the law of Kansas.

A. 284, 133 Fed. 28; Kessler v. Ensley Land Co. 123 Fed. 546. The list is, of course, merely illustrative, and not exhaustive, as the note does not purport to deal with the question whether the Federal courts are bound by state statutes upon a particular subject.

In Kirby v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. supra, Harlan, J., said: "It is undoubtedly true, as announced in adjudged cases, that courts of equity feel themselves bound in cases of concurrent jurisdiction, by the statutes of limitation that govern courts of law in similar circumstances, and that press terms, applies to suits in equity as well as actions at law;⁷² or where the jurisdiction of law and equity is concurrent.⁷³ Doubtless these exceptions are themselves subject to the necessity of preserving the equitable jurisdiction of the Federal courts unimpaired.⁷⁴ It follows, possibly with exceptions noted, that the decisions of the state courts respecting statutes of limitations are not absolutely binding upon the Federal courts in suits in equity, so far at least as they pertain to the remedy merely, and not to the substantive rights of the parties. But though sitting in equity, the Federal court may follow the rule of decision in the state court on the question of laches and limitations.⁷⁵ And upon this principle, the Federal courts have followed the state decisions as to the applicability of the statute to claims against trustees;⁷⁶ and upon the point that the filing of a petition within a statutory period is sufficient, although process is not issued until after the period has expired.⁷⁷

The Federal courts, however, when sitting in equity, will not, even by analogy, apply a state statute where unusual conditions or extraordinary circumstances render it inequitable to do so.⁷⁸ Nor may the established rule in equity as administered in the Federal court,—that where relief is asked on the ground of actual fraud, the time will not run in favor of defendant until the discovery of the fraud, or until, with reasonable diligence, it might have been discovered,—be obviated by reason of a contrary construction of the state statute of limitation by the state courts.⁷⁹ But it seems that when the local law, whether statutory or otherwise, though in form pertaining to the remedy really affects the substantive rights of the parties, the Federal courts not only will, but must, follow it, even in a suit in equity.⁸⁰ sometimes they act upon the analogy of the like limitation at law. But these general rules must be taken subject to the qualification that the equity jurisdiction of the courts of the United States cannot be impaired by the laws of the respective states in which they sit."

⁷³ In Miles v. Vivian, 25 C. C. A. 208, 51 U. S. App. 194, 79 Fed. 848, the court declares that the Federal courts will adjudge, in cases over which there is a concurrent jurisdiction by courts of law and equity, that lapse of time to be a bar in equity which would have constituted a bar if the action had been at law. And see cases cited in the opinion. And so in Higgins Oil & Fuel Co. v. Snow, 51 C. C. A. 267, 113 Fed. 433, it is said that in cases of concurrent jurisdiction equity follows law, and a court of equity will consider itself bound by the same rules that would apply in a court of law. And in Hayden v. Thompson, 17 C. C. A. 592, 36 U. S. App. 361, 71 Fed. 60, it was said that national courts sitting in equity act or refuse to act in analogy to the statute of limitations of the state in which they are sitting, and if the analogous action at law against the defendant would be barred under the local state statute, the suit must be dismissed.

And in Frishmuth v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 95 Fed. 5, it is said that the Federal courts, like all courts of equity, feel themselves bound in all cases of concurrent jurisdiction, by the statute of limitations that govern courts of law in such circumstances, and that whether they act in analogy or in obedience to those statutes is not of practical moment.

In St. Paul, S. & T. F. R. Co. v. Sage, 1 C. C. A. 256, 4 U. S. App. 160, 49 Fed. 315, seems to hold that the Federal court was bound by the decisions of the state court on the question whether the cause of action came within the provision of the state statute providing that, in actions for relief on the ground of fraud, the cause of action shall not be deemed to have accrued until discovery of the facts constituting the fraud, or the provision making the six years, statute applicable to actions to enforce trusts or to compel an accounting where the trusts have been repudiated.

ff. Adverse possession.

The decisions of the state court have been generally held controlling upon the Federal court on questions relating to adverse possession; including the general questions what constitutes adverse possession;⁸¹ the question who may avail himself of the statute;⁸² color of title;⁸³ necessity of connecting possession with grant in order to make statute applicable;⁸⁴ even though there had been a prior decision of the Federal Supreme Court to the contrary;⁸⁵ effect of tax deed to create constructive possession of unoccupied land;⁸⁶ when the bar of the statute of prescription begins to be operative.⁸⁷

ed. 950, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 548, holding that a Federal court of equity in a suit to quiet title against the purchaser of notes secured by a vendor's lien will apply the rule of local law, that when a debt is barred by the statute, an action to foreclose a lien or mortgage showing the same is also barred. Justice Holmes said: "We hardly see how a court of law could disregard an express reservation of security, or how a lien so reserved can be called a purely equitable right. But equitable or not, it is a creation not of the United States, but of the local law of Texas. If that law should declare the words in Bailey's deed purporting to reserve a lien unavailing, it would not be for the courts of the United States to say otherwise when sitting in equity, any more than when sitting at law. It appears to us equally their duty, when the local law decides that the words create a right, to take the measure of that right from the same source. The notes are barred as well in equity as at law. . . . This is not a matter of procedure or jurisdiction, but of substantive rights concerning land. It seems to us it should be governed by the decisions of the state where the land lies." But see contra, Butler v. Douglass, 1 McCrary, 630, 3 Fed. 612.

g. Liens.

State decisions establishing the rule that a vendor's lien does not pass under an assignment of the debt secured must be followed as a rule of property.⁸⁸ So Federal courts are in general bound to follow the decisions of the state courts as to the validity and construction of lien statutes.⁸⁹ This general rule, however, is subject to the exception pointed out in subdivision III. c, with respect to decisions rendered after the rights of the parties have accrued;⁹⁰ and it has been intimated that in any event the Federal court would not be bound to follow decisions of the state court as to the constitutionality of

So the first direct ruling of the highest court of a state construing a state statute will be followed by a Federal court without further inquiry, notwithstanding a prior decision of the Federal court to the contrary. Andrews v. National Foundry & Pipe Works, 36 L.R.A. 139, 22 C. C. A. 110, 46 U. S. App. 281, 76 Fed. 166, rehearing denied in 36 L.R.A. 153, 23 C. C. A. 454, 46 U. S. such statute, where they do not turn upon any constitutional provision peculiar to the state.⁹¹

h. Conflict of laws.

If the ultimate question in a case is regarded by the Federal courts as one of general law, which they are to determine for themselves, and as to which the decisions of the state court are not controlling, it is obvious that no practical necessity arises for determining which of two or more states in which different elements of the transaction had their situs should furnish the governing law,—although it would be necessary for a state court to determine that question.⁹² In some cases, however, the Federal courts have the same occasion as the state courts to determine that question, for the reason that some of the elements of the transaction may have their situs in a foreign country; or, if in a state, the ultimate question may be governed by statute or other local rule. In general, when it is necessary for the Federal courts to determine questions relating to conflict of laws at all, those questions, as distinguished from the ultimate question as to the rule prescribed by the law of the state whose law is held to govern, usually seem to be regarded as questions of general jurisprudence, as to which the Federal court, when in the exercise of the jurisdiction resting upon diversity of citizenship, are not bound to follow the decisions of the state court,—i. e., the decisions of the courts of the state in which the Federal action originates,—as to which of two or more possible jurisdictions should furnish the governing law,—unless those decisions purport to rest upon a construction of a local statute in respect of its applicability to cases presenting interstate or international features, in which event, it would seem that the case must fall within the operation of the general rule that decisions of the highest state court are controlling as to the construction of state statutes, unless it could be taken out of that general rule by virtue of the exception discussed in subdivision III. e.

Of the many Federal cases which discuss one or another of the phases of conflict of laws, comparatively few of them allude to the point whether the Federal court, as to such questions,—as distinguished from the ultimate question in the case after the governing law is ascertained,—is bound by the decisions of the highest court of the state in which the action originates. Most of them seem tacitly to assume that the preliminary question which states should furnish the governing law is to be decided according to the Federal court's own view of the principles applicable to that subject.^{92a} And these cases by their cumulative effect furnish strong support for that view, which is also sustained by express decisions. Thus, it has been held that the Federal courts are not bound to follow the decisions of the state courts as to the governing law with respect to usury;⁹³ the capacity of a married woman to con-

⁹¹ Jones v. Great Southern Fireproof Hotel Co. 30 C. C. A. 108, 58 U. S. App. 397, 86 Fed. 370, reversed on another point in 177 U. S. 449, 44 L. ed. 842, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 690. See, further, as to this possible exception, supra, III. e.

⁹² According to the views occasionally expressed, even a state court might determine such a question according to its own precedents without reference to the precedents of the other state, whose law, if statutory, would concededly govern; but this is opposed to the weight of authority and general practice so far as state courts are concerned. See notes in 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 212, and 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 880.

eral question, which the Federal courts were to determine for themselves, and without especial reference to the decisions of the courts of Virginia, where the action originated; although the circuit court of appeals was of the opinion that the decisions of the Wisconsin court were controlling on the ultimate question in the case, viz., whether there could be a recovery under the policy, the insured having been executed for a crime; and the Supreme Court queried whether it would have been bound by the decisions of the Virginia court on that point, if they had been opposed to the Federal decisions.

⁹³ McIlwaine v. Ellington, 55 L.R.A. 933, 49 C. C. A. 446, 111 Fed. 578, overruling McIlwaine v. Isely, 96 Fed. 62; Dybert v. Vermont Loan & T. Co. 37 C. C. A. 389, 94 Fed. 913. Many other Federal cases involving the question of the governing law with respect to usury, in which it was apparently assumed that the question was one of general law, as to which the decisions of the state court are not conclusive upon the Federal courts, will be found in notes to McIlwaine v. Ellington, 55 L.R.A. 933, and United States Sav. & L. Co. v. Beckley, 62 L.R.A. 33.

tract;⁹⁴ the manner and sufficiency of notice of the dishonor of commercial paper;⁹⁵ the character of a statute, or of the liability created thereby, as affecting the transitory character of an action to enforce it;⁹⁶ the effect of a general assignment for creditors made in another state, to defeat an attachment of property by a citizen.⁹⁷

So, it has been held that the Federal courts will decide for themselves, without being bound by the decisions of the courts of the states in which the action originates, whether it is contrary to the public policy of the forum for a Federal court sitting in one state to entertain a cause of action arising under a statute of another state;⁹⁸ or whether a law of another country giving a civil right to recover for personal injuries will be enforced in a Federal court.⁹⁹

But on the other hand, it has been held that the question whether a general assignment to the receiver of a foreign corporation was voluntary, so as to sustain his right as against a subsequent attachment of property in the state where the action in the Federal court originated, is one as to which the decisions of the state court, at least a decision as to the same assignment, is controlling.¹⁰⁰ So, the question whether one adopted in another state may take under the local statutes of descents has been held a question of statutory construction, as to which the decisions of the state court are conclusive, even if against the weight of authority.¹ And in one case it is declared generally that the Federal courts will fol-

⁹⁴ First Nat. Bank v. Mitchell, 34 C. C. A. 542, 92 Fed. 565. The court was of the opinion that, upon principles in relation to conflict of laws, the question as to the capacity of a married woman was to be determined by the law of Illinois, and accordingly reversed the decision of the circuit court (92 Fed. 90), which followed a decision of the Connecticut supreme court, with reference to the same transaction, and held that the contract was invalid under the Connecticut statute, because of her lack of capacity. The decision of the circuit court of appeals in this case was reversed by the Supreme Court (180 U. S. 471, 45 L. ed. 627, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418), but the reversal was upon the ground that the decision of the Connecticut court was res judicata.

⁹⁷ Stowe v. Belfast Sav. Bank, 92 Fed. 90. This decision is, however, perhaps to be regarded as resting upon the ground that, there being but a single decision on the point in the state court, there was no fixed local usage or custom on the point, rather than upon the ground that the question from its nature was one as to which the Federal courts were not bound by the decisions of the state court. This decision was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals in 34 C. C. A. 229, 63 U. S. App. 14, 92 Fed. 100; but that court held that the state decision which it was asked to follow was in violation of a principle of constitutional law as declared by the United States Supreme Court in another case. That court was therefore not called upon to decide whether the question of conflict of laws was one as to which it would be bound to follow the state decisions or not.

⁹⁸ Dexter v. Edmonds, 89 Fed. 467 (stockholder's liability); Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Larussi, 88 C. C. A. 230, 161 Fed. 66 (action for death).

The general statement in Finney v. Guy, 189 U. S. 335, 47 L. ed. 839, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 558, that whether a state court should permit an action to be maintained therein on principles of comity between the states in a question exclusively for the courts of that state to decide,—does not militate against the text, after it has reference to actions in the state courts, and the case came up on error to the state court.

⁹⁹ Evey v. Mexican C. R. Co. 38 L.R.A. 387, 26 C. C. A. 407, 52 U. S. App. 118, 81 Fed. 294, certiorari denied in 167 U. S. 746, 42 L. ed. 1210, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 996. But in Gallagher v. Florida East Coast R. Co. 196 Fed. 1000, the court said that the decisions of the New York courts that it was contrary to public policy of that state to entertain an action under the death statute of Florida were probably binding, and in any event persuasive, upon the Federal court.

¹⁰⁰ Zacher v. Fidelity Trust & S. V. Co. 45 C. C. A. 480, 106 Fed. 593. The state decision in this case was rendered in a case growing out of the same assignment, though the decision was not res judicata. Lurton, J., said: "It would be a scandal upon the administration of justice if two co-ordinate courts administering the same law should reach a different conclusion upon the same facts; and more especially would this be so in respect of a matter in which the highest court of the state whose comity and policy was involved had led the way by a decision between the same parties in respect to another fund embraced in the same assignment.

low the rule laid down by the highest court of a state, in determining whether the lex loci contractus of the lex fori shall govern.³

It has been declared⁴ that where a contract expressly stipulates that a certain state shall be regarded as the place of the contract, it will be construed according to that law, even though in the absence of such a term in the contract the construction and interpretation would be a question of general, and not local, law.

4. Measure of damages.

State decisions have been held controlling upon the measure of damages for evicting a lessee;⁵ for breach of a covenant of quiet enjoyment in a lease.⁶ It will be observed that both points present a question as to the law of real estate, and it was upon this ground that the state decisions were held controlling. So, the decisions of the state court will ordinarily be followed upon the measure of damages for breach of a personal contract, if based upon a local statute.⁶

In the absence of statute, however, the measure of damages recoverable in an action for tort, at least a personal tort, is one of general jurisprudence, as to which the Federal courts are not bound by the state decision.⁷ And that is also held to be true of the liability of a carrier for exemplary damages to a passenger;⁸ and of the right to recover for mental anguish.⁹

5. Interest and usury.

Interest being a matter of local regulation, the decisions of the courts of last resort of the state are binding upon the Federal courts;¹⁰ and this doctrine has been specifically applied to the question whether the statutory or contractual rate applies after maturity.¹¹

The rule also applies to questions of usury. Thus, it was said by the United States Supreme Court: "The local law [as to usury], consisting of the applicable statutes as construed by the supreme court of the state, furnishes the rule of decision."¹² And decisions of the state supreme court construing the state statute so as to abrogate the rule making tender of the principal sum with lawful interest a condition of the right to maintain a bill in equity to cancel a usurious note are binding upon the Federal courts.¹³ And it has been held that the Federal courts are bound by the de-

⁴ Russell v. Grigsby, 94 C. C. A. 61, 168 Fed. 577 (opinion by Lurton, J.). (But see supra, IV. f, 1, note 69.) The question in the case, however, related to an assignment of the policy, and that was held to be another contract, and not within the stipulation as to the law of Pennsylvania. The reversal of this case (222 U. S. 149, 56 L. ed. 133, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 642, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58) was on the merits of the question in relation to the assignment.

The court said that it must follow the New York decision, even if the rule as laid down by them is opposed to the weight of authority elsewhere, and contrary to the founded principle, or even if it were to be assumed that the court of appeals might modify in favor of the plaintiff the rule now established. "The plaintiff has brought his suit affecting land in this court, and we must follow settled rules, not change them. Our own duty is to take the law as we find it, and as we find it, apply it."

breach of contract, are binding upon the Federal court.

But in New England Mortg. Secur. Co. v. Gay, 33 Fed. 636, writ of error dismissed in 145 U. S. 123, 36 L. ed. 646, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 815, the Federal court refused to follow the state decision as to whether commission charged by the lender's agent for services in making a loan rendered the transaction usurious, for the reason, as the court said, that no question of construction was involved, and the decision of the state court was not produced, nor the opinion delivered or filed.

¹³ Missouri, K. & T. Trust Co. v. Krumseig, 172 U. S. 351, 43 L. ed. 474, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 179. It was argued in this case (and of that opinion was Circuit Court

cisions of the state court as to the effect of the intention of the parties on the question of usury; ¹⁴ and the effect of a provision in a contract for interest at an unlawful rate after maturity.¹⁵ In one case, however, the court declined to follow the decision of the state court as to the law governing a contract with respect to usury, the decision having been rendered after the contract in question was made.¹⁶

In one instance, the exception discussed in supra, III. e, was invoked to take a question as to usury out of the general rule.¹⁷ And it would seem that that exception, if sound, might have been invoked as to some other questions referred to in this subdivision.

Judge Sanborn in the same case, 23 C. C. A. 1, 40 U. S. App. 620, 77 Fed. 32) that, as Federal courts in the exercise of their equity jurisdiction do not receive any modification from the legislation of the states or the practice of their courts, and no state statute can deprive the Federal courts sitting in equity of the power or relieve them of the duty to enforce the established principle of equity jurisprudence, that he who seeks equity must do equity, and to require the complainants to pay what they justly owe for principal and lawful interest as a condition of maintaining their bill for affirmative relief. The supreme court, however, said: "We think it a satisfactory reply to such a proposition that the complainants in the present case were not seeking equity, but to avail themselves of a substantive right under the statutory law of the state. It seems to be conceded, or, if not conceded, it is plainly evident, that if the cause had remained in the state court, where it was originally brought, the complainant would have been entitled, under the public policy of the state of Minnesota, manifested by its statutes as construed by its courts, to have this usurious contract canceled and surrendered without tendering payment of the whole or any part of the original indebtedness. The defendant company could not, by removing the case to the Federal court, on the ground that it was a citizen of another state, deprive the complainants of such a substantive right."

11. Decedents' estates generally.

Decisions of the highest court of the state are controlling upon the Federal courts as to the construction of the local statute of descents; ¹⁸ and statute of distributions.¹⁹ So the decisions of the highest state court based upon statute, will be followed upon the question whether the estate has been fully settled and administered; ²⁰ as to the effect of proceedings in probate court; ²¹ as to claims against the estate and the enforcement thereof; ²² as to the sale and conveyance of real property in the course of administration; ²³ as to the obligation of a devisee to give a bond for the payment of debts of the estate; ²⁴ whether a statutory power conferred upon the owner of property

In Saunders v. Gould, 4 Pet. 392, 7 L. ed. 897, Chief Justice Marshall said that, had the court been satisfied that there had been a settled construction of the statute of descents by the state supreme court, that settled construction would undoubtedly have been respected.

In Gardner v. Collins, supra, the court said that if the statute had been an ancient one, and a uniform course of professional opinion and practice had long prevailed in the interpretation of it, that would be respected as of almost equal authority with a judicial interpretation.

In Hanrick v. Patrick, 119 U. S. 156, 30 L. ed. 396, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 147, involving the right of alien heirs, the court said that great weight, if not conclusive effect, was to be given to the decisions of the state court upon the question of the construction of the statutes of the state as affecting titles to real property within its territory, though in this case the Federal Supreme Court was of the same opinion as the state court on the question at issue.

may be exercised by his executor;²⁵ as to dower rights of widow.²⁶

333. Wills.

There is no such duty devolving upon the Federal courts to follow the state courts in the construction of a particular will as there is in the construction of a statute, assuming, of course, that the state court's decision is not binding upon the principle of res judicata.²⁷

When, however, the state court decisions have established a rule of real property applicable to the will in question, the Federal court is in general bound to follow those decisions.²⁸ On this principle the decisions of the state courts have been accepted by the Federal courts on the question whether the word "heirs" is a word of limitation or purchase;²⁹ applicability of rule in Shelly's Case;³⁰ whether a will creates an executory devise;³¹ whether a devise of real estate carries the fee;³² questions relating to charitable bequests and uses;³³ whether a claim barred by the statute of limitations may be set off against a legacy.^{33a}

It is obvious that, so far as rules of construction as distinguished from rules of property are concerned, the decisions of the state court merely serve as guides to the Federal courts in applying the general rule that the intention of the testator is to be given effect, and are not absolutely controlling.³⁴

Decisions of the highest state court as to the construction or effect of local statutes in relation to wills must in general be followed by the Federal courts.³⁵ And it

Of course, it may be necessary where dower is claimed in same interest derived from the Federal government, e. g., a mining claim, to consider the effect of the Federal statutes or decisions. See Black v. Elkhorn Min. Co. 3 C. C. A. 312, 7 U. S. App. 393, 52 Fed. 859, affirmed in 163 U. S. 445, 41 L. ed. 221, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1101.

²⁷ Lane v. Vick, 3 How. 464, 11 L. ed. 681 (question whether certain property covered by a devise); Barber v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. 166 U. S. 83, 41 L. ed. 925, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 488 (character of estate devised); Messinger v. Anderson, 96 C. C. A. 445, 171 Fed. 785 (question whether one took title to real property under terms of will). The Federal court in the last case adhered to its own previous construction of the will, notwithstanding that in the interval the state court had placed a different construction upon the same will. The court gave as an additional reason why it was not bound by the state court's decision construing the will, even if it had power to retract its own opinion and adopt the subsequent view of the state court, that at the time of the earlier decisions in the Federal court there was no settled line of decisions in the state court applicable to the devise in question. This decision was reversed by the Supreme Court (225 U. S. 436, 56 L. ed. 1152, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 739), but the latter court was of the opinion that the decision of the state court was right, "at least as against the decision of the circuit court of appeals," and there was no disapproval, at least no expressed disapproval, of the general position taken by the Circuit Courts of Appeals as to a state court decision with respect to a particular will.

After stating the rule of the text, the court, in Jackson ex dem. St. John v. Chew, 12 Wheat. 167, 6 L. ed. 588, remarked: "This is a principle so obviously just and indispensably necessary under our system of government, that it cannot be lost sight of."

This is implied in Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How. 127, 197, 11 L. ed. 205, 233, where the court refers to the Pennsylvania decisions to the effect that the provisions of 43 Eliz. chap. 4, have been enforced in Pennsylvania by common usage and constitutional recognition, and not only these but the more extensive range of charitable uses which chancery supported before that statute and beyond it.

^{33a} Wilson v. Smith, 117 Fed. 707, affirmed in 61 C. C. A. 446, 126 Fed. 916.

³⁴ Thus, in Russell v. United States Trust Co. 127 Fed. 445, affirmed in 69 C. C. A. 410, 136 Fed. 758, it was said that while the Federal courts adopt the local law of real property as ascertained by decisions of the state court, whether grounded on the construction of statutes or the unwritten law, yet upon the question whether the expression of a testator of a wish or recommendation will create a trust, the decision of the state court merely affords a guide in applying the general rule that the intention of the testator is to be effectuated.

³⁵ The decision in Carroll v. Carroll, 16 How. 275, 14 L. ed. 936, refusing to follow the construction of a state statute by

has been so held with respect to the decisions under a statute relating to the extent and character of the estate passing under a devise; ³⁶ the construction and effect of statutes abolishing entails; ³⁷ the meaning of the statutory phrase, "any person interested," in a statute in relation to contests; ³⁸ the effect of the omission to provide for a child; ³⁹ as to the right of the Federal government under a local statute to take by devise; ⁴⁰ as to the effect of adverse possession of land upon the operation of a devise thereof; ⁴¹ republication of will. ⁴²

But in one case the Federal court declined to follow a decision of the state court rendered during the pendency of the action in the Federal court, overruling earlier state court decisions to the effect that probate in the state was not essential to enable a devisee in a foreign will to maintain actions in relation to land within the state. ⁴³

k. Domestic relations; married women.

Decisions of the highest state court have been held binding upon the Federal court as to the construction and effect of statutes in relation to marriage; ⁴⁴ and generally as to the capacity of married women to contract and their liability on their contracts; ⁴⁵ and specifically her right under married women's acts, to mortgage her separate property to secure her husband's debts; ⁴⁶ the requisites of conveyances, ⁴⁷ and acknowledgment, ⁴⁸ by a married woman; the effect of conveyances to husband and wife; ⁴⁹ the nature of the wife's right or title in property; ⁵⁰ her right to sue in her own name, and as to the running of the statute of limitations against her; ⁵¹ the common-law right of husband and wife respectively to custody of a child. ⁵²

kk. Assignments for creditors; insolvency proceedings; receivership.

This subdivision is not concerned with the effect of the bankruptcy act or other Federal statutes upon state insolvency or assignment statutes. ⁵³ On the other hand, it presupposes that the particular question involved is a state question, in the sense that it would be controlled by the state statutes if the same were explicit on the point and stood in no need of construction, and deals simply with the question whether the state decisions as to the validity, construction, and effect of the statutes are binding upon the Federal courts. The construction and effect of state the state court, was upon the ground that what was said by the state court on this point was obiter. But see Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. 495, 12 L. ed. 1170, as to private act passed to remove obstacles in way of executing certain trusts under a will.

⁵³ For example, the decision in Johnson v. Crawford & Yothers, 154 Fed. 761, to the effect that a state insolvency statute is superseded by the Federal bankruptcy law, is not within the scope of this note, since the question was not as to how the state law on the subject is to be ascertained,—whether as an independent question for the Federal court or by following state decisions,—but as to the effect of the Federal bankruptcy act. And so the note excludes cases like Perry Mfg. Co. v. Brown, 2 Woodb. & M. 449, Fed. Cas. No. 11,015, which, though holding that the state law prevails on a particular question, does not consider the question whether the decisions of the state court are controlling in ascertaining the state law.

insolvency statute or statutes regulating assignments for the benefit of creditors are questions as to which the decisions of the highest court of the state, establishing a rule of property, are of controlling authority in the courts of the United States, assuming that the statutes themselves are binding on those courts.⁵⁴ The rule has been specifically applied to the question whether such a statute should be strictly or liberally construed;⁵⁵ whether a general assignment act of the state is repealed by a later insolvent debtor act of the same state;⁵⁶ whether a statute in relation to assignments is an insolvency law;⁵⁷ what amounts to an assignment for creditors under the statute;⁵⁸ the validity of assignments with preference;⁵⁹ and, generally, as to the right of an insolvent debtor to prefer creditors by conveyances or transfers of property;⁶⁰ the effect of discrimination against creditors who fail to release their claims;⁶¹ the effect of transfer or conveyances to individual creditors contemporaneously with the general assignment;⁶² the effect of vesting assignee with discretion as to the sale of the assigned property;⁶³ the effect of the assignee's failure to file inventory and bonds before taking possession of the property;⁶⁴ the question who are employees within the provision of the statute for preference to the employees of an insolvent corporation;⁶⁵ landlord's right to preference;⁶⁶ the applicability of a state statute to receivers in Federal courts.⁶⁷

But it has been held that the right of a trust fund to preferential payment out of the assets of an insolvent, depending upon general principles of law and equity, presents a question for the independent judgment of the Federal courts, as to which they are not concluded by the decisions of the state court;⁶⁸ and the same is true of the general question whether a creditor holding a collateral security is entitled to a dividend on his entire claim.⁶⁹

Whether in view of that fact the decision is correct is not within the scope of the note, but the case is of course, a fortiori, authority on the point apart from its bearing on the Federal question.

l. Agency; partnership.

There are but few cases on specific questions in relation to agency or partnership. It would seem, however, in the absence of local statutes, most of the questions that arise in connection with these subjects are of a general nature, as to which the decisions of the state court would not be controlling; and it has been expressly so held as to the question whether a broker to whom goods are delivered to sell has implied power to pledge them.⁷⁰ And in one case, the Federal circuit court followed the decisions of the Federal circuit court of appeals, construing a state statute in relation to the right to sue the surviving member of a firm without joining the administrator of the partnership estate, notwithstanding an intervening decision to the contrary by the highest court of the state.⁷¹

m. Corporations.

The Federal courts, in the absence of any question arising under the Federal Constitution or statutes, in general, follow the decisions of the highest state courts as to the constitutionality, construction, and effect of statutes in relation to corporations; and this rule has been applied specifically to statutory questions in relation to the origination and regulation of banking associations;⁷² as to the corporate existence of a company or association;⁷³ what constitutes a state corporation;⁷⁴ corporate names;⁷⁵ the constitutionality of special acts creating corporations;⁷⁶ the construction of the corporate charters;⁷⁷ and, generally, as to the powers and liabilities of the corporation;⁷⁸ whether act of a corporation in contracting a debt in excess of the statutory limit is void or voidable;⁷⁹ whether to give validity to ultra vires contracts made and to be performed within the states would be contrary to its public policy;⁸⁰ as to right of creditor or person connecting himself with title to assail an unauthorized encumbrance on corporate property;⁸¹ as to dissolution of a corporation;⁸² the validity of conveyances or mortgages made after insolvency;⁸³ whether corporate stock is personal property;⁸⁴ right of corporation to a lien on its stock;⁸⁵ the statutory liability of stockholders;⁸⁶ and of corporate officers,⁸⁷ though it is otherwise as to the common-law liability of stockholders on their unpaid subscriptions.⁸⁸ Generally, and in the absence of any interference with the Federal Constitution or statutes, the Federal courts follow the decisions of the state courts with respect to the validity, under the state Constitution, construction, and effect of statutes in relation to foreign corporations.⁸⁹ It is to be observed, however, that if a contract made by a foreign corporation in violation of such a statute is not for that reason invalid, the Federal court may entertain an action thereon, even though the state court would refuse to do so.^{89a}

Some of the exceptions previously discussed to the general rule that the state court decisions must be followed on statutory questions have, however, occasionally been extended to questions in relation to corporations.⁹⁰ Thus, the question whether the right of action given by the statute against stockholders is in the nature of a specialty has been held to be a general question, as to which the Federal courts are not bound by the decisions of the state court.⁹¹

So it has been declared that the relations between a building and loan association and its stockholders, as such, are governed by the general law, unless modified by the local statute on the subject, and that in those respects the decisions of the highest state court do not control, though the questions which arise when the members become borrowers must be determined by the local law.⁹² And the exception with respect to decisions of the state court rendered after the rights of the parties had accrued has been invoked to re-

And in Evans v. Nellis, 187 U. S. 271, 47 L. ed. 173, 23 Sup. Ct. ⁹¹ Brunswick Terminal Co. v. National Bank, 88 Fed. 607. The point arose in connection with the question whether the liability created by the Georgia statute was barred by the statute of Maryland, the action being brought in a Federal court sitting in that state. The judgment was reversed in Brunswick Terminal Co. v. National Bank, 48 L.R.A. 625, 40 C. C. A. 22, 99 Fed. 635 (certiorari denied in 178 U. S. 611, 44 L. ed. 1215, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1029), upon the ground that the limitation prescribed by the Georgia statute applied.

⁹² Coltrane v. Blake, 51 C. C. A. 457, 113 Fed. 785. In this case it was held that, the loan being regarded as usurious by the local law, the borrowing member was entitled to be credited on his loan with all sums as premium and interest; but it was lieve the Federal court of the duty of following the decisions of the state court, under statutes in relation to corporations.⁹³ And the fact that the state decisions were not based entirely upon the statute, but involved extraneous conditions, has also been held sufficient to relieve the Federal court of the duty of following the state court decisions.⁹⁴ So, while conceding that it is the duty of the Federal courts to follow the construction of state statutes by the state courts, it has been held that the Federal courts are not bound to go beyond the point actually decided and accept the results that might be reached by implication;⁹⁵ and that state decisions rendered under statutes more or less similar, but not under the particular statute involved, while entitled to high respect as authorities, are not controlling upon the Federal courts.⁹⁶ Whether it is contrary to public policy for a Federal court sitting in one state, to enforce the liability of stockholders under the statute of another state, is a question of comity, as to which the Federal court is not bound by the decisions of the state court.⁹⁷

n. Judgments.

The question whether, and to what extent, state laws apply to judgments rendered by the Federal court, is, of course, not within the scope of this section, which presupposes that the state law governs, and merely inquires whether, in ascertaining that law, the decisions of the state court are to be followed by the Federal court. In other words, this subdivision is concerned only with questions in relation to judgments as to which the Federal courts would concededly be bound by an explicit state statute, if there were one.⁹⁸ The United States Supreme Court has declared generally that the question what effect a judgment of a state court shall have as res judicata in a subsequent action in the Federal court is a question of state or local law.⁹⁹ And it has been held that the decisions of the highest state court are binding as to the nature and priority of judgments rendered in the state court;¹⁰⁰ as to whether a cause of action is merged in the judgment;¹ the effect and conclusiveness of a judgment in assumed that so far as payments on his stock were concerned, he must be placed on an equality with the nonborrowing members, and that this would be true whatever the local rule on the subject would be, although, as a matter of fact, the local rule on this subject seems to have been the same as the Federal rule.

S. 386, 48 L. ed. 491, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 314 (liability of stockholders. The fact that the state decision was rendered by a divided court, and was subsequently doubted by the court which rendered it, was also mentioned); *Meador Furniture Co. v. Commercial Nat. The extraneous condition referred to was found in the fact that the state court did not rely wholly upon the statute as creating the lien, but partly upon the terms of the consolidation agreement.

ejectment; ³ the lien of a judgment; ⁴ right to relief from a judgment on the ground of fraud, mistake, or irregularity.⁴ But the rule that state decisions with reference to judgments are to be followed by the Federal courts has been held subject, even in case of a decision under statutes, to an exception, where they were rendered after the right of the parties had accrued; ⁵ or where the state decision was not deduced from the language of the statute, and does not place definite construction thereon, but rests upon general principles of law.⁶ And it has been held that the question of presumptions attending a judgment, except so far as it may be affected by state statutes or decisions thereunder, is one of general law, as to which the decisions of the state court, though entitled to respect, are not binding.⁷

The following cases, holding that a decree of a Federal court is a lien in all cases where it is so by the law of the state, do not appear to have involved any consideration of the state decisions construing the local statutes in this respect; but the implication is that the Federal courts would adopt the decisions of the state court construing the state statutes on that subject as well as the statutes themselves: Ward v. Chamberlain, 2 Black, 430, 17 L. ed. 319; Brown v. Pierce, 7 Wall. 205, 19 L. ed. 134; Baker v. Morton, 12 Wall. 150, 20 L. ed. 262.

c. Attachment; execution; judicial sales.

The decisions of the highest state court as to the construction and effect of the attachment laws are in general binding upon the Federal courts; ⁸ and the rule has been specifically applied to decisions under statutory provisions in relation to attachment bonds,⁹ including the question of measure of damages in action on such a bond; ¹⁰ as to the right of intervention in attachment proceedings; ¹¹ the applicability of a statute with reference to allowances to a garnishee.¹² And the Federal courts are bound to follow the decisions of the highest state court as to the right to permit an amendment of an execution by affixing a seal after a sale therein, and as to the validity of a sale without a seal; ¹³ as to the right of redemption from the sale; ¹⁴ bate court, even when made without jurisdiction of the particular state in question, cannot be attacked collaterally, could be considered as construing the statute law of the state, the Federal courts would be bound by them. It was held, however, that the state decisions in question were not so intended.

⁸ In the early case of Beach v. Viles, 2 Pet. 675, 7 L. ed. 559, the court states that the construction of such a statute by the state courts is entitled to great respect, and ought, in conformity to the uniform practice of this court, to govern its decisions.

p. Debtors' exemptions.

In cases where the state statutes relating to debtors' exemptions are themselves binding upon the Federal court,—and the present note is concerned only with cases in which that is assumed,—the Federal courts uniformly follow the decisions of the highest state court construing such statutes. The provision of the Federal bankruptcy act allowing the exemptions prescribed by the state laws has furnished the occasion for many of these decisions. The rule that the decisions of the state court will be followed has been applied specifically to the question whether the statute embraces trust of real estate;¹⁶ the character of property which may be the subject of a homestead exemption;¹⁷ the right to a reasonable time to convert unimproved land into improved land subject to the homestead exemption;¹⁸ the effect of knowledge of insolvency and contemplation of bankruptcy on homestead exemption;¹⁹ whether growing crops are within the exemption extended by homestead act;²⁰ the effect of a conveyance to wife upon a homestead exemption;²¹ the right of a married woman who holds the title to the property, to the exemption as against her own creditors, under the homestead statute;²² forfeiture of the exemption on the ground of fraud in concealing the property from creditors;²³ partner's right to individual exemption out of partnership assets;²⁴ the character of proceedings against which the exemption is available;²⁵ and the question whether the mortgaging or conveying exempt property to a creditor is against the public policy of the state.²⁶

q. Torts.

1. Negligence and contributory negligence generally.

As shown more in detail in the next subdivision, questions relating to negligence causing personal injuries are, in the absence of statute, usually regarded as questions of general law, as to which the Federal courts are not concluded by the decisions of the state courts. This rule would seem clearly applicable to a general question like that whether the negligence of a parent is imputable to a child, though the decisions disclose a conflict on the point.²⁷ The rule was but a single decision, and that appeared to have been made under a misapprehension of the provisions of the statute.

But see Waples v. United States, 110 U. S. 630, 28 L. ed. 272, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 225, holding that the title to property sold under judicial process is not warranted by the party obtaining the judgment, and that any different rule prevailing on that subject in a state by statute cannot change the position of the United States courts with respect to judicial sales in proceedings instituted by them.

²² Richardson v. Woodward, 44 C. C. A. 235, 104 Fed. 873. The duty to follow the decision of the state court on this question, if there had been any, was expressly recognized. But in the absence of any decision by the state court on the specific point, the Federal court solved the question by applying L.R.A. (N.S.) ing the general established rule of construction.

²⁶ Re National Grocer Co. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 982, 104 C. C. A. 47, 181 Fed. 33.

But the contrary position was taken by Shiras, J., in Kowalski v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 84 Fed. 586. He said: "The great desirability of securing uniformity in the rulings of courts acting within the same territorial limit is self-apparent, and therefore in matters which are purely domestic, and which are not affected by any provision of the Constitution or laws of the United States, or which do not pertain to the general commercial law of the country, or other matters within the legislative control of Congress, the rule adopted by the supreme court of the state wherein the cause of action arises should be followed by the Federal court, acting within the state." This position seems to be clearly against the Baugh Case and other cases cited in the next subdivision. And it will be observed that the language quoted places a much narrower restriction upon the right has been applied to the doctrine of the "Turntable Cases," though with an intimation that a settled line of decisions by the state court on the point might be controlling;²⁸ to the liability of an abutting owner who lets work on the street to a contractor;²⁹ and the liability of the lessor railroad company for negligence of the lessee.³⁰ So the doctrine of the Federal courts that contributory negligence is an affirmative defense which must be established by a preponderance of the evidence is not affected by a different common-law rule in the state where the action arises.³¹

The decisions of the state court construing a statute to prevent contributory negligence from being a complete bar to an action under the statute are binding upon the Federal courts, if they grow out of the language of the statute, but it is otherwise if the statute is held to be declaratory merely of the common law, both in its requirements and in the liability imposed for failure to observe it.³² And it has been held that the opinion of a state court as to the construction of a statute in relation to the duty of railroads to maintain a lookout is authoritative only to the extent of the precise question decided, and no farther.³³

The attitude of the Federal courts towards the decisions of the state courts on other questions of negligence is shown in the succeeding subdivisions.

2. Master and servant.

(a) At common law.

The relations of master and servant and their relative rights and duties are, in the absence of statute, regarded as questions of general law, as to which the Federal courts will follow their own independent judgment, irrespective of the decision of the state court. This has been specifically applied to the duty of the master to furnish proper appliances;³⁴ the question whether the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies as between master and servant;³⁵ as to negligence toward, and the contributory negligence of, minor employee;³⁶ delegation of duty;³⁷ the duty to employ competent fellow servants;³⁸ and the entire subject of fellow servants, including the question who of the Federal courts to determine questions of general law for themselves, than is now sustained by the cases as a whole.

The decision in the Kowalski Case was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals (34 C. C. A. 1, 92 Fed. 310), but the latter court seems to have disposed of the question of imputed negligence as an independent question, merely mentioning the decision of the court of the state in which the case arose in connection with decisions from other jurisdictions on the question.

²⁸ SNARE & T. Co. v. FRIEDMAN, certiorari denied in 214 U. S. 518, 53 L. ed. 1065, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 700. The state court had repudiated the turntable doctrine in a case growing out of the same state of facts as that involved in the Federal case (Friedman v. Snare & T. Co. 71 N. J. L. 605, 70 L.R.A. 147, 108 Am. St. Rep. 764, 61 Atl. 401, 2 Ann. Cas. 497), though the judgment of the state court was not res judicata.

decisions of the state court that contributory negligence is not a complete defense to an action were based upon the Tennessee statute, and grew out of the language of the statute, they were held binding upon the Federal court.

So, in Rogers v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 69 C. C. A. 321, 136 Fed. 573, state decisions construing the Tennessee statute to give damages notwithstanding contributory negligence were followed by the Federal court. See infra IV. q. 2 (b) notes 53, 54.

A. 563, 131 Fed. 705, holding that a decision of a Tennessee court against a railroad company, upon the ground that by running its engine backward at night without a headlight it disabled itself from complying with a part of the statute requiring an effective lookout, could not be regarded as an authoritative decision that the statute is violated when an engine is run backwards, irrespective of whether the company is thereby disabled from maintaining an effective lookout, although there were general expressions in the opinion to that effect.

are fellow servants; ³⁹ to what acts the rule applies; ⁴⁰ and the applicability of the rule as affected by continued carelessness upon the part of the fellow servant.⁴¹

(b) Under statutes in relation to master and servant.

Ordinarily, as shown in the last subdivision, common-law questions as to the relation of master and servant, and the liability of the former for injuries sustained by the latter in the course of the employment, are regarded as questions of general law, as to which the decisions of the state courts are not controlling upon the Federal courts. When, however, the subject is regulated by a state statute, the decisions of the highest court of the state on questions arising under the statute are controlling upon the Federal courts. At least this is true of decisions that may be fairly regarded as construing the statute.

Thus, the decisions of the highest state court are binding on the Federal court as to questions concerning notice, under a state employer's liability act; ⁴² the validity, under the state Constitution, of a statute precluding the acceptance of benefits from a relief department as a defense to an action for damages; ⁴³ or a statute modifying the fellow servant rule.⁴⁴ So decisions of the state court will be followed as to the construction of a statutory provision respecting the liability of a master for injuries due to the negligence of a person intrusted with superintendence; ⁴⁵ whether the liability in such case is based upon statute and is independent of contract; ⁴⁶ the effect of violation of a statute by the person injured.⁴⁷

As shown in the previous subdivision, the Federal courts, in the absence of a statute on the subject, reserve the right to determine for themselves the questions arising in connection with the common-law rule as to fellow servants, but when that rule has become the subject of constitutional or statutory provisions, those courts generally follow the decisions of the state court as to the construction and effect of such provisions.⁴⁸ This rule has been specifically applied to the question what classes of employers are within the operation of a statute modifying or abolishing the fellow servant rule;⁴⁹ its applicability to employees of a receiver operating a railroad under direction of a court of equity.⁵⁰ So it has even been held that the decisions of the state court are binding as to who are fellow servants, within a statute declaring that the employer is not bound to indemnify his employee for loss suffered in consequence of the negligence of another person employed by the same employer in the general business, unless he has neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of the culpable employee.⁵¹ As such a statute is merely declaratory of the common law, and does not profess to deal with the question who are fellow servants, it may be doubted whether state decisions under it should not be regarded as falling within exceptions discussed in other subdivisions.⁵² The same doubt arises as to decisions of the state court as to whether the defense of assumed risk is impliedly excluded by statutes which impose certain duties upon the master, but do not deal expressly with such defense. In many of the Federal cases in which this question has arisen, the court has disposed of it as though it were a question for the independent judgment of the Federal court, without, however, expressly passing on that point.⁵³ It has, however, been expressly held that Federal courts are bound by the decision of the highest state court on this subject.⁵⁴

The question whether the Federal courts are bound by the decisions of the state courts on common-law questions in relation to master and servant, when they arise in a statutory action for death, is discussed in the next subdivision.

tion of a state statute as affixed to it by the state court of last resort will not be disregarded by the United States Supreme Court, and a different construction given to the statute, which will make it repugnant to the Federal Constitution.

⁴⁹ Kibbe v. Stevenson Iron Min. Co. 69 C. C. A. 145, 136 Fed. 147; United States Leather Co. v. Howell, 80 C. C. A. 674, 151 Fed. 444; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Farmer, 100 C. C. A. 244, 176 Fed. 692.

⁵¹ Northern P. R. Co. v. Hogan, 11 C. C. A. 51, 27 U. S. App. 184, 63 Fed. 102. Thayer, D. J., writing for the court, said: "Indeed, it would lead to intolerable results, which will be readily apprehended, if the Federal courts should either deny the authority of such statutes, or refuse to enforce them according to the interpretation placed thereon by the courts of the state, particularly by its court of last resort. . . . It is the statute, however, and not the common law, which is now in force in the state of North Dakota; and it is the statute, as construed by the highest court of that state, which must determine the rights of the parties, and control the decision in the case at bar."

And in Northern P. R. Co. v. Hambly, 154 U. S. 349, 38 L. ed. 1009, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 983, involving a similar statute, the court seems to have assumed that the decision of a state court on the question as to who were fellow servants within the statute would be controlling, though as a matter of fact the decision involved was rendered by the supreme court of the territory, and the court said: "While this construction given by the supreme court of a territory is not obligatory upon this court, it is certainly entitled to respectful consideration, and in a doubtful case might well be accepted as turning the scale in favor of the doctrine there announced. . . . We may safely assume that the construction thus given to this statute will not be overruled by the courts of the two states which have succeeded the supreme court of the territory, without most cogent reasons for their action."

A. 220, 51 U. S. App. 74, 79 Fed. 900, and Chicago-Coulterville Coal Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. 130 Fed. 957, the courts, without expressly declaring that the Federal courts were bound by the construction placed upon the statute by the highest court of the state, allude to such construction as though it were conclusive.

In Welsh v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 93 C. C. A. 101, 167 Fed. 465, the court expressly said that the question was one of the construction of a state statute, and its effect upon the common-law rule, and expressed its dissent to the assumption in St. Louis Cordage Co. v. Miller, 63 L.R.A. 551, 61 C. C. A. 477, 126 Fed. 495, that the question was one of general law, to be determined upon general principles. The Oregon statute in question in the Welsh Case having been adopted from Washington, the construction placed upon it by the supreme court of the latter state was held binding by the Federal court.

In Federal Lead Co. v. Swyers, 88 C. C. A. 547, 161 Fed. 689, refusing to follow a

3. Statutory action for death.

The decisions of the highest state court upon questions distinctive of a statute giving a right of action for a negligent homicide are binding upon the Federal courts;⁵⁵ and the doctrine has been specifically declared with respect to the question whether the statute creates a new cause of action, or transmits an existing cause of action;⁵⁶ whether the provision of the statute in relation to notice creates a condition precedent or subsequent;⁵⁷ whether a nonresident alien is within the benefit of the statute;⁵⁸ the question of damages;^{58a} including the right to exemplary damages;⁵⁹ and the right to compensation for pain and suffering;⁶⁰ the question whether a husband is the "next of kin" of the wife, within the provision defining the beneficiaries.⁶¹ The character of the statute, however, as penal or otherwise, so far as it affects the jurisdiction of the Federal court, is to be determined by that court for itself, unaffected by the decisions of the state court.⁶² Of course, even when a question distinctive of the statute is involved, the Federal court must determine the question for itself, if it has not been settled by the decisions of the highest state court.⁶³

State court decisions are not conclusive upon the Federal courts as to questions which, though arising in a statutory action for death, are not distinctive or peculiar to that character of actions, but pertain equally to the common-law action for negligent injury. Thus, it has been held that the question as to who are fellow servants, though arising in a statutory action for the death of an employee, is a general question, to be determined by the Federal court for itself, whether the state statute be regarded as creating a new right of action, or as simply abrogating the common-law rule by which actions for personal injuries are extinguished by death.^{63a} And it has decision of a state intermediate appellate court, it seems to have been assumed that a decision of the highest court of the state on the subject would have been binding.

Lehigh & W. Coal Co.* 174 Fed. 886. In the former case the court said that the theory that the state decisions did not construe a statute, but enunciated a supposed policy of law, was ingenious, but unsound, and that whether the limitation of the statute was or was not founded on considerations of public policy was unimportant, as in any event the decisions were interpreting, and put a construction upon, the statute. (But see supra, III. e.) Cases like Maiorano v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 213 U. S. 268, 53 L. ed. 792, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 424, holding the same on writ of error to the state court, are, for reason stated in the scope note, not in point.

The Federal court, however, ought to lean toward the decisions of the state court on this point. Perkins v. Boston & A. R. Co. supra. And see Lyman v. Boston & A. R. Co. 70 Fed. 409.

^{63a} Elliott v. Felton, 56 C. C. A. 74, 119 Fed. 270, Lurton, J., speaking for the court, said that the state court not having made the statute the basis of any decision as to the liability of an employer for an injury to one servant by the negligence of another, been held that the Federal rule which places the burden of proof of contributory negligence upon the defendant applies to an action for death under a state statute, irrespective of the decisions of the state court on that point.⁶⁴

r. License; intoxicating liquor.

In the absence of any conflict with the Federal Constitution or statutes, it has been held that a decision of the highest state court will be followed as to the validity, under the state laws, of a license ordinance adopted by a board of county supervisors,⁶⁵ or ordinances respecting the traffic in intoxicating liquors.⁶⁶ Cases involving the question whether state statutes or ordinances on these subjects are in violation of the Federal Constitution or statutes are, of course, not in point.

s. Public bodies; municipal corporations.

The character and extent of the powers and liabilities of the political bodies or municipal corporations of a state are in general questions of local law, as to which the decisions of the supreme court of the state which creates those bodies are authoritative in the Federal courts.⁶⁷ In a case involving the validity of a statute providing for the organization of irrigation districts, the United States Supreme Court, while declaring it to be the duty of the Federal courts to decide for themselves whether the statute was in violation of the Federal Constitution, said that it would not be justified in holding the act to be in violation of the state Constitution in face of fair and repeated decisions of the highest court of the state to the contrary, under the pretext that it was deciding principles of general constitutional law.⁶⁸ So, in an early case it was remarked that if the state of Georgia had practically settled the limits of a certain county, such settlement ought to have been conclusive upon the circuit court.⁶⁹ So, it has been held that state decisions will be followed as to the authority of a public board;⁷⁰ and as to the contracts of counties or school districts.⁷¹ And the Federal courts uniformly follow the decision of the state courts construing constitutional or statutory provisions in relation to municipal corporations; and this rule has been applied to questions concerning the dissolution of municipalities;⁷² municipal boundaries;⁷³ the construction and effect of statutes providing for the destruction of property to prevent fire;⁷⁴ the authority of a city under its charter to order the destruction of liquor, and its liability for the liquor destroyed thereunder;⁷⁵ the validity of an ordinance prohibiting erection of bill boards;⁷⁶ power to encourage the establishment of private manufacturing establishments;⁷⁷ and gen-there was no basis for the suggestion that the legislature, when enacting the survival statute, intended to adopt the law as declared by the existing decisions of the state court, as a statutory rule of liability where death resulted from the wrongful act.

erally as to the power to incur indebtedness and make contracts.⁷⁸ But it has been held that while a Federal court is bound by the construction placed by the highest state court upon a constitutional provision limiting municipal indebtedness, it is not bound by a decision of that court as to whether a particular proposed contract and issue of bonds will violate the provisions of the Constitution thus construed;⁷⁹ and that state decisions upon the validity of contracts that rest upon general principles or upon evidential value of certain facts, and not upon the construction of a local statute, are not binding upon the Federal court.⁸⁰ And it has been declared that a decision of the state court, whether regarded as construction of the state Constitution or as relating to a question of general law, defining the word "debt," is not binding upon the Federal court, unless in plain harmony with the language of the Constitution or the settled judicial construction thereof existing at the time the contract was entered into. This, however, was perhaps intended to be limited to cases involving a question under the Federal Constitution, in which event, for reasons previously explained, it is not within the scope of the note.⁸¹ It has also been held that the decision of the highest state court, that the remedy by mandamus to enforce a warrant issued by a municipality is exclusive of an action, does not prevent an action in the Federal courts.^{81a}

The questions of municipal liability for defects or obstructions in the street,⁸² and liability for the torts of officers or employees,⁸³ though not involving any specific statute, and turning upon the distinction between governmental and private functions, have been regarded as local questions, as to which the decisions of the state courts are controlling. And this, of course, is true, a fortiori, if the decisions of the state court rest upon a statute.⁸⁴

t. Public service corporations.

Assuming that there is no question under the Federal Constitution or statutes, the decisions of the highest state court are in general binding upon the Federal court as to the validity, under the state Constitution, of statutes in relation to public service corporations;⁸⁵ and as to the construction of

City Water Supply Co. v. Ottumwa, 120 Fed. 309. See, further, as to this exception supra, III. f.

⁸⁰ Mankato v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 73 C. C. A. 439, 142 Fed. 329. The court said: "In so far as it [the decision of the state court] construes a local law, the charter of the city of Mankato, under certain condition of facts, it is [finding]. This is settled by abundant authority, but in so far as it expresses the opinion of the state court on general principles of the law of contract, or on the evidential value of facts, it clearly is not. As to such question, it is not only the privilege, but the duty, of this court, which it owes to suitors entitled to invoke its jurisdiction, to exercise its independent judgment." Another reason for holding that the state decision, even if it were to be regarded as a construction of a local law, was not of controlling authority, was found in the fact that the decision in question was rendered upon the very contract in question, and after the rights of the parties had accrued.

In San Jose-Los Gatos Interurban R. Co. v. San Jose R. Co. 84 C. C. A. 265, 156 Fed. 455, 13 Ann. Cas. 571, however, the Federal court declined to follow a state decision as to the construction of a contract with reference to the right such statutes.⁸⁶ The rule, however, is subject to the exception with reference to decisions rendered after the rights of parties have accrued.⁸⁷

u. Monopolies.

A Federal court, though not bound by a decision of an intermediate state appellate court as to the construction and effect of a state statute with respect to monopolies in restraint of trade, is bound to follow the decision of the highest state court, if it does not come in conflict with the Federal Constitution or statute.⁸⁸

uu. Eminent domain.

Many of the judicial declarations as to the duty of the Federal court to abide by the decisions of the state courts on questions in relation to eminent domain are to be found in cases that came before the Federal Supreme Court on writ of error to the state court, and the cases therefore presented either a question under the Federal Constitution, or a question of state law, not open to review by the Federal court at all, and for the reasons explained in the scope of of different lines of street railway to use the same street, which depended upon the opinion of one judge not concurred in by a majority.

The duty to follow the decisions of the state court when applicable to the question under consideration was also recognized in Wiemer v. Louisville Water Co. 130 Fed. 251, but it was held that the decision relied on was not applicable to the question before the Federal court.

And in Seccomb v. Wursters, 83 Fed. 856, the court, in determining a motion for a preliminary injunction, followed a decision of an intermediate state appellate court construing a statute limiting the period for which a street franchise may be granted, though the question had not been settled by the state court of last resort.

There are many other Federal cases which have declared the duty of the Federal courts to follow the state decisions on such points, which are not within the scope of the note, because they came up on writ of error to the state court, or at all events involved a question arising under the Federal Constitution.

But it has been held, in cases originating in the lower Federal courts, and presenting no question under the Federal Constitution or statutes, that the decisions of the highest state court are to be followed as to the liability of a municipality for damage to lateral support by a public improvement; ⁹⁰ as to character or extent of interest acquired in condemnation proceedings; ⁹¹ whether benefits may be considered in assessing damages; ⁹² what constitutes damage within a state Constitution declaring that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without compensation.^{93a}

v. Taxes.

The United States has declared, generally, that the determination of all questions arising under the tax laws is a matter primarily belonging to the state courts, and the national tribunals universally follow their ruling, except in cases where it is claimed that some right protected by the Federal Constitution has been invaded.⁹³

In National Cotton Oil Co. v. Texas, 197 U. S. 115, 49 L. ed. 689, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379, it is held that the construction given by the state courts to a state statute, as removing the discriminatory features of a prior anti-trust law, is conclusive upon the Federal Supreme Court in determining, on writ of error to the state court, whether such statute denies the equal protection of the law. This case, however, is not within the scope of the note.

In an early case, the United States Supreme Court said: "There can be no class of laws more strictly local in their charac-

This rule has been applied to a question as general in its nature as that whether railroad aid is a "corporate purpose" for which taxes may be raised;^{93a} but, on the other hand, it has been held that the question what is a public use for which taxes may be raised is a question as to which the Federal courts are not bound by the decisions of the highest state courts.⁹⁴

The rule that the decisions of the state court are controlling has been applied to the validity, under the state Constitution, of a statute imposing certain charges upon foreign insurance company for the benefit of municipalities;^{95a} to the question what property is within the jurisdiction for purposes of taxation, assuming that there is no question under the Federal Constitution;⁹⁵ and generally as to questions under state Constitution or statutes in relation to taxation of foreign corporations;⁹⁶ whether a taxing statute ter, and which more directly concern real property, than these [tax laws]. They not only constitute a rule of property, but their construction by the courts of the state should be followed by the courts of the United States with equal, if not with greater, strictness than the construction of any other class of laws." Games v. Stiles, 14 Pet. 322, 10 L. ed. 476.

Nor does the fact that the decision of the state supreme court sustaining the constitutionality of a state statute was contained in a prepared case, which did not involve a genuine controversy, prevent the Federal court from following it. Adams Exp. Co. v. Ohio State Auditor, 165 U. S. 194, 41 L. ed. 683, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 305.

And the decision of the state court holding that the statute is not in violation of the state Constitution, rendered before final judgment in the action in the Federal court, should be followed by that court notwithstanding that the Federal court had previously held otherwise upon a demurrer. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Poe, 64 Fed. 9 (opinion by Taft, J.); Sandford v. Poe, 60 L.R.A. 641, 16 C. C. A. 305, 37 U. S. App. 378, 69 Fed. 546 (opinion by Lurton, J.). In Adams Exp. Co. v. Ohio State Auditor, 165 U. S. 194, 41 L. ed. 683, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 305, affirming the last two decisions, it was also held that the decision of the state court was binding, though the Supreme Court did not allude to the previous holding of the Federal court on demurrer. But it has been held that a decree of the Federal court will not be reversed on a bill of review because of a subsequent decision of the state courts at variance with the decision of the Federal court as to the constitutionality of a taxing statute, where the point had not been decided by the state court at the time of the Federal decision. King v. Dundee Mortg. & Trust Invest. Co. 28 Fed. 33.

In Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Wright, 164 U. S. 327, 41 L. ed. 454, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 80, the United States Supreme Court refused to accept as controlling the headnote of a Georgia case construing a taxing statute, upon the ground that it was not borne out by an examination of the case, and was not concurred in by a majority of the judges, although they agreed in the result.

There are many cases in the Federal Supreme Court declaring that the state court decisions with reference to taxation are to be followed or are conclusive, that are not within the scope of this note, for the reason 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that they came up on error to the state court, and the point was really that the question was concluded by the decision of the state court in the same case, and was not before the Federal court at all, rather than that such decisions would be binding as to a question to be passed upon by the Federal court in the exercise of their concurrent jurisdiction with the state courts, though the latter would doubtless have been true of most of the questions involved. See, as illustrations of this class of cases, though they are by no means complete, Adams v. Nashville, 95 U. S. 19, 24 L. ed. 369; Lane County v. Oregon, 7 Wall. 71, 19 L. ed. 101; Erie R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 Wall. 492, 22 L. ed. 595; New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 158 U. S. 431, 39 L. ed. 1043, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 896; First Nat. Bank v. Ayers, 160 U. S. 660, 40 L. ed. 573, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 412; First Nat. Bank v. Chehalis County, 166 U. S. 440, 41 L. ed. 1069, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 629; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Chambers, 182 U. S. 556, 45 L. ed. 1227, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 863; Brown-Forman Co. v. Kentucky, 217 U. S. 563, 54 L. ed. 883, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 578, affirming 125 Ky. 402, 101 S. W. 321.

Cases whether originating in the Federal courts, or brought to the Federal Supreme Court on writ of error to the state court, holding that the state court decisions are, of course, not controlling, are not included, if the ground of the Federal court's decision on the point is that the question involved, either because of its own nature or because of its association, presented a question under the Federal Constitution.

^{93a} Weightman v. Clark, 103 U. S. 256, 26 L. ed. 392. The court said in this case that the construction which the highest court of a state has given to a state statute will be treated as part of the statute itself, except when, by giving such construction a retroactive effect, it will invalidate the contract lawfully made. But see next case.

Of course, the question whether the exemption is in fact repealable may present a question under the Federal Constitution, as to which the decisions of the state court are not controlling,—a point not within the scope of the note. But see, for illustration, Shelby County v. Union & Planters' Bank, 161 U. S. 149, 40 L. ed. 650, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 558.

(The question never having been decided by the state court, but being then before that court, the Federal court decided to await the decision of the state court, and said it would abide by the construction placed by it upon the statute in question.)

⁸ American Sugar Ref. Co. v. New Orleans, supra. The circuit court of appeals expressly said that, even it did not agree with the conclusion, it would be bound to follow the latest state decision, which was in favor of the exemption, though it required the reversal of the decision of the

the state court control upon the question whether notice to the taxpayer is a condition of the right of the board of equalization to increase the assessment;⁹ whether the method and basis of assessment are in conformity with the state Constitution or statutes;¹⁰ the sufficiency of the description of land in an assessment roll;¹¹ the duty to levy a special tax to satisfy a judgment;¹² whether defects in proceedings for sale of land for nonpayment of taxes rendered them void;¹³ the requisites of a judgment for taxes;¹⁴ whether a judgment by default in a tax sale proceeding may be impeached collaterally by the taxpayer;¹⁵ the validity of tax sale when part of the tax was illegal;¹⁶ or the omission to pay was due to an excusable mistake;¹⁷ the necessity of showing full compliance with the tax statutes in order to sustain a tax title;¹⁸ or as a condition of the admission of a tax deed in evidence;¹⁹ the validity of tax deeds where the description was insufficient;²⁰ and generally as to questions

under state Constitution or statute in relation to limitation as affecting tax titles;²¹ and the necessity of reimbursing the holder of the tax title as a condition of recovering the land.²²

So, in general, and in the absence of any Federal question, the decisions of the state court are controlling as to assessments for local improvements;²³ though this, of course, subject to the general exception elsewhere pointed out, as to a change of decision in the state courts after the rights have accrued.²⁴

vv. Courts.

The decisions of the highest court of a state as to the validity, under the state Constitution, and the construction and effect of statutes in relation to the state courts, are binding upon the Federal courts.²⁵ But the Federal courts are not bound by decisions of the highest state court so far as they affect the jurisdiction

Federal court rendered in reliance upon earlier state court decisions. The last state decision, though rendered between the parties to the Federal action, does not seem to have been regarded as res judicata.

In the O'Brien Case, the court followed the decisions of the state court holding unconstitutional a statute under which the assessments were made, notwithstanding that they were rendered after the rights of the parties had accrued, it appearing that the principle applied by the state courts had been established in earlier decisions, though the latter were not with reference to the same statute.

²⁴ Thus, in Loeb v. Columbia Twp. 179 U. S. 472, 45 L. ed. 280, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174, the Supreme Court refused to follow decisions of the state court, rendered after the assessments had been made and the rights had accrued, holding the statute under which the improvements were made unconstitutional, such decisions being contrary to the earlier state decisions. This was also the position taken in the circuit court in this case (91 Fed. 37). But see O'Brien v. Wheelock, supra, note 23.

So, it is the duty to follow a decision of the state appellate court as to its own jurisdiction, when not plainly in conflict with the decisions of the supreme court of the state. Re Gilligan, 81 C. C. A. 595, 152 Fed. 605, certiorari denied in 206 U. S. 563, 51 L. ed. 1190, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 796.

So, it is declared in Freeport Water Co. v. Freeport, 180 U. S. 587, 45 L. ed. 679, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493, that the question as to what functions the circuit court of a state may have is a matter of state law, of the Federal courts,²⁶ though even in such case they will "lean" towards the decisions of the state court.²⁷

w. Equity.

The provisions of the judiciary act,²⁷ which declared that the laws of the several states should be regarded as rules of decision, were expressly limited to trials at common law. And since the equity jurisdiction of the Federal courts is the same as that which the high court of chancery in England possesses, and is subject to neither limitation nor restraint by state legislation,²⁸ there are comparatively few cases involving equity jurisprudence or practice, at least with the exception of questions of evidence, that present the distinctive question under consideration, as to when the Federal courts are bound to follow the decisions of the state court, since, as stated at the beginning of the note, that question presupposes that an exclusive state statute in relation to the point under investigation would be controlling upon the Federal courts as well as the state courts, and is concerned only with the inquiry whether the decisions of the state court are binding upon the Federal courts in determining the law of the state on a point concededly within its province, but which does not happen to be covered by the explicit terms of a state statute.²⁹ But while the equity jurisdiction of the Federal court cannot be impaired by state statutes or decisions, a Federal court may enforce new rights created or remedies provided by state statutes.³⁰ And in such cases the question may arise whether the Federal court is bound to follow the decisions of the state court construing or interpreting such a statute. Doubtless, if the particular equitable question presented is one to which the Federal court would, under the principle just stated, apply an on which the decisions of the state courts will be followed by the Federal court. This, however, was a case which came up on error to the state court, and is therefore not strictly in point.

In Neves v. Scott, 13 How. 268, 14 L. ed. 140, the court, speaking with reference to the decision of questions arising in the exercise of the equitable jurisdiction of the court, said: "The Constitution provides that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in equity arising between citizens of different states.

Wherever a case in equity may arise and be determined under the judicial power of the United States, the same principles of equity must be applied to it, and it is for the courts of the United States, 40 L.R.A., (N.S.)

and for this court in the last resort, to decide what those principles are, and to apply such of them to each particular case, as they may find justly applicable thereto. These principles may make part of the law of a state, or they may have been modified by its legislation or usages, or they may never have existed in its jurisprudence. Instances of each kind may now be found in the several states. But in all the states the equity law recognized by the Constitution and by acts of Congress, and modified by the latter, is administered by the courts of the United States, and upon appeal by this court."

But where the constitutional laws of a state, which govern the descent, alienation, and transfer of real property and constituting rules of property, conflict with the practice of a national court in equity, the former prevails; and where there is no conflict, both are in force. Childs v. Ferguson, 104 C. C. A. 305, 181 Fed. 795.

explicit provision of the state statute, it will follow the decisions of the highest state court construing or interpreting a statute that is not explicit, but is susceptible of construction, subject to such exceptions as attach to the general rule of following state decisions upon statutory questions.⁸¹ And so it has been held that the decisions of the highest court of the state, that under its statute a bill to remove a cloud on title may be maintained by one out of possession who relies solely on his legal title, are controlling upon the Federal courts, the statute itself being an enlargement of an equitable right which the Federal courts are competent to administer.⁸² But it has also been held that decisions of the state court on this point are not controlling where they were not based on a local statute, but represent a mere variation of a general principle of equity.⁸³ It has also been held that the enforceability in equity of a lien, for the enforcement of which there is no special statutory provision, is a matter as to which the Federal courts will recognize the practice of the state court as expressive of the local law.⁸⁴

vv. Evidence; witnesses.

The provision of 34th section of the judiciary act,⁸⁵ that the laws of the several states, with the exception there stated, shall be regarded as rules of decisions at common law in the courts of the United States, included rules of evidence prescribed by the laws of the states, in cases where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States did not otherwise provide.⁸⁶ And by a later statute it was prescribed that, with certain exceptions, the laws of the state in which the court is held shall be rules of decision as to competency of witnesses in equity and admiralty causes as well as in trials at common law.⁸⁷

Since, as stated at the beginning of the note, the subject under annotation is merely the duty of the Federal courts to follow the decisions of the highest state court on questions within the province of the state, and as to which an explicit state statute would concededly bind the Federal as well as the state courts, there are many cases holding that certain state statutes in relation to matters of evidence and competency of witnesses are binding upon the Federal courts,⁸⁸ as well as cases holding that other state statutes are not binding, because the point in question is the subject of congressional legislation,⁸⁹ or because the provision does not apply to criminal actions,⁴⁰ that are not within the scope of the note. And even when the decision of the Federal court is in the form of a refusal to follow the decisions of the state court, it is of no value on the distinctive subject under annotation if it really rests upon the ground that the point in question is governed by a Federal statute, or for other reasons is beyond the province of the state law so far as the Federal courts are concerned, so that even an explicit state statute would not be binding upon them.⁴¹

The same reason excludes many other decisions in which the Federal courts sitting in equity have enforced or administered remedies created by the state statute.

Assuming then that an explicit state statute on a particular question of evidence or competency of witnesses would be controlling upon the Federal court, it would seem, speaking generally, that decisions of the highest state court construing such statute must be equally conclusive and binding. It has been so held in respect of decisions of state courts construing statutes in relation to the admission of real property records;⁴² statutes in relation to proof of foreign law;⁴³ statutes in relation to the competency of witnesses;⁴⁴ and statutes excluding application for insurance when a copy is not attached to the policy.⁴⁵

The weight of authority upon the specific point seems to be that in civil actions at law the Federal courts will follow the decisions of the highest state court as to the rules of evidence, whether they are based upon the statute or upon the rules of the common law.⁴⁶ And so the decisions of the highest court of the state have been followed by the Federal courts as to the admissibility

⁴⁰ See, for example, Logan v. United States, 144 U. S. 263, 36 L. ed. 429, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617; Hanley v. United States, 123 Fed. 849, overruled on rehearing on another ground in 62 C. C. ⁴¹ Such a case is Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. ed. 251. The court there refused to follow state decisions as to admissibility of confidential communications made to professional advisers, and remarked that an examination of the state statute rendered it doubtful whether the law was in accordance with the contention that such evidence was admissible; but that in any event the lower court did right to exclude the testimony for the reason that the laws of the state are to be regarded as rules of decision in the Federal court only where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States have not otherwise provided, and that the point in question was covered by the act of Congress in relation to the competency of parties as witnesses. It is obvious that so far as the decision rests on the latter ground, it would be no authority on a question not covered by a Federal statute and concededly within the province of the state law even as applied to Federal courts.

⁴⁶ Thus, in actions at law the courts of the United States administer the rules of evidence as they find them administered in the state courts. Thompson v. Central Ohio R. Co. 6 Wall. 134, 18 L. ed. 765.

And in Ex parte Fisk, 113 U. S. 713, 28 L. ed. 1117, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 724, it is said: "It has often been decided in this court that, in actions at law in the courts of the United States, the rules of evidence and the law of evidence generally of the states prevail in those courts." The rule was not applied in that case, however, as the state statute and the decisions thereunder were in conflict with a Federal statute on the same subject. This was quoted with apparent approval in Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co. 125 U. S. 555, 31 L. ed. 795, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 974.

So, the court in Gormley v. Clark, 134 U. S. 338, 33 L. ed. 909, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 554, declares generally that decisions of the state court will be in regard to rules of evidence in actions at law.

And in Nashua Sav. Bank v. Anglo-American Land, Mortg. & Agency Co. 189 U. S. 222, 47 L. ed. 783, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 517, the court declared generally that the "laws of the several states" with respect to evidence, within the meaning of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 721, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 581, apply not only to the statutes, but to the decisions of their highest courts. The state decisions involved in this case, however, were in construction of a statute.

In Hinds v. Keith, 6 C. C. A. 231, 13 U. S. App. 222, 57 Fed. 10, it is said: "In actions at law in the courts of the United States, the rules of evidence and the law of evidence generally of the state within which such courts are held will prevail." And see Stewart v. Morris, 32 C. C. A. 203, 60 U. S. App. 557, 89 Fed. 290, declaring generally that a Federal court will follow the decisions of the highest court of the state concerning rules of evidence.

of secondary evidence to prove a contract, when the subscribing witnesses are not subject to process;⁴⁷ as to the measure of proof in a civil action grounded on an act constituting a crime;⁴⁸ as to the admissibility of a declaration of a person since deceased touching the location of disputed boundary;⁴⁹ as to the right of one to testify as to his own motive or intent;⁵⁰ as to admissibility of memorandum used by witness to refresh his recollection.⁵¹

But while conceding that Federal courts must enforce the provisions of a local statute of the state in which the action arises, prescribing rules of evidence, unless the local statute is in conflict with some law of the United States regulating the same subject, it has been held that decisions of the state court construing common-law rules of evidence are not obligatory upon the Federal courts, but are merely persuasive authority, and that while the Federal courts will follow them when the question at issue is balanced with doubt, yet they will not be governed by such decisions when they appear to be at variance with the great weight of authority.⁵² So, it has been held that the question whether a court at common law has power to compel plaintiff in an action for personal injuries, to submit to a surgical examination, is one upon which the decisions of the state court, not depending upon any consideration peculiar to the state, are not controlling upon the Federal courts.⁵³ And it has been recently declared that the whole matter of presumption and burden of proof belongs to the laws of evidence, as to which the decisions of the state court are not controlling upon the Federal court, even when it is administering the law of the state.⁵⁴ This seems to be merely an application to common-law questions of evidence, of the same exception that is applied to general substantive questions of common law. Nor is it apparent why the word "laws" as employed in § 721 or § 858 of the Revised Statutes, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 581, 659, should be deemed to include decisions of the state courts as to common-law questions in relation to evidence or witnesses, and not such decisions on substantive questions. At all events it seems clear that the Federal courts are not bound to follow the decisions of the state court on a question which, though in form one of evidence, is in reality a substantive question of common law.⁵⁵

x. Practice and pleading generally.

Prior to the conformity act of 1872, remedies in the Federal court, both at common law and in equity, were according to the essential character of the case, uncontrolled in that particular by the practice of the state court.⁵⁶ But, even before that act, if the state legislature created a right, and at the same time prescribed the remedy to enforce it, that remedy would be pursued in the Federal courts in the same form as in the state courts, if substantially consistent with the ordinary modes of procedure in the former courts.⁵⁷ The conformity act, however, prescribes that the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding in civil causes, other than equity

S. Rev. Stat. § 858, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 659), which provided, inter alia, that in the courts of the United States no witness should be excluded because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried, it was held that the competency of a party as a witness in his own behalf was a question as to which the state court decisions were controlling. *Vance v. and admiralty causes, in the circuit and district courts, shall conform as near as may be to the same things existing at the time in like cases in the courts of record of the state within which the Federal court is held.⁵⁵ This subdivision does not deal with the question what matters fall within the operation of that act,⁵⁶ but simply with the question whether the decisions of the highest state court are controlling upon the Federal courts as to matters within that act, and as to which an explicit state statute would therefore concededly be binding upon the Federal as well as the state courts.

Assuming, however, that the subject-matter of a state statute relates to practice, pleading, or forms of procedure, and that the statute itself would be binding, the decisions of the highest state court with reference to it are in general controlling.⁵⁷ And it has been held specifically that the Federal courts are bound by the decisions of the state courts upon statutory questions as to the effect of an order directing a garnishee to pay a judgment creditor;⁶¹ the sufficiency of an appeal in special proceeding;⁶² the construction of pleadings in actions for personal injuries;⁶³ the sufficiency and effect of a general denial;⁶⁴ destruction of property as an excuse for failure to redeliver in replevin;⁶⁵ sufficiency of the right of entry without actual seisin to sustain partition;⁶⁶ in taxation of costs in partition suits;⁶⁷ dismissal of actions.⁶⁸

There seems to be some doubt whether decisions of the state court on questions of common-law practice and procedure are binding upon the Federal courts. In one case Judge Brown (later Mr. Justice Brown) declared in effect that the rule that the Federal court is not bound by the decisions of the state court upon general questions of common law applies to questions of practice, pleading, form, and modes of procedure, as well as to questions of general commercial law.⁶⁹

"The general doctrine that remedies whose foundations are statutes of the state are binding upon the courts of the United States within its limits is undoubted. This well-known rule of the Federal courts, founded on the act of 1789, 1 Stat. at L. 92, chap. 20, Rev. Stat. § 721, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 581, that the laws of the several states, except when the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, was enlarged in 1872 by the provision found in § 914 of the Revision, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 684. This enacts that 'the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding in civil cases, other than equity and admiralty causes, in the circuit and district courts, shall conform as near as may be to the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the state within which such circuit or district courts are held, anything in the rules of courts to the contrary notwithstanding.' process is sufficient to meet the requirements of due process of law, its sufficiency to uphold a judgment of the state court collaterally attacked in the Federal courts is to be determined in accordance with the decisions of the state court, at least, if they rest upon a construction of the state statute.⁷⁶

But it has been held that the question whether the failure to give the notice prescribed by statute in proceedings to sell the real property of a lunatic will defeat the jurisdiction of the state court is one as to which the Federal courts are not concluded by the decisions of the state court.⁷⁷

It would seem, however, that a general question not dependent upon the construction of a statute, for example, the question whether presumptions will be indulged in aid of substituted service, will be dethe state court, and brought to the Supreme Court on error, and therefore is not strictly in point.

CITIZENS' TRUST & SAVINGS BANK,

v.

JAMES STACKHOUSE et al., Appts.

(— S. G. —, 74 S. E. 977.)

Bills and notes — purchase — bona fides — prior suits.

The fact that a bank which has purchased notes from a horse dealer has had more than twenty suits to collect the notes, the defenses usually being that the horses were not satisfactory, is not sufficient to defeat the bona fides of its purchase of another note, so as to let in the defense of fraud in favor of the maker.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Marion County in plaintiff's favor in an action on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. F. Stackhouse for appellants.

Note.— The general question as to the circumstances sufficient to put a purchaser of negotiable paper on inquiry is considered in the note to Mee v. Carlson, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 351.

Mr. James W. Johnson, for respondent:

A mere suspicion that there may be a defect of title in the holder of negotiable paper, or knowledge of circumstances which would excite suspicion as to his title in the mind of a prudent man, is not sufficient to impair the title of one who buys the paper before it is due, but such result will follow only where there has been bad faith on the part of the purchaser.

Hydrick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff brought this action on one of three promissory notes given by defendants to McLaughlin Brothers of Columbus, Ohio, in payment for a stallion, alleging that it bought the note for value before maturity. The defendants set up the defenses of failure of consideration, breach of warranty, fraud and misrepresentation in the sale of the horse, and allege that plaintiff is not the bona fide owner of the note sued on, but that it is acting in collusion with the payees thereof to defeat their defenses, under the pretense of being the bona fide purchaser for value without notice. The note was for $1,399, bears date December 21, 1906, and was due thirteen months after date. Plaintiff proved by its vice president and cashier that it bought the note (with eleven others) from McLaughlin Brothers on December 6, 1907, and paid them for it $1,383.11; that the money was paid by a cashier's check, and it was not deposited to the credit of McLaughlin Brothers in the plaintiff bank, although they were depositors of that bank, and had been since 1890, and for the past several years their deposit account ran from $5,000 to $15,000. He said that neither he nor the plaintiff bank had notice of any defense to the note; that he knew the business of McLaughlin Brothers and that they dealt in horses and imported French coach stallions, and he supposed the note sued on was one of a series of notes given in payment for a horse, as the McLaughlin Brothers usually took their notes in that way; that he had discounted many such notes for them during the past seventeen years; that formerly, when they were not so strong financially as they are now, he made inquiry as to the solvency of the makers of such notes, but for the past ten years he had made no such inquiry, because he considered McLaughlin Brothers financially able to protect their indorsements; that the bank had had litigation in the collection of some twenty, or probably forty, of the notes discounted for McLaughlin Brothers; the usual defense being that the horse was not satisfactory; that McLaughlin Brothers had always protected the bank, and, when it had had litigation and had paid attorneys' fees in the collection of notes indorsed to the bank by them they reimbursed the bank, and plaintiff would look to them for like protection in this case; however, the plaintiff had no claim upon them except as indorsers of the note. This testimony was brought out in the examination, direct and cross, of plaintiff's witness.

The defendants offered in evidence a copy of the Marion Star, issued September 4, 1907, in which was published a notice warning people not to trade for the notes given by defendants to McLaughlin Brothers, giving the ground of defense. They also offered a letter, dated June 26, 1907, from McLaughlin Brothers to the cashier of a bank at Mullins, in Marion county, in which they offered to sell the defendants' notes aggregating $4,400 for $3,700. They also offered to prove that they had notified all the banks in Marion of the fraud in the inception of these notes, and asked the banks to extend the notice to all persons who might inquire about them. They also offered to prove the defenses set up in their answer; to wit, failure of consideration, breach of warranty, and fraud and misrepresentation in the sale of the horse. The court excluded the testimony so offered because there was no evidence that plaintiff had notice of any of the facts or defenses sought to be proved when it purchased the note, and on the ground that there was no evidence tending to show bad faith on the part of the plaintiff in the transaction, and thereupon the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount sued for.

It is to be regretted that the defendants cannot be permitted to prove their defenses, for, according to the allegations of their answer, the note which they are now called upon to pay was obtained from them by fraud and misrepresentation. But it is of vastly more importance to the commerce of the country that the integrity and unassailability of negotiable paper, in the hands of bona fide holders for value, shall be maintained by the courts, than that persons who carelessly put their names to such paper shall be relieved of liability thereon.

In Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. 1, 10 L. ed. 865, the Supreme Court of the United States, by Mr. Justice Story, said: "There is no doubt that a bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument for a valuable consideration, without any notice of facts which impeach its validity as between the antecedent parties, if he takes it under an indorsement made before the same becomes due, holds the title unaffected by these facts, and may recover thereon, although, as between the antecedent parties, the transaction may be without any legal validity. This is a doctrine so long and so well established, and so essential to the security of negotiable paper, that it is laid up among the fundamentals of the law, and requires no authority or reasoning to be now brought in its support. As little doubt is there that the holder of any negotiable paper, before it is due, is not bound to prove that he is a bona fide holder for a valuable consideration, without notice; for the law will presume that, in the absence of all rebutting proofs, and therefore it is incumbent upon the defendant to establish by way of defense satisfactory proofs of the contrary, and thus to overcome the prima facie title of the plaintiff."

In Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. 110, 17 L. ed. 857, Mr. Justice Swayne, speaking for the court, said: "The possession of such paper carries the title with it to the holder: 'The possession and title are one and inseparable.' The party who takes it before due for a valuable consideration, without knowledge of any defect of title, and in good faith, holds it by a title valid against all the world. Suspicion of defect of title, or the knowledge of circumstances which would excite such suspicion in the mind of a prudent man, or gross negligence on the part of the taker at the time of the transfer, will not defeat his title. That result can be produced only by bad faith on his part. The burden of proof lies on the person who assails the right claimed by the party in possession. Such is the settled law of this court, and we feel no disposition to depart from it. The rule may perhaps be said to resolve itself into a question of honesty or dishonesty; for guilty knowledge and wilful ignorance alike involve the result of bad faith. They are the same in effect. Where there is no fraud, there can be no question. The circumstances mentioned, and others of a kindred character, while inconclusive in themselves, are admissible in evidence, and fraud established, whether by direct or circumstantial evidence, is fatal to the title of the holder. The rule laid down in the class of cases of which Gill v. Cubitt, 3 Barn. & C. 466, 5 Dowl. & R. 324, 3 L. J. K. B. 48, is the antitype, is hard to comprehend and difficult to apply. One innocent holder may be more or less suspicious under similar circumstances at one time than at another, and the same remark applies to prudent men. One prudent man may also suspect where another would not, and the standard of the jury may be higher or lower than that of other men equally prudent in the management of their affairs. The rule established by the other line of decisions has the advantage of greater clearness and directness. A careful judge may readily so submit a case under it to the jury that they can hardly fail to reach the right conclusion. We are well aware of the importance of the principle involved in this inquiry. These securities are found in the channels of commerce everywhere, and their volume is constantly increasing. They represent a large part of the wealth of the commercial world. The interest of the community at large in the subject is deep-rooted and wide-branching. It ramifies in every direction, and its fruits enter daily into the affairs of persons in all conditions of life. While courts should be careful not so to shape or apply the rule as to invite aggression or give an easy triumph to fraud, they should not forget the considerations of equal importance which lie in the other direction."

This court has announced in numerous cases that, to defeat the rights of a bona fide holder for value of commercial paper, something more is required than proof of facts and circumstances which merely give rise to suspicion, or which may be sufficient to put a prudent person on inquiry. There must be proof of actual notice or knowledge of the defect in title, or bad faith on the part of the holder at the time he purchased the paper.

Of course, actual notice and bad faith may be shown by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence. McCaskill v. Ballard, 8 Rich. L. 470; Witte v. Williams, 8 S. C. 290, 28 Am. Rep. 294; Bond Debt Cases, 12 S. C. 272; Walker v. Kee, 14 S. C. 142; Hand v. Savannah & C. R. Co. 17 S. C. 256; First Nat. Bank v. Anderson, 28 S. C. 149, 5 S. E. 343; Ehrlich v. Jennings, 78 S. C. 273, 125 Am. St. Rep. 795, 58 S. E. 922, 13 Ann. Cas. 1166; Fretwell v. Carter, 78 S. C. 531, 59 S. E. 639.

No point was made either here or on circuit as to where lies the burden of proof in a case like this, where it is shown by defendants that the note had its inception in fraud. The defendants seem to have voluntarily assumed the burden of proof.

While the authorities elsewhere are not entirely in accord, our own cases and the greater weight of authority in other jurisdictions agree that when the defendant shows fraud or illegality in the inception of the paper, or that it was lost by or stolen from the owner, the presumption which is raised by its mere possession is overcome, and the burden then shifts to the holder to show that he acquired it in good faith, for value, before maturity, in the usual course of business, and under circumstances creating no presumption that he knew of the fraud or other defect in title. Schaub v. Clark, 1 Strobb. L. 301, 47 Am. Dec. 554; Witte v. Williams, 8 S. C. 290, 28 Am. Rep. 294; First Nat. Bank v. Anderson, 28 S. C. 149, 5 S. E. 343; see note in 11 Am. St. Rep. p. 324; Canajoharie Nat. Bank v. Diefendorf, 10 L.R.A. 676, and note (123 N. Y. 191, 25 N. E. 402); Commercial Bank v. Burgwyn, 17 L.R.A. 326, and note (110 N. C. 267, 14 S. E. 623).

The application of this rule can make no difference, however, in the decision of this case, but it might be of some consequence in a case where the evidence is very close, or evenly balanced, or in a case where there is no evidence of good faith except that of the holder himself, and the question arises whether his evidence shall be received as true. In such a case, if there is anything, either in the facts and circumstances, appearing in evidence, or any direct evidence tending to impeach the witness, the court would submit the issue to the jury; but if there is no evidence, direct or circumstantial, tending to impeach the witness, the court would do as it did in this case, direct the verdict, instead of inviting a verdict based upon caprice or prejudice by submitting an issue to the jury when there really is none in the evidence. Courts are organized to do justice, and they should not even impliedly sanction a verdict which is not supported by evidence by submitting an issue to a jury when only one reasonable inference can be drawn from the evidence. Therefore the defendants' attorney very properly concedes that, if there was nothing in the evidence from which a reasonable inference could have been drawn of bad faith on the part of plaintiff in the purchase of the note, the verdict was rightly directed. He zealously contends, however, that the circumstances brought out in the testimony of plaintiff's witness do warrant such an inference. All the facts and circumstances relied on by counsel, as susceptible of such a conclusion, were set out in the statement at the beginning of this opinion.

We have carefully considered them, but we find nothing in them, either singly or collectively, which tends to show bad faith on the part of the plaintiff. The fact most strongly relied upon is that the plaintiff has had some twenty, probably forty, suits in collecting notes discounted for McLaughlin Brothers; the usual defense being that the horse was not satisfactory. It does not appear, however, what was the result in those cases. It may be that plaintiff won each of them, and that the defenses were wholly without merit. Moreover, it does not appear why the horses were not satisfactory. The dissatisfaction may have been caused by something which would not have suggested to the mind of anyone that there had been fraud or misrepresentation in the sale of the horses. Now, if it had appeared that in each case, or in a good number of them, the charge of misrepresentation and fraud was made and proved, then it might, with some show of reason, be contended that plaintiff should have suspected that there may have been fraud and misrepresentation in the sale of the horse to defendants. But we have seen that proof of facts and circumstances which merely create suspicion, or which should put a prudent person on inquiry, is not sufficient. To be sure, the holder of negotiable paper must not be allowed to wilfully shut his eyes to the truth, for, as said by Mr. Justice Swayne in Murray v. Lardner, supra, wilful ignorance is as bad as guilty knowledge, and both involve the result of bad faith.

But certainly the mere fact that plaintiff had litigation in collecting some twenty, or probably forty, of the many notes which it had discounted in the run of seventeen years' business with the McLaughlin Brothers as its depositors does not tend to show bad faith in discounting the note here sued on.

Judgment affirmed.

Woods and Watts, JJ., concur.

Gary, Ch. J., dissenting:

I will not delay the filing of the opinion by discussing at length the question whether the plaintiff was a bona fide holder of the note. The mere recital in the opinion of the fact, "that the bank had had litigation in the collection of some twenty, or probably forty, of the notes discounted for McLaughlin Brothers, the usual defense being that the horse was not satisfactory," was in itself sufficient, at least, to put the plaintiff on notice that there was a good defense to the note, but which was heretofore not considered on the merits, on the ground that the plaintiff was a bona fide holder.

Furthermore, the fact that the purchase of the note was made just before it was due, and long after its execution, thus enabling the payee to avoid valid defenses; the fact that sale was made by men who habitually kept large deposits with the purchaser, and who did not appear to have been forced to sell for any legitimate purpose; the fact that the purchase money of the note was immediately taken out of the reach of the purchaser although the seller habitually deposited with the buyer,—are circumstances, taken together, that amount to more than a suspicion, and should have carried the case to the jury, as there was testimony tending to show that the transaction originated in fraud.

Wilhelmina Gerretson, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

RAMBLER GARAGE COMPANY, Resp't.

(— Wis. —, 136 N. W. 186.)

Master and servant — chauffeur — negligent operation of leased car — liability.

1. A chauffeur sent by the owner of a garage to operate an automobile leased for a pleasure ride, and who obeys the directions of the lessee merely as to routes, is the servant of the owner of the garage, and the latter will be liable for injury inflicted upon occupants of the car through his negligence.

Sunday — leasing automobile — liability for negligence.

2. The owner of an automobile leased for hire cannot escape liability for injury to an occupant of the car through the negligence of the chauffeur because the leasing was on Sunday.

Note. — Who is responsible for negligence of chauffeur operating a leased or demonstrating car.

As to responsibility of owner for injuries caused by automobile while being driven by a servant or third person for his own business or pleasure, see note to Riley v. Roach, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 834, and notes there referred to.

And as to the liability of owner for negligence of borrower or hirer of automobile, see also note to Hartley v. Miller, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 81.

As to the liability of automobile owner

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in defendant's favor dismissing the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries to plaintiff's testate resulting in death, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Kerwin, J.:

This action was brought by the plaintiff as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Wilhelmina Gerretson, deceased, to recover upon two causes of action,—one in favor of the estate of deceased, and the other in favor of the beneficiaries of said deceased under the death statute for the benefit of her children on account of the negligence of the defendant. Damages are claimed in the sum of $5,000 under the first cause of action, and in the sum of $3,500 under the second cause of action. The answer admits that Wilhelmina Gerretson died testate on the 16th day of December, 1909, and the representative capacity of the plaintiff; that deceased was injured at the time and place alleged in the complaint, and that she was a widow; also admits the corporate existence of the defendant; and denies generally upon information and belief the other allegations of the complaint. The court granted a nonsuit as to the second cause of action, and, after the evidence was all in, directed a verdict for the defendant. Judgment was entered in favor of the for negligence of chauffeur furnished by a third person, see note to Neff v. Brandeis, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 933.

The general question as to who is responsible for acts of driver furnished with a hired vehicle is treated in the notes to Frerker v. Nicholson, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1122, and supplemental note accompanying Morris v. Tredo, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 33, the present note being concerned with that question only so far as it applies to automobiles.

Liability where car is leased.

The chauffeur furnished with a leased automobile is generally held to be the servant of the owner of the machine, where the lessee has authority only to give directions as to where the car shall be driven.

Thus, this rule was applied in Shepard v. Jacobs, 204 Mass. 110, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 442, 134 Am. St. Rep. 648, 90 N. E. 392, where it was held that the owner of an automobile who leased it with a licensed chauffeur in charge, at a certain sum per day, was liable to strangers for the negligent act of the chauffeur which resulted in a collision and damage, where the lessee had no control over him except as to when and where the car should be driven.

And where an express company hires an electric van with a chauffeur by the month or day, and the chauffeur has nothing to do with the putting of the parcels into the vehicle or delivering them, a servant of the express company performing these duties, it is not liable for an injury resulting from the operation of the van, where it appears that at the time all of the packages had been delivered and the machine had returned to the express company's office, where the employee of that company had been left, and the chauffeur was, at the time of the accident, either on his way to lunch or to have the vehicle repaired, since the chauffeur was not ad hoc the hirer's servant. Bohan v. Metropolitan Exp. Co. 122 App. Div. 590, 107 N. Y. Supp. 530. The court said: "In the present case, if the accident had actually occurred while the express packages were being delivered, it might be 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the defendant would be liable under the rule laid down in the last two cases [cases involving liability for injuries occurring while goods were being delivered by hired van], but even then it might be doubtful, inasmuch as the chauffeur had nothing whatever to do with the handling of the goods of the defendant or making collections. All he did was to obey the directions as to where he should take the vehicle. (Lewis v. Long Island R. Co. 162 N. Y. 52, 56 N. E. 548, Johnson v. Netherlands American Steam Nav. Co. 132 N. Y. 576, 30 N. E. 505.) But, as we have already seen, at the time of the accident he had delivered all the packages for the defendant, and was not then engaged in doing any work for it; he was then either taking the vehicle to the transportation company's office to have it repaired, or else was engaged in his personal business, and in neither case can it be said that he was acting as the servant of the defendant or engaged in its business. The defendant did not own the vehicle; had no right to inspect it, or give directions as to repairs. Under such circumstances I know of no rule of law under which defendant can be held liable. When the chauffeur left the defendant's office for the purpose of going back to the transportation company's office to have the vehicle repaired, or to get his lunch, he ceased to be the servant of the express company, because he was not then engaged in doing its business, and for his negligence in operating the vehicle while thus engaged the express company is not liable."

And in Routledge v. Rambler Automobile Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 95 S. W. 749, it was held that a guest of one hiring a motor car, who was injured by the negligent operation of the car by the chauffeur furnished therewith, might recover damages of the owner, notwithstanding the car was running at a high rate of speed at the solicitation of the host, it not appearing that the plaintiff had acquiesced therein.

However, one who delivers an automobile to another under an agreement that the latter is to use it for hire, and pay the purchase price to the first party out of the receipts, is not liable for an injury resulting defendant dismissing the complaint, from which this appeal was taken.

The evidence tends to show that during the afternoon of Sunday, November 7, 1909, William F. Gerretson, a son of deceased, called defendant's garage by telephone, and ordered a seven-passenger automobile to come to his home on Garfield avenue in the city of Milwaukee, for a drive about the city, carrying himself, members of his family, and friends. In response to the call, one of defendant's seven-passenger 45-horse power automobiles, driven by defendant's servant, L. D. Cook, went to the home of W. F. Gerretson under instructions from defendant's foreman to drive the machine where directed, and Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Gerretson and Mr. and Mrs. James Donovan there entered the car, Mr. Gerretson directing the chauffeur to drive to 1820 Grand avenue, the home of R. W. Gerretson, another son of deceased. There deceased and her granddaughter entered the car, and the chauffeur was directed to drive to the Gerretson store, 107 Wisconsin street, thence to several places on Milwaukee street, thence to a point on Van Buren street between Knapp street and Juneau avenue. The day was misty and rainy, and the sides, top, and glass wind shield of the automobile were up to protect the occupants. The pavement was wet and slippery, and there were tire chains in the car, furnished by defendant to meet the very conditions then presented by wet and slippery pavements. The chauffeur negliwhile it is being used by the purchaser, there being no relation of master and servant between the parties. Braverman v. Hart, 105 N. Y. Supp. 107.

Where there is a conflict upon the question of whether the operator of an automobile has hired it of the owner for his own use, or whether he is acting as an employee of the owner, it is a question of fact for the jury and their findings are conclusive. Ottomeier v. Hornburg, 50 Wash. 316, 97 Pac. 235.

Liability where car is being demonstrated.

Where a chauffeur is furnished to operate a demonstrating car he is generally held to be the servant of the owner of the car, so that the latter is liable for any damage resulting from his negligence.

Thus, in McGuire v. Autocar Sales Co. 134 N. Y. Supp. 702, it was held that a company engaged in the business of selling trucks was liable for an injury resulting from the operation of one of its trucks which was being operated by one of its drivers in delivering articles to customers of a company which was considering the purchasing of a car, since the driver was acting as a servant of the automobile company in demonstrating its truck. The court said: "It is quite true that the operator of the auto truck was engaged in the work of participating in the delivery of various packages of Greenhut & Company at the time of the accident. While in one sense he was doing this work for Greenhut & Company, yet the doing of this work was but incidental to a larger work which he was doing for the defendant appellant, and which was the main purpose of his operating the machine; that is to say, he was demonstrating by actual experience, on behalf of the defendant appellant, the effectiveness of its auto truck, for the purpose of inducing, for the benefit of his general employer, the purchase either of that truck or other trucks by Greenhut & Company from his general employer. It seems to me unquestionable that during every part of this performance he was primarily and particularly the servant and agent of his general employer. To hold otherwise, it would follow that every time one takes passage in a motor car when it is under demonstration for the purpose of inducing a sale and purchase, he shall become liable for the negligent operation of the car by the driver furnished by the intending vendor. This would be going entirely too far."

And a company whose business it is to sell automobiles is liable for the negligence of a demonstrator sent by it to demonstrate a car to a prospective customer, where the demonstrator, in answer to the prospective customer's question as to whether he could crank the car, stated that anybody could crank the car, and told him to push in and turn the crank around, and the prospective customer's arm was broken by the kick of the engine, since in such a case the customer was not a mere licensee, but an invitee, who acted at the implied invitation of the defendant's demonstrator, who had knowledge of the person's inexperience with automobiles. Martin v. Maxwell-Briscoe Motor Vehicle Co. 158 Mo. App. 188, 138 S. W. 65.

So, where the owner of an automobile sent his chauffeur with the car to demonstrate it, and the chauffeur permitted an employee of a prospective purchaser to drive it, and an injury resulted while the car was being driven by such person, the owner of the car is liable for the injury, since the act of permitting the employee of the prospective buyer to drive the car was one performed in the furtherance of his servant's employment. Wooding v. Thom, 148 App. Div. 21, 132 N. Y. Supp. 50. The court said: "If the owner himself had undertaken to demonstrate the car, and as a part of such demonstration had permitted Eglit to drive it, no one would have any doubt as to such owner's liability. The case here is no different. Simmons was authorized to demonstrate the car; that was his employment; in the course of that employment, as a part of the demonstration he permitted Eglit to drive; this, I think, fastens upon Simmons's employer liability for the negligence which resulted in plaintiff's injuries."

gently failed to put them on because he "did not want to get his hands and clothes soiled." After leaving the Peacock home, on Van Buren street, on the return trip to the home of R. W. Gerretson, on Grand avenue, the chauffeur selected his own route and drove north on Van Buren street to Knapp street, west on Knapp street to Milwaukee street, and south on Milwaukee street in a straight line five blocks to its intersection with Mason street. Going south on Milwaukee street, the automobile was driven at a speed of 18 to 20 miles an hour, in violation of the ordinance of the city limiting the speed to 12 miles per hour. When the street car, running west on Mason street came into view, the speed with which the automobile was driven made a collision between it and the car inevitable, and to minimize its effect the chauffeur turned sharply the corner at Mason and Milwaukee streets going west. The street car and automobile reached the west line of Milwaukee street at the same time, and, the speed of the automobile being so great, its rear wheels skidded on the pavement, and the rear end of the automobile collided with the street car at its forward truck, just behind the front platform. The force of the impact was so great as to throw deceased with such violence against the left side of the automobile as to completely fracture five ribs and severely bruise her hip and back. The automobile was held fast to the street car for a few minutes, then freed, and ran down the hill on the north side of Mason street about 60 feet. After the release from the street car, W. F. Gerretson and James Donovan administered to the two injured ladies, and the wrecked machine was then driven by the chauffeur to the garage, about a block from the place of the accident, and the deceased and Mrs. Donovan were lifted into another automobile and driven by the chauffeur, Cook, to the home of W. F. Gerretson, into which they were carried. From this time until her death deceased suffered great pain, and during that period was confined almost continuously to her bed, being moved with difficulty and never without assistance. From the injuries sustained and the pain and suffering undergone death ensued December 16, 1909. It further appears that during the entire period of hiring, Cook, as driver of the automobile, was acting wholly within the scope of his employment, and in compliance with the directions of the defendant.

Mr. Paul D. Durant, for appellant:

When a garage keeper or owner of an automobile hires it to another person and furnishes a driver, such driver is the agent of the owner of the automobile or garage keeper.

Law, 178; Corliss v. Keown, 207 Mass. 149,

In Burnham v. Central Automobile Exch. — R. I. —, 67 Atl. 429, where the purchaser of a motor car claimed to have received an injury while riding in it, by reason of the reckless driving of a chauffeur furnished by the seller to teach the former how to operate the car, the court refused to disturb a verdict against the seller, although the latter claimed the accident was caused by a break in the machinery due to the purchaser's previous reckless operation of the car, and not to the negligence of the chauffeur, as, under the circumstances, the question of liability was held to be properly submitted to the jury.

Where a prospective purchaser of an automobile sends his employee to look at a car at a garage, with instructions to examine the engine and report its condition, remarking that if the report is satisfactory he will arrange about a demonstration, the employer is not liable for an injury resulting from his employee's negligence in operating the car, which had been taken out at the suggestion of the selling agent after the employee had made his examination of the engine, since he was acting entirely outside the scope of his employment with reference to the car. Wooding v. Thom, supra.

In Hiroux v. Baum, 137 Wis. 197, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 332, 118 N. W. 533, it was held that a son might be found to have been acting as the agent of his father in operating the latter's automobile, where it was purchased mainly at his solicitation, with the understanding that he was to learn to run it for the benefit of the family, and it appeared that at the time in question he was operating the car under the instruction of the vendor.

And in this case it was held that the automobile, which had been purchased with the understanding that the son of the purchaser should be taught to operate it, might be found to be in possession of the son as agent of the purchaser while the instructions were being given, and not in that of the vendor as an independent contractor. Ibid.

Kerwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is ample evidence to entitle the jury to find that the chauffeur so negligently operated the car as to cause the injury in question. But it is insisted by respondent that the directed verdict for defendant and judgment dismissing the complaint should be upheld for the following reasons: (1) That the chauffeur was the servant of F. W. Gerretson, the hirer of the car; (2) that, even though the chauffeur was the agent of defendant, still no negligence was shown because the negligence of the chauffeur was not chargeable to defendant; and (3) that the contract between Gerretson and defendant was void because made on Sunday; therefore no recovery could be had upon it.

1. There is no evidence in the case tending to show that the chauffeur was the servant of deceased or of F. W. Gerretson. The defendant furnished the car with the chauffeur to operate it, and the chauffeur had charge and management of the car. The deceased or F. W. Gerretson exercised no control as to the operation and management of it. The chauffeur, therefore, was the servant of the defendant. Shepard v. Jacobs, 204 Mass. 110, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 442, 134 Am. St. Rep. 648, 90 N. E. 392; Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 29 L. ed. 652, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391; Morris v. Trudo, 83 Vt. 44, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 33, 74 Atl. 387; Hiroux v. Baum, 137 Wis. 197, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 332, 118 N. W. 533; Frerker v. Nicholson, 41 Colo. 12, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1122, 92 Pac. 224, 14 Ann. Cas. 730; Murray v. Dwight, 161 N. Y. 301, 48 L.R.A. 673, 55 N. E. 901; Quarman v. Burnett, 6 Mees. & W. 499, 9 L. J. Exch. N. S. 308, 4 Jur. 969.

2. The respondent, in support of the judgment below, strenuously insists that the plaintiff cannot recover because the right to recover must be traced through a Sunday contract, and relies mainly upon Sentinel Co. v. A. D. Mieselbach Motor Wagon Co. 144 Wis. 224, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 436, 140 Am. St. Rep. 1007, 128 N. W. 861. In that case the action was brought to recover upon quantum meruit for services performed on Sunday, and it was held that no recovery could be had because of our statute (Stat. 1898, § 4595) which prohibits labor, business, or work, except only works of necessity or charity, on Sunday. It will be seen that in that case the contract upon which the suit was based was in direct violation of the statute, being for Sunday publications, and came clearly within the terms of the statute as "labor, business, or work," and not work of necessity or charity. The right of action in the instant case is not based upon the contract of hiring between F. W. Gerretson and the respondent, even if it should be held that such contract was in violation of the Sunday law, a point we do not decide. It has been held under statutes quite similar to ours that it is not illegal to walk, drive, or exercise on Sunday (Barker v. Worcester, 139 Mass. 74, 29 N. E. 474; Sullivan v. Maine C. R. Co. 82 Me. 196, 8 L.R.A. 427, 19 Atl. 169), nor to carry home a visitor (Buck v. Biddeford, 82 Me. 433, 19 Atl. 912). See also Crosman v. Lynn, 121 Mass. 301.

But whether the contract of hiring was void or not is not material here, since the plaintiff's right of recovery is based upon the tort of the defendant's servant while acting within the scope of his duty in operating the car. Many cases are cited by both parties from foreign jurisdictions, but the question has been settled by this court in favor of the appellant. Gabbert v. Hackett, 135 Wis. 86, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1070, 115 N. W. 345; Sutton v. Wauwatosa, 29 Wis. 31, 9 Am. Rep. 534; McArthur v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 34 Wis. 150; Knowlton v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 59 Wis. 278, 18 N. W. 17.

It is argued, however, by respondent that, if the contract of hiring were void, no duty rested upon the defendant, and that the case should be distinguished from those of common carriers, where the law imposes a duty independent of contract. We think the contention is not only against the decisions of this court, but against the great weight of authority elsewhere. The duty of a common carrier, while in some degree imposed by law, is a duty growing out of contract, and this court held in Gabbert v. Hackett, 135 Wis. 86, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1070, 115 N. W. 345, that whether the contract was valid or invalid was immaterial, because it had no causal relation with the injury. In the case at bar the defendant undertook for hire to carry the deceased and others, and in the performance of that duty through negligence caused the injury to deceased. The contract of hiring had no causal relation with the injury. The cause of action is based upon the tort or negligence of the defendant. In McArthur v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 34 Wis. 150, the court said: "The same state of facts which would entitle the plaintiff to recover had the injury happened on any day other than Sunday will entitle him to recover in this action, notwithstanding the injury was received on Sunday, and when he was unlawfully navigating the canal with his boats." See also Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co. 125 U. S. 555, 31 L. ed. 795, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 974; Kansas City v. Orr, 62 Kan. 61, 50 L.R.A. 783, 61 Pac. 397; Gross v. Miller, 93 Iowa, 72, 26 L.R.A. 605, 61 N. W. 385; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Philadelphia, H. de G. Steam Towboat Co. 23 How. 209, 16 L. ed. 433, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

3. The evidence being sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the agent or servant of the defendant was acting within the scope of his duty, and that he was guilty of a want of ordinary care, which caused the injury, his negligence was the negligence of the defendant. This doctrine is well settled by the decisions of this court. Shaefer v. Osterbrink, 87 Wis. 495, 58 Am. St. Rep. 875, 30 N. W. 922; Bryan v. Adler, 97 Wis. 127, 41 L.R.A. 658, 65 Am. St. Rep. 99, 72 N. W. 368; Rogahn v. Moore Mfg. & Foundry Co. 79 Wis. 575, 48 N. W. 669; Bergman v. Hendrickson, 106 Wis. 434, 80 Am. St. Rep. 47, 82 N. W. 304; Johnston v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 130 Wis. 492, 110 N. W. 424; Hiroux v. Baum, 137 Wis. 197, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 332, 118 N. W. 533; Steffen v. McNaughton, 142 Wis. 49, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 382, 124 N. W. 1016, 19 Ann. Cas. 1227; Daley v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 145 Wis. 249, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1164, 129 N. W. 1062. The principles of the foregoing cases apply to the instant case. In Rogahn v. Moore Mfg. & Foundry Co. 79 Wis. 575, 48 N. W. 669, this court said: "There has been much discussion in the courts as to how far the master is liable for the torts of his servant, and many nice distinctions have been made; but it is generally agreed that for the negligent or wrongful acts of the servant in the line of his duty, for which the master would be liable if the act were done by himself, the master is responsible." The doctrine is peculiarly applicable to the operation of an automobile. In Shepard v. Jacobs, 204 Mass. 110, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 442, 134 Am. St. Rep. 648, 90 N. E. 392, where the court had under consideration the question, it is said: "The management of an automobile properly can be trusted only to a skilled expert. The law will not permit such a vehicle to be run in the streets except by a licensed chauffeur of approved competency. The danger of great loss of property by the owner as well as of injury to the chauffeur, his servant, is such as to make it of the highest importance that care should be exercised in his interest, and that the control and management of the machine should not be given up to the hirer." See also Johnson v. Coey, 237 Ill. 88, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 81, 86 N. E. 678; Trout v. Watkins Livery & Undertaking Co. 148 Mo. App. 621, 130 S. W. 136; Routledge v. Rambler Automobile Co. — Tex. It follows that the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

OF APPEALS, SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

POPE AUTOMATIC MERCHANDISING COMPANY et al., Appts.,
v.

McCURUM-HOWELL COMPANY.

(112 C. C. A. 391, 191 Fed. 979.)

Unfair competition — making identical article — right to injunction.

One who manufactures an unpatented article for the market, arranging the parts to the best advantage, and giving it a form which is most effective and economical to manufacture, and using an unpainted material which is best adapted to the purpose, cannot enjoin the use by a subsequent manufacturer of the identical combination of mechanical devices, form, and material, if he uses a different name plate so as to distinguish the origin of manufacture.

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern Division of the Northern District of Illinois granting a preliminary injunction to restrain defendants from making and selling suction cleaners in unfair competition with plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Grosscup and Baker, Circuit Judges, and Sanborn, District Judge.

Mr. Frederick A. Brown for appellants.

Mr. Hillary C. Messimer for appellee.

Baker, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

By a preliminary injunctive order appellants are restrained from making and selling suction cleaners of a certain type. No patent for mechanism or process or product or design is involved. Nor is infringement of trademarks or tradenames alleged. Unfair competition in trade is the sole basis of the case.

Appellee, prior to the bringing of this suit, was marketing a suction cleaner that bore a plate carrying the tradename "Richmond" and the name and address of appellee as maker. At the same time appellants were putting out a cleaner of identical mechanical principles and arrangement of parts, of identical form, and of identical color. To appellants' cleaner was affixed a name plate much larger than appellee's, as large as could well be attached, displaying conspicuously a red cross and the words in large capitals, "The Pope Electric Cleaner, Made by the Pope Co., Chicago, U. S. A."

Appellee was senior in the field; and the affidavits may warrant a conclusion that appellants deliberately copied the mechanism, form, and color of appellee's cleaner, with a view of sharing in the trade built up by appellee's pushing of the "Richmond." As appellants' trademark, tradename, and name and address of maker, were unmistakably distinguished from appellee's, infringement must rest upon appellee's exclusive right to the mechanics and the form and the color of its cleaner, or one or more of them.

Mechanically the cleaner is this: At the bottom is a mouthpiece, to rest upon the carpet or other material to be cleaned. Next above the mouthpiece is a rotary fan, inclosed in the necessary casing. Just above the fan, and on the same perpendicular axis, is an electric motor in a ventilated casing. To the top of the motor casing a detachable handle is affixed at an angle of about 45 degrees from the perpendicular. In the fan casing is an opening around which one end of a cloth bag to receive the dust is fastened, the other end being attached to the handle; these parts, with the switch, socket, and cord for supplying current to the motor, making up a combination that has many advantages and that probably is the best mechanical arrangement for a vacuum cleaner that is to be carried about as a single tool. But in the absence of a patent this particular combination must be viewed as the culmination of a mechanical evolution, to the equal benefits of which all society is entitled. Indeed, appellee does not deny appellants' right to use the exact combination if they had given the fan and motor casings and other exterior parts different form and color.

In form the mouthpiece is common and old, antedating appellee. To be efficient, the inner surface of the fan casing has to be cylindrical. If the casing is to be cut from metal of even thickness, as it comes in sheets, the outer surface, too, cannot be other than cylindrical. As the motor is of less diameter than the fan (from proper mechanical relations of power), the motor casing naturally (from motives of economy in materials and labor) is a smaller cylinder. The ventilating opening in the motor case, the dust opening in the fan case, the handle, the bag, the electric connections, are all either in their inevitable or best possible mechanical locations. In short, appellee uses the most efficient and most economically manufactured form into which the mechanical combination can probably be embodied. Not a line nor a curve, not a mark, not a bit of superfluous material, for embellishment or distinction. Nothing but the name plate. If appellants should be required to give a square or hexagonal or other than cylindrical form to the outer surface of the casings, considerations of costs of the superfluous material and labor might prevent them from competing with appellee in the manufacture and sale of a mechanism that was equally open to both. In the Singer Case, 163 U. S. 169, 41 L. ed. 118, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1002, the Supreme Court held that at the expiration of a machine patent the utilitarian form in which the patentee had embodied his mechanical combination also became public property. No difference in principle is perceived between a machine that after a period of seventeen years becomes free for common use, and one that has been such all the time.

Note. — The cases are in harmony with the doctrine of the above case that the manufacturer of an article is not entitled, upon the ground of unfair competition or upon any other ground, to be protected against the manufacture and sale by a competitor of an article similar in design, where the similarity complained of is with reference to necessary functional characteristics of the article. Notes in 37 L.R.A. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Aluminum is the metal used. Its advantages in strength, in durability, in lightness of weight, and in freedom from tarnish, have led to its adoption for various utensils and tools. Appellee can have no monopoly of its use for this tool. In both cleaners the metal is unpainted. If appellants should be compelled to paint their cleaner a distinctive color, they would increase their manufacturing cost and would also lose one of the main advantages of a metal that was as open to them as to appellee, and that was as obviously the best as a material as the cylinder was as a form.

Development in a useful art is ordinarily toward effectiveness of operation and simplicity of form. Carriages, bicycles, automobiles, and many other things from diversity have approached uniformity through the utilitarian impulse. If one manufacturer should make an advance in effectiveness of operation, or in simplicity of form, or in utility of color; and if that advance did not entitle him to a monopoly by means of a machine or a process or a product or a design patent; and if by 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

means of unfair trade suits he could shut out other manufacturers who plainly intended to share in the benefits of the unpatented utilities and in the trade that had been built up thereon, but who used on their products conspicuous name plates containing unmistakably distinct trade-names, trademarks, and names and addresses of makers, and in relation to whose products no instance of deception had occurred,—he would be given gratuitously a monopoly more effective than that of the unobtainable patent in the ratio of eternity to seventeen years.

Order reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

SOUTHERN STEEL COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

WILEY HOPKINS, Admr., etc., of Sam Birchfield, Deceased, et al.

(— Ala. —, 57 So. 11.)

Equity — multiplicity of suits — separate actions by employees.

Equity has no jurisdiction, in order to prevent a multiplicity of suits, to enjoin the prosecution of a large number of actions by different persons under an employer's liability act, against a common employer, to recover damages for wrongful deaths caused by the same accident in the employer's plant, and determine the question of liability itself.

(January 29, 1911.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Jefferson County sustaining a demurrer to a bill

Note. — Power of equity to take jurisdiction because of multiplicity of actions at law for personal injuries growing out of a single tort.

The above is the subject of notes in 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 848, and 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 491, to which this note is supplementary.

Other aspects of the general subject of avoidance of multiplicity of suits as a ground of equity jurisdiction are treated in notes in 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 239, in relation to suits for possession of separate parcels of land held by different defendants claiming under a common source; in 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 743, in relation to the liability of different members of a club or corporation; and in 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 941, and 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 897, in relation to adjustment of losses between concurrent insurance policies on the same property.

filed to enjoin prosecution of numerous actions at law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. T. Stokely for appellant.

Messrs. Stallings & Drennen for appellees.

Mayfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity to enjoin the prosecution of 110 separate actions at law. The sole ground of equity jurisdiction upon which the suit is based is to prevent a multiplicity of suits. The separate actions at law were brought by the administrators of 110 unfortunate workmen who lost their lives by an explosion in a coal mine. Each of these 110 actions was brought, under the employer's liability act, to recover damages for the wrongful death of the respective intestate; was brought against the same defendant, the complainant in this suit; and sought to recover on account of negligence in causing or allowing the explosion which killed the unfortunate workmen.

The prayer for relief is as follows: "Your orator further prays that your Honor will grant unto your orator a preliminary writ of injunction, enjoining and restraining each and all of said parties defendant and their attorneys and successors from all further proceedings in said actions at law, or prosecuting the same in any manner, until the further orders of this court, and that your Honor will proceed to hear and determine the question of the liability vel non of said Alabama Steel & Wire Company, in the premises; and, if there should prove to be any such liability, that your Honor will further determine the extent thereof, and the manner and mode in which the same shall be prorated or paid."

This appeal, for the second time, brings up for our decision the equity of this bill, a full statement of the facts of which, and a discussion of the law involved, may be found in the reports of the case in 167 Ala. 175, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 848, 131 Am. St. Rep. 20, 47 So. 274, 16 Ann. Cas. 690.

The question of law involved in this suit is this: Has a court of equity jurisdiction to enjoin numerous tort actions, brought by different plaintiffs against the same defendant, when there is merely a community of interest in the questions of law and of fact involved, and no common title, no community of interest or of right, in the subject-matter? This question was decided in the affirmative by this court on the former appeal. After the cause was remanded, the complainant amended the bill, and other defendants demurred, and again raised the equity of the bill as last amended. The chancellor again sustained the demurrer, and from that decree the complainant again appeals to this court.

We regret the necessity of overruling our former decision, and recognize and appreciate the wisdom in the maxim, that "it is as important that the law be certain

This is the second appearance of the case of SOUTHERN STEEL CO. v. HOPKINS, before the supreme court of Alabama. The former decision of that court is reported in 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 848.

In a later decision by the supreme court of Alabama (Roanoke Guano Co. v. Saunders, — Ala. —, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 491, 56 So. 198), they refer with approval to the note in 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 848, and overrule their first decision in the Hopkins Case, for the reasons suggested in the criticism of that decision in the note appended to the Hopkins Case, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 991, and cited with approval in the Saunders Case. In the Saunders Case the court gives this question very able consideration, and points out that "the writer of the opinion in the Hopkins Case failed to distinguish between cases in which the sole ground of equity jurisdiction depended upon the question of preventing a multiplicity of suits, and those cases which rest upon some other independent equity." And it is said that failure to observe this distinction is the cause of the many conflicting decisions upon the question as to sufficiency of a bill to prevent a multiplicity of suits; and the doctrine is asserted that in order to support a bill in equity upon the sole ground of preventing a multiplicity of suits, a bill must show some community or mutuality of interest in the subject-matter of the controversy in which the various litigants are interested. A mere community of interest in the questions of law and fact involved is not sufficient.

Another late case in which this question has been considered and which also refers with approval to the note in 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 848, is Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Williamson, — Miss. —, 57 So. 559, which in effect overrules an earlier decision by that court (Whitlock v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 91 Miss. 779, 45 So. 861), in which the court had reached the same conclusion as did the Alabama court in the first decision in the Hopkins Case. In the later Mississippi case referred to, the court reaffirms the doctrine of Tribbette v. Illinois C. R. Co. 70 Miss. 182, 19 L.R.A. 660, 35 Am. St. Rep. 642, 12 So. 32, and asserts the doctrine that in order for equity to take jurisdiction on the ground of a multiplicity of suits, there must be some recognized ground of equitable interference, or some community of interest in the subject-matter, or a common right or title involved, to warrant joinder of all in one suit; or there must be some common purpose, the pursuit of a common adversary, where each may resort to equity in order to be joined in one suit.

as that it be right;" yet it is not only our prerogative, but our duty, to overrule a former decision, when we are convinced that it is fundamentally wrong, both in theory and in practice.

There is a sharp and distinct conflict in the decisions of the various courts upon this question; but, after a careful examination and review of many of them, and of the text-books upon the subject, we are constrained to recede from the holding on the former appeal, and to follow that line of decisions and those text-books which deny equity jurisdiction to prevent a multiplicity of suits at law, in the absence of a common title, or of some community of right or interest, in the subject-matter among the several parties. To state the proposition differently, we now hold that a community of interest among the several parties in the questions of law and of fact involved is not sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon a court of equity to enjoin the several tort actions at law, though brought against the same defendant, and though each may depend upon the same state of facts.

Our statute (§ 5965 of the Code) provides as follows: "The supreme court, in deciding each case, when there is a conflict between its existing opinion and any former ruling in the case, must be governed by what, in its opinion at that time, is law, without any regard to such former ruling on the law by it; but the right of third persons, acquired on the faith of the former ruling, shall not be defeated or interfered with by or on account of any subsequent ruling."

The importance of this question of law and practice involved is such that we deem it proper to state, as briefly as we may, the reasons which have impelled us to overrule the former decision.

We have reached the conclusion that the law has been correctly settled, both in England and America, differently from that declared by this court in the former decision of this case. We think there is little doubt that the courts have been led astray upon this subject by following what Mr. Pomeroy stated in his valuable work on Equity Jurisprudence, 2d ed. § 269. We recognize both the ability and the authority of Mr. Pomeroy as a writer upon equity jurisprudence; in fact, we concede, as we have often stated in our opinions, that he is probably the leading and the best authority upon this subject; but he is human, and must therefore sometimes err. Prior to this text of Mr. Pomeroy, there were, we are certain, few, if any, adjudicated cases which supported the text, or which would sustain the equity of a bill which rested solely upon the jurisdiction of equity to prevent a multiplicity of suits, when there was no common title, no community of interest or of right, in the subject-matter among the several individuals whose actions at law were sought to be enjoined.

It must be conceded, however, that there are a number of decisions, since the text, which support it; some of them extending the doctrine further, probably, than it was ever intended or supposed by Mr. Pomeroy. Chief among these is the decision of our own court in this case on the former appeal. Another is that of Whitlock v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 91 Miss. 779, 45 So. 861. These two cases have certainly extended the Pomeroy doctrine further than have any others, before or since their rendition.

Chief Justice McClellan, in the Turner Case, 135 Ala. 73, 33 So. 132, after devoting several pages of the opinion to the fallacy of the Pomeroy doctrine, which was followed and given effect to by this court on the former appeal, concluded as follows, which is quoted with approval from the Tribette Case, 70 Miss. 182, 19 L.R.A. 660, 35 Am. St. Rep. 642, 12 So. 32: "But we affirm, after careful examination and full consideration, that Pomeroy is not sustained in his 'conclusions,' stated in § 269 of his most valuable treatise; and the cases he cited do not maintain the proposition that mere community of interest 'in the questions of law and fact involved in the general controversy, or in the kind and form of relief demanded and obtained by or against each individual member of the numerous body,' is ground for the interposition of chancery to settle, in one suit, the several controversies. There is no such doctrine in the books, and the zeal of the learned and unusually accurate writer mentioned, to maintain a theory, has betrayed him into error on this subject. It has so blinded him as to cause the confounding of distinct things in his view of this subject, to wit, joinder of parties, and avoidance of multiplicity of suits."

On the other hand, the opinion of Chief Justice Tyson, on the former appeal, referring to the same doctrine, quotes approvingly from another Mississippi case, as follows: "We think the doctrine announced by Pomeroy is sound, and clearly established by the best-considered modern cases." Chief Justice Tyson also states in his opinion that Tribette's Case was directly opposed to his views of the law, and to the other Mississippi cases quoted from by him, but that the Turner Case was not so opposed, except as to certain dicta therein.

In this last statement as to the Turner Case, we think the opinion in the former case is in error. It is certain that the Turner Case followed the Tribette Case, and gave sanction to every doctrine announced therein. Chief Justice McClellan, in Turner's Case, referring to the doctrine that, in order for a court of equity to enjoin a multiplicity of actions at law, there must be a common title to, or common interest in, the subject-matter involved, and that a mere common interest in a question of law is not sufficient, states that "this position is nowhere better or more fully stated than by Campbell, Ch. J., in Tribette's Case; and as the opinion treats fully of Mr. Pomeroy's position, and demonstrates its fallacy, we quote it in part," etc., and then proceeds to quote several pages from the opinion in Tribette's Case.

The opinion in the Turner Case thus shows on its face that Chief Justice McClellan therein quoted more than half of Chief Justice Campbell's opinion in the Tribette Case. This, we think, makes it certain that if the decision in the Tribette Case was in conflict with Chief Justice Tyson's opinion it was unquestionably in conflict with the decision in Turner's Case which not only followed the decision in Tribette's Case, but literally quoted pages of it, and thus expressly adopted it.

Chief Justice McClellan, in the Turner Case, says: "This court has never undertaken to define the jurisdiction of equity to prevent a multiplicity of suits, nor to lay down general principles from which the several categories of cases in which that jurisdiction may be invoked is possible of statement. All that has been decided or said by this court bearing upon the subject evidences an inclination toward the confinement of this jurisdiction to a narrow field, and a purpose to conserve in its full integrity the right of trial at law and by juries,"—citing many authorities. Further on in that opinion he says that "nothing . . . has ever been said or decided in this court giving any countenance to the proposition that a common interest in the questions at issue only will give to numerous parties so interested a standing in equity for the prevention of a multiplicity of suits. The intolerable consequences to which the recognition of such a doctrine would logically lead are sufficiently indicated in the cases to which we have referred. . . . It would seem to be an elementary and fundamental proposition that a party who seeks to come into equity must himself have an equity, . . . or he cannot maintain a bill. . . . The wholly fortuitous, accidental, and collateral fact that numerous other persons have like, but entirely independent and disconnected, legal rights, estates, or defenses 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

cannot, upon any conceivable principle, invest him with any right, legal or equitable, and his rights, whatever they may be, are precisely the same as if no other person had similar rights. . . . Jurisdiction in equity is not entertained on any notion that the court has an equity; that it will take jurisdiction to prevent a multiplicity of suits, in order to lessen its own labors or those of other courts. The equity upon which the invocation is made must reside in the party making it. When numerous parties have each the same equity, they may in a proper case unite in one bill for its declaration and effectuation; each having the separate right to come into equity upon an identical ground, they will be allowed to come in together, on the theory of preventing a multiplicity of suits. So, where one party is subjected to or threatened with numerous and vexatious actions at law, or is the victim of numerous, repeated and continuing wrongs, so that a multitude of suits would be necessary for his redress at law, he may come into chancery, because the necessity for numerous suits or defenses . . . is in itself such a wrong and vexation . . . as vests him with an equity." But the mere fact that a defendant has committed a tort, by which he injured one or a hundred parties, cannot give him an equity to prevent each and every one of the parties so injured from maintaining an action against him to recover damages. If there had been a combination or conspiracy between such numerous parties to vex and harass the complainant by numerous suits, then he would have an equity to enjoin their prosecution. But the mere fact that his tort has injured a hundred persons, and that it will save him and the court time and lessen the expenses of the litigation, does not give him any equity to go into a court of chancery to enjoin or prevent a multiplicity of suits.

It was pointed out by Chief Justice Campbell, in the Tribette Case, and by Chief Justice McClellan, in the Turner Case, that the authorities cited by Mr. Pomeroy do not support the text upon which the former decision of this case was based. We will now proceed to show that the authorities cited by Chief Justice Tyson, in his opinion in the former decision of this case, do not support the text of Mr. Pomeroy, nor the former decision in this case.

We think we have shown that the Turner Case, cited in favor of it, not only fails to support the opinion to which it is cited, but is diametrically opposed to it, and is based solely upon the Tribette Case, which Chief Justice Tyson concedes is opposed to this opinion and decision. The case of Crawford v. Mobile, J. & K. C. R. Co. 83 Miss. 708, 102 Am. St. Rep. 476, 36 So. 82, cited, does not support the conclusion, because it rested upon an independent equity, which sought to compel the surrender and cancelation of forty odd written instruments, upon the ground that they were obtained by the same fraud. The case of Sheffield Waterworks v. Yeomans, L. R. 2 Ch. 8, 15 L. T. N. S. 342, 15 Week. Rep. 76, which is so strongly relied on by Chief Justice Tyson, was also based upon an independent equity, to wit, the delivery and cancelation of more than 7,000 instruments, upon the ground that they were fraudulently issued, and that they were used as the foundation for the prosecution of the suits based thereon. That case did not seek to enjoin actions of tort, brought by the persons injured by the bursting of a water pipe, as might be inferred from the reference made to it in the opinion. While more than 7,000 persons were injured by the bursting of the pipe, certificates were issued in compromise and settlement of their claims against the company, and the bill in that case was filed by the company to compel the surrender and cancelation of such certificates and claims, on the ground that they were secured by fraud. It was only a question of multifariousness involved in each of the two cases referred to, and not the question of the jurisdiction to prevent a multiplicity of suits. The case of York v. Pilkington, 1 Atk. 282, 9 Mod. 273, was a bill of peace, by one in possession of land, to settle a disputed right of fishery against several persons who were claiming it, which, of course, is not an authority in point. The other cases cited are reviewed in the note to that case, as reported in 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 849. Each of the cases cited has been examined, and none of them supports the conclusion reached in that case. The Whitlock Case, however, does support the Hopkins Case, but it is in direct conflict with the Tribette Case, which it does not cite or mention, though it does cite the case of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Garrison, 81 Miss. 264, 95 Am. St. Rep. 469, 32 So. 996, which quotes approvingly from the Tribette Case. We concede, however, that later Mississippi cases have in effect departed from the Tribette Case, but they have not done so expressly, nor have they ever criticized it, so far as we have been able to find.

We base our conclusion chiefly upon the Tribette Case, which we concede to be the leading authority in the world upon the question of the jurisdiction of equity to prevent a multiplicity of suits. It has been reprinted time and again, and copied into the latest editions of most of the textbooks upon the subject, as stating the true doctrine. This case has been followed by Mr. Bliss (Code Pl. § 76), by Mr. Beach (Inj. § 543), and Mr. High (Inj. § 65a).

Mr. Pomeroy, in his last edition on Equity Jurisprudence, devotes a great deal of space and attention to the Tribette Case, because it had taken him to task on this question, and adds two new sections to that edition, to wit, 251½ and 251¾, to set himself right in this matter. It is quite evident from an examination of this last edition that the author does not go to the extent of upholding the equity jurisdiction of a case like the one under consideration. While he does criticize the tone of the opinion, and some things that are said by Chief Justice Campbell in the Tribette Case, yet, in the notes to his text, he admits that the decision in that case was correct.

The entire subject under review has been fully considered, and the authorities thereon discussed, in the recent case of Vandalia Coal Co. v. Lawson, 43 Ind. App. 226, 87 N. E. 47. That opinion fully sustains the decision of Chief Justice Campbell in the Tribette Case, and that of Chief Justice McClellan in the Turner Case, and criticizes rather severely our former decision in this case.

There is also a recent case (that of Ducktown Sulphur, Copper & I. Co. v. Fain, 109 Tenn. 56, 70 S. W. 813) which cites approvingly the Tribette Case, and sustains the proposition that a community of interest in the subject-matter is necessary, in order for equity to take jurisdiction to prevent a multiplicity of suits. The last two cases cited and reviewed many authorities upon the question, and, we think, show beyond question that our former decision in the Hopkins Case was wrong and should be overruled. In fact, we are of the opinion that the two new sections (the only ones) added in the last edition of Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence support us in the conclusion that there is no equity in the bill under consideration.

In § 251½, speaking to this question, "The equity suit must result in a simplification or consolidation of the issues; if after the numerous parties are joined there still remain separate issues to be tried between . . . [the several parties], nothing has been gained by the court of equity's assuming jurisdiction. In such a case, 'while the bill has only one number upon the docket and calls itself a single proceeding, it is in reality a bundle of separate suits, each of which is no doubt similar in character to the others, but rests nevertheless upon the separate and distinct liability of one defendant.'" (The author must have had this case in mind.)

All the text-writers on the subject, who have revised their texts since the decision in the Tribette Case, seem to have followed it; some of them literally quoting it at length. Beach, in his work on Injunctions (§ 543), says: "While courts of equity will freely exercise their jurisdiction in order to prevent an unnecessary and vexatious multiplicity of suits, they will not enjoin the prosecution of several pending actions at law, instituted by different plaintiffs, and compel their consolidation into a single suit in equity, at the instance of the common defendant at law, merely because the cause of action in each of the several actions at law arose from the same act of negligence or other single tort of the common defendant at law." He then sets out the opinion in the Tribette Case at length in a note to the text.

Mr. High, in his last work on Injunctions, adds a new section (85a) which states the rule as follows: "It is to be observed that, in order to justify relief by injunction for the prevention of a multiplicity of suits, there must be some common subject-matter in controversy, or some common right of interest therein, and that without this a mere community of interest in the questions of law and fact to be determined constitutes no basis for equitable relief. Thus, where numerous actions at law have been brought by separate plaintiffs against the same defendant to recover damages resulting from a fire started by sparks from complainant's locomotive, the mere fact that the questions of law and fact are the same in all the actions, and that the various parties have a common interest in those questions, will not authorize an injunction against the prosecution of the actions and the determination of the issues in equity." The only authorities cited in support of this text are the Tribette and Turner Cases.

The distinction between a community of interest in the subject-matter which will support the jurisdiction of chancery to prevent a multiplicity of suits, and a common interest in the questions of law and of fact which will not support it, is well illustrated in the Tribette Case and the authorities cited. It must be a right enjoyed in common with all the parties, and in such manner that the invasion of the right of one is an invasion of the right of all, such as a right of common fishery. Storey, Eq. Jur. 854, 855; Adams, Eq. 199.

"Two or more owners of mills propelled by water are interested in preventing an obstruction above that shall interfere with the downflow of the water, and may unite to restrain it or abate it as a nuisance; but they cannot unite in an action for damages, for, as to the injury suffered, there is no community of interest." Bliss, Cole Pl. § 76.

"When several persons, acting independently, combine to produce a nuisance, such persons may be joined as defendants in a suit for injunctive relief. . . . But there can be no joinder, either of complainants nor of defendants, for the purpose of recovering damages for the injuries caused by such nuisance." Vandalia Coal Co. v. Lawson, 43 Ind. App. 242, 87 N. E. 53; Demarest v. Hardham, 34 N. J. Eq. 469.

It is thus made to appear that all of the text-writers who have written since the Tribette Case have followed it and revised their texts accordingly. Even Mr. Pomeroy, though he speaks of the case as sensational in many of its statements, says: "It has been so frequently reprinted that it appears to call for special notice" and he proceeds to quote from it and to comment adversely upon it as to those statements which he calls sensational; yet the effect of his text and notes, as revised, is to say that the case was correctly decided. See § 251½ and note, 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. p. 425. This being true, it follows that our decision in this case on the former appeal was wrong. Roanoke Guano Co. v. Saunders, — Ala. —, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 491, 56 So. 198. We deem it just to Mr. Pomeroy, however, to say that we do not think his original text supported the decision of this court on the former appeal, and it is certain that the revised text does not.

The evil consequences of maintaining the equity of a bill like this is illustrated clearly by the record in this case. The explosion which killed the 110 workmen in question, and which is the subject of this controversy, occurred February 20, 1905, and because of this proceeding a trial of those 110 damage suits has been delayed for more than six years. Suppose the equity of the bill should be sustained and the parties proceed to trial, and the complainant fail, then, the parties plaintiff, after a delay of many years, will have to be remitted to courts of law to try each of these cases separately. Or, if the complainant succeeded, still there must be 110 trials in the court of chancery, not only as to the liability vel non, as to each of the persons killed, but as to the amount of damages recoverable in each case. If the complainant is liable under the employer's liability act, the amount for which it is liable would be different in each of the 110 cases, depending upon the earning capacity of each decedent, which, in its turn, depends upon age, character, habits, etc.

It would be difficult to select a case that would more clearly demonstrate the impracticability of the rule than the one under consideration. Contemplate 110 separate answers, and as many pleas and demurrers in one suit, and the innumerable issues of law and of fact that would be raised thereby, and the defense being conducted by 110 different attorneys, or the parties deprived of the right to have the counsel of their choice—a worse confusion could scarcely be imagined. It could be likened unto the confusion of tongues at the building of the Tower of Babel.

To reach a final decree in this case that would approach justice for all, by a trial of all these issues, and a trial in accordance with our statutes and the rules of law and chancery provided for such cases, would be wholly impracticable, if not impossible. No stronger or more conclusive argument could be produced to show that the rule announced on the former appeal is wrong than would be an attempted trial of this case upon its merits, in a chancery court, under the prayer of the bill quoted above.

No error appearing in the record, the decree of the chancellor is affirmed.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

JAMES D. QUINN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF COLORADO.

(51 Colo. 350, 117 Pac. 996.)

Intoxicating liquor—determining age of minor—inspection by jury.

The jury cannot determine the age of the purchaser by inspection only in a prosecution

Note.—Right of jury in criminal case to determine one's age by inspection or observation.

There is considerable diversity of conclusions among the authorities which have passed upon the question stated in the title. An examination of the various cases reveals holding that the jury cannot weight one's age by inspection or observation where attention has not been called to the fact that such person was on inspection for that purpose; holdings that under no circumstances can the jury take one's appearance into consideration, the ground being that such evidence cannot be preserved for review; holdings that the jury may consider personal appearance in connection with other evidence as to age; and holdings that the cution for illegally selling liquor to a minor, where at no time during the introduction of the evidence was its attention called to the fact that the prosecuting witness was on inspection for that purpose.

(October 2, 1911.)

ERROR to the Juvenile Court for the City and County of Denver to review a judgment convicting defendant of selling intoxicating liquors to a minor. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Richard Peete for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Benjamin Griffith, Attorney General, and George D. Talbot, for defendant in error:

The age may be arrived at by view or inspection.

State v. Arnold, 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 184; Garvin v. State, 52 Miss. 207; Com. v. Emmons, 98 Mass. 7; Hermann v. State, 73 Wis. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 789, 41 N. W. 171; State v. McNair, 93 N. C. 628.

Hill, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Prosecution for selling intoxicating liquors to a minor; trial by jury; verdict and judgment for the people; the defendant brings the case here for review upon error. At the close of the people's case, as well as upon the motion for a new trial, the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the conviction was challenged. Lawrence Doughty, the witness who testified to the purchase of the liquor at the defendant's drug store, was not asked and did not testify to the fact that he was a minor. He was not asked any question concerning his age, nor was any other witness asked any question concerning Doughty's age, and neither he nor any other witness gave any testimony concerning his size, general appearance, etc., pertaining to his age, or otherwise. In no manner, during the introduction of the testimony, was the jury's jury may determine age by inspection and observation even though there is no other evidence on the subject. The majority of the cases are to the effect that the jury may take personal appearance into consideration in determining age, especially where there is conflicting evidence upon the issue, but it may be of interest to note that every case, down to QUINN v. PEOPLE, in which the report shows that the contention was made that the jury could not determine age by inspection or observation, for the reason that such evidence could not be preserved for review, the court has so held, placing the decision upon that ground.

The first class of cases above referred to is illustrated by QUINN v. PEOPLE and by the similar case of Com. v. Walker, 33 Pa. Super. Ct. 167, holding it reversible attention called to the appearance of the witness in order to take that fact into consideration in passing upon his age. The learned attorney general admits that there was no testimony, oral or documentary, on this point. So the question presented is: Can the age of the minor be determined by inspection only, when at no time during the introduction of the evidence was the attention of the jury called to the fact that the witness was on inspection for that purpose? Under such a state of the record we do not think that there was any evidence upon which a conviction could be sustained. The gist of the crime charged was not the sale of the liquor; the defendant was licensed to make sales of liquors. In order to make it a crime, the sale had to be to a minor, unaccompanied by either of his parents, etc., in which case the age of the purchaser was the controlling issue. While it is true, where a witness is ten or twelve years of age, the observation of the jury as to his appearance, in connection with other evidence pertaining to his age, might be entitled to great weight (even controlling, where the evidence is conflicting), yet, where the witness is of the age of twenty years and eleven months, and of the average size and appearance of a person of that age, the observation of the jury from his appearance would be absolutely worthless; and when standing alone would be no evidence at all upon the subject. The record gives us no intimation, by a description of the error to submit the age of the accused to the jury by charging that it was its privilege to judge by his appearance, there having been no evidence offered as to his age, nor any evidence identifying him to the jury, or offer of his appearance in evidence. The court said that the better rule is that "the defendant may be identified and his appearance called to the attention of the jury as a part of the commonwealth's case, and the jury may take into consideration such appearance in determining" the age of the accused.

And in New York, under a statutory provision that "whenever, in any legal proceeding, it becomes necessary to determine the age of a child, the child may be produced for personal inspection, to enable the magistrate, court, or jury to determine the age thereby," it has been held that when produced as provided, it is for the jury to determine the age. See People v. Platt, 1 How. Pr. N. S. 402; People v. Meade, 24 Abb. N. C. 357, 10 N. Y. Supp. 943; People v. Ragone, 54 App. Div. 498, 67 N. Y. Supp. 23; People v. Dickerson, 58 App. Div. 202, 68 N. Y. Supp. 715, and People ex rel. Zeigler v. Special Sessions, Justices, 10 Hun, 224.

The second class includes cases from Illinois, Indiana, and Texas. Thus, in Wisstrand v. People, 213 Ill. 72, 72 N. E. 748, it was held that the age of one accused of rape, the age being a part of the corpus delicti, could not be fixed from an inspection of his person by the jury, where there was no proof on the point other than a voluntary confession, which of itself was insufficient, in which he stated his age as forty-four years, the ground being that although the appearance of the defendant might be conclusive evidence to the jury, it would be difficult to produce evidence of that character for the inspection of a court of review. And in Stephenson v. State, 28 Ind. 272, which is set out in QUINN v. PEOPLE, the decision was upon the ground that the Indiana statutes give the defendant in a criminal case upon conviction the right to present all the evidence given in the case for review in the appellate court, and 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) that to allow the court or jury to determine the defendant's age from his personal appearance, without other evidence, would deprive him of his right to review, as the state cannot avail itself of the court's or jurors' knowledge when not in evidence, except upon matters of which the court takes judicial notice. So, in McGuire v. State, 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 386, 15 S. W. 917, it was held error to instruct the jury to judge from the appearance of the prosecuting witness as to his age, the ground being that the personal appearance of a witness as seen by the jury cannot be put in the record and judged of on appeal.

And in Ihinger v. State, 53 Ind. 251, which is also set out in QUINN v. PEOPLE, the court, as is therein shown, went still farther by holding upon the same grounds adopted in Stephenson v. State, supra, that the appearance of the witness could not be considered, even in connection with competent evidence as to his age. Stephenson v. State and Ihinger v. State, supra, are relied upon and followed with approval in Robinius v. State, 63 Ind. 235, which was followed in Swigart v. State, 64 Ind. 598, and in Bird v. State, 104 Ind. 384, 3 N. E. 827, in which it was said that if the question were an open one, one of the judges would be inclined to take a different view.

The third class of cases, which hold that one's personal appearance may be observed by the jury in connection with other evidence, for the purpose of determining his or her age, are, for the most part, bare statements to the effect that the jury may so consider appearance, without citation of authority or statement of reasons for the conclusion. Thus, in Com. v. Phillips, 162 Mass. 504, 39 N. E. 109, followed in Com. v. Hollis, 170 Mass. 433, 49 N. E. 632, it was held, without citing any authority, that to determine the age of the prosecutrix the jury may take into consideration her appearance in connection with her testimony, the court saying that the appearance of a witness is a proper element for the consideration of the jury in weighing her testimony as to age. And a like con-witness or otherwise, as to about what his age may have been, or anything from which we can say that there was any evidence to the effect that the witness was a minor.

In Stephenson v. State, 28 Ind. 272, where the age of the defendant was material, it was held that the age of the accused must be proven by sworn testimony, and that the court or jury could not determine this fact for themselves from the personal appearance of the accused alone.

The case of Ihinger v. State, 53 Ind. 251, goes further. It holds that the appearance of a witness in respect to his age, as seen by the court or jury, cannot be considered as evidence, either with or without competent evidence of his age, in determining whether or not the defendant acted in good faith in selling him the liquor. This last case appears to be reasoned upon the theory that there is no mode of putting such evidence upon the record in order that it may be passed upon by an appellate tribunal. Also, that on the motion for a new trial the judge would have to substitute his impressions as to the appearance of the witness as to age, for those of the jury. The court concluded that the jury could not consider the appearance of the witness in respect to his age, as they viewed him, aside from evidence given as to his appearance.

Other cases take a contrary view and hold that, where there is a conflict of evidence as to the age of the witness, the jury have the right to consider his size, appearance, etc., to aid them in coming to a conclusion as to his age. State v. McNair, 93 N. C. 628.

Another class of cases, under statutes which sanction evidence obtained by view in criminal cases, holds that, where the knowledge of the person charged as to the other party being a minor is material, the jury might determine from the personal appearance or view only of the party whether the defendant knew or had reasonable grounds to believe that the witness was under the age of twenty-one years when the act complained of was committed. Hermann v. State, 73 Wis. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 789, 41 N. W. 171. This line of cases would not be altogether applicable to the case at bar. Here the lack of knowledge of the defendant, or, as alleged in this case, that of his clerk, as to the age of the witness, is immaterial; and we, at this time, do not deem it necessary to lay down any rule as controlling in all such cases.

Our conclusions are that in such cases, where there is a conflict in the evidence concerning the age of the witness, the jury should have a right to take into consideration his size, appearance, etc., in connection with the other evidence, but that when it is to be so considered, the better rule is to have such description, appearance, etc., supplied by evidence, which can be properly preserved in the record; but it probably would not be error were this omitted, where the jury's attention has been called to the appearance of the witness for that elusion was reached upon a similar state of facts in Williams v. State, 98 Ala. 52, 13 So. 333; People v. Elco, 131 Mich. 519, 91 N. W. 755 (affirmed on another point on rehearing in 131 Mich. 119, 94 N. W. 1069); State v. Davis, 237 Mo. 237, 140 S. W. 902; State v. McNair, 93 N. C. 628; Hunter v. State, 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 446, 119 Pac. 445; and State v. Sullivan, 68 Vt. 540, 35 Atl. 479. And in State v. Scroggs, 123 Iowa, 649, 96 N. W. 723, it was said that "it may be that, in connection with her [prosecutrix] evidence, her appearance and apparent majority might aid the jury in determining the age to which she had attained," citing Com. v. Phillips, and Stephenson v. State, supra, which holds to the direct contrary. See also State v. Wilson, 126 La. 661, 52 So. 981, wherein it was held that the judge could determine the age of the accused by observation, and that his conclusion would not be set aside, although there was evidence which conflicted therewith. And see Com. v. Terry, 15 Pa. Super. Ct. 608.

Those cases in which it is held that the jury may determine age by inspection and observation even when there is no other evidence with respect thereto are likewise bare announcements of the conclusions. Thus, in Com. v. Emmons, 98 Mass. 6, the court 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

held that it was not error for the judge to permit the jury to determine by personal inspection of a witness whether or not he was of age at the time of the alleged offense, without other evidence, it being said: "There is nothing in the bill of exceptions from which it can be inferred that the defendant was aggrieved by the ruling of the court in permitting the jury to judge whether one of the alleged minors was under age from his appearance on the stand. There are cases where such an inspection would be satisfactory evidence of the fact. It certainly was not incompetent for the jury to take his appearance into consideration in passing on the question of his age; and, as it does not appear that this may not have afforded plenary evidence of the fact, the defendant fails to show that he was convicted on insufficient evidence, or that he has been prejudiced by the ruling of the court." And in State v. Arnold, 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 184, where there was no proof as to age, it was said that it "could only be judged of by inspection, and so far as that goes, it must be taken to have been decided against the prisoner, both by the court and jury."

And see Hermann v. State, 73 Wis. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 789, 41 N. W. 171, as set out in QUINN v. PEOPLE. G. J. C.

purpose. But where no evidence has been offered upon the subject, and where the attention of the jury has not been called to the appearance of the witness for that purpose, it is prejudicial error to accept the finding of a jury concerning the age of the witness, when it is material to a conviction, with no evidence of any kind upon the subject.

As this error necessitates a reversal of the judgment, the others urged will not be considered. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

tract by an employee not to engage in a similar business within a certain territory is so unreasonably in restraint of trade as to render it unenforceable in a court of equity is not entirely governed by the same rule that is applied to similar contracts in a sale of a business or profession, since contracts of the former character, if covering a large territory, may violate public policy, because the covenantor's means for procuring a livelihood for himself and family are diminished thereby, and he is deprived of the power of usefulness, and the public is deprived of the benefit of the exercise by him of his knowledge and skill. Moreover, such agreements are usually not based on any consideration other than present employment, and because of the difference in the position of the parties, the employee may be coerced into an oppressive agreement.

Indeed, the doctrine has been asserted, though not applied, that the law will not permit a man to bind himself by contract not to pursue at any time or at any place the calling whereby he earns his livelihood, because, being so bound, he may become a charge upon the community. *Moorman v. Injunction — modification.

4. Direction is given that the injunction be modified in accordance with this decision.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Fulton County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to enjoin defendant from delivering maps of a competitor on any orders taken while in plaintiff's employment, from engaging in the map business for a certain time from the termination of his contract with the plaintiff, and from inducing agents of plaintiff to breach their contract. Affirmed in part.

Statement by Lumpkin, J.:

The Scarbrough Company, a corporation of the state of Maine, filed an equitable petition against C. L. Kinney, alleging in substance as follows: The defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $727.96 on an itemized bill. He was employed by the plaintiff as salesman and local manager for the sale of maps, under a written contract, for a territory to be assigned to him. On or about January 1, ing 22 Ont. L. Rep. 539, 20 Ann. Cas. 657. On this point Moss, C. J. O., says: "Restraints which may fairly be regarded as entirely reasonable when imposed in connection with the sale of a business or good will, or with the transfer of patent rights or of a trade secret, or with the dissolution of a partnership, should not be accepted in all cases as necessarily or even approximately applicable to restraints imposed upon employees to whom the only consideration for their covenant is employment and receipt of wages or remuneration for a more or less certain number of years. Such persons are ordinarily not on the same plane with one who has disposed of a very extensive business, which, by its very nature, embraces world-wide interests and connections, and involves dealings and transactions with most of the nations of the globe, and has received therefor a very large sum by way of purchase money."

The case immediately preceding holds that a restriction which practically drives an employee out of the only position in which he is at all adept, unless he quits the Dominion of Canada, is invalid in toto, because not reasonably necessary for the protection of his employer's business, which was to manufacture and deal in apparel and pressed goods of all kinds, in the machinery, raw materials, ingredients, utensils, and appurtenances necessary to such manufacture, and to carry on a general laundry business, and to manufacture and deal in the machinery, appurtenances, and ingredients pertaining thereto, where there are many places in the Dominion to which no part of such business extends.

The contrary doctrine is, however, apparently asserted in Eureka Laundry Co. v. Long, 146 Wis. 205, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 119, 131 N. W. 412, holding that it makes no substantial difference whether such a restriction is contained in a term of sale or in a term of hiring. The court reasons that if it is lawful and proper to protect a business about to be acquired, against a competing business by the seller, it is equally lawful to protect an established business from competition by an employee who has become familiar therewith. The court, however, asserts as the proper test to be applied in determining the validity of such a restriction, the rule which would apply where the distinction is made between such restrictions where incorporated in a contract for the sale of a business, and an employment contract, except that the question whether the restriction is unreasonable because prejudicial to public interest is not considered, the court asserting that such contracts must be held to be valid when reasonably necessary for the fair protection of the employer's business rights, and not unreasonably restricting the rights of the employee, due regard being had to the subject-matter of the contract and the circumstances and the conditions under which it is to be performed. It may very properly be urged, however, that the latter clause of the rule, as asserted, would really require that a distinction be made between the two classes of contracts mentioned.

Without referring to the distinction mentioned, it has been held that an agreement in a contract for the employment of a person as driver of a laundry wagon over a specified route in a city, that the employee will not, during such employment, or for two years thereafter, solicit patronage of this character from the employer's customers on the route covered by the employee, and also that he will not engage, either directly or indirectly, in a competing business in that section of the city included in his route, is a valid limitation, and will be protected by injunction. Jewel Tea Co. v. Novak, 146 Wis. 224, 131 N. W. 415.

But an agreement by an employee not to engage in a competing business in a city during the life of a contract of employment will not be enforced by enjoining a breach thereof after the contract has been terminated by the employee quitting his employment. Ibid.; Columbia College v. Turnbull, 64 Wash. 19, 116 Pac. 280.

However, a proprietor of a large business, on hiring for a fixed term, subject to sooner termination on notice, an employee to occupy a superior and managerial position, wherein he will be possessed with all of his employer's trade secrets, may lawfully provide that during the term of said employment the employee shall not enter the service of a competing concern, and the breach of such an agreement will be restrained. McCall Co. v. Wright, 198 N. Y. 143, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 249, 91 N. E. 516.

1911, the plaintiff assigned to him the territory of the state of Georgia, except nine counties thereof, which were attached to the Alabama territory, with the consent of the defendant. The contract contained the following clause: "It is further expressly agreed by and between the parties hereto that, inasmuch as the company must, in the nature of the case, instruct the salesman as to its particular system and method of doing business, and communicate facts to him in confidence, said salesman shall not, without the consent of the company in writing, within six months after the termination of this contract, directly or indirectly, or in any capacity, whether upon his own account or in connection with any other person or persons, as salesman or agent of any character for any other person, company, or corporation, engage in any business of a character similar to that conducted by the company, which might in any manner be injurious to its interests." Under the terms of the contract, as amended by the agreement of the parties, the defendant was obligated to continue in the service of the plaintiff for at least one year from October 28, 1910. In order to equip the defendant for the discharge of his duties as salesman and manager for the plaintiff, it was necessary to impart to him information as to the confidential details of the plaintiff's business, which he expressly agreed to keep in confidence, and the possession of such information by the defendant in the service of a competing concern making and selling maps renders it impossible for the defendant to comply with his obligation to keep such information confidential. On February 13, 1911, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff, stating that he had 175 orders in Atlanta, and that thereafter he would report weekly. At the time this letter was written the defendant was either negotiating with a rival map company having its principal office in Atlanta, to enter its employment, or had already agreed to enter its employment. The defendant had not complied with his duties as to sending in reports, etc., and plaintiff's treasurer determined to make a personal visit to Atlanta to investigate the situation. On February 18th the defendant wrote to the treasurer, advising him not to come, that he had quit selling the plaintiff's maps, and it would be useless for the treasurer to make the trip. The treasurer, nevertheless, went to Atlanta, and advised the defendant of the irreparable injury that would follow to the plaintiff if the defendant insisted on taking employment with a rival or competitor, and endeavored to induce the defendant not to do so, but to continue in the service of the plaintiff. The defendant declined to do so, and entered the service of the rival company as an agent. The defendant failed and refused to report to the plaintiff the names and addresses of the persons from whom he secured the 175 orders. Such orders were procured by the defendant while actually in the service of the plaintiff. Upon information and belief the plaintiff charges that the defendant intends to fill such orders with the maps of the Hudgins Company, the rival company with which he has taken service, instead of furnishing the plaintiff with information with which it can fill such orders. New maps, based on the census of 1910, will probably be delivered very shortly, and it is necessary to enjoin the defendant from delivering the maps of the Hudgins Company upon the orders taken for the plaintiff. The defendant is constantly endeavoring to "buy off" the salesmen and other agents and representatives of plaintiff in the territory of Georgia, and to induce them to breach their contracts with the plaintiff. The prayers were that the plaintiff have judgment for the amount of its account against the defendant; that the defendant be enjoined from delivering any maps of the Hudgins Company on any orders taken by the defendant while in the employment of the plaintiff; that the defendant be enjoined from taking orders or engaging in the map business with the Hudgins Company or with any other company making and selling maps in the territory of the state of Georgia, for a period of at least six months from the legal termination of the contract between the parties; that the defendant be enjoined from persuading or endeavoring to persuade the agents and salesmen of the plaintiff from leaving its service, or from in any wise interfering with plaintiff's field officers or organization for the conduct of its business, and for process and general relief. By amendment it was alleged that on May 16th the defendant filed his petition in voluntary bankruptcy, and was duly adjudged a voluntary bankrupt. It was also alleged that the plaintiff was engaged in the business of selling maps throughout the United States and Canada, with offices also in London and Paris.

The defendant denied breaking his contract, or that he had taken orders for the plaintiff which he intended to fill with maps of the Hudgins Company. He alleged that on or about December 20, 1910, he ceased to work for the plaintiff, and since that date has not worked for them or taken orders for them; that about February 23d the treasurer of the plaintiff expressly agreed with defendant that the contract set out by the plaintiff was no longer binding upon either party, and expressly relieved the defendant of all responsibility or obligation under it; and that the treasurer offered to make an entirely new contract with the defendant, but after consideration the latter declined it. He denied that he had received any confidential or peculiar information or instructions from the plaintiff, and alleged that the nature of the services which he agreed to render were of an ordinary, and not of an expert or peculiar, nature. He set up that the only negative covenant contained in the contract, preventing his entering the service of another company after termination of his contract with the plaintiff, was in general restraint of trade and not enforceable.

On the hearing, conflicting evidence was introduced. The presiding judge granted the injunction prayed for by the plaintiff upon its filing a damage bond in the sum of $1,000, if exception should be taken and the judgment reversed. Defendant excepted.

Messrs. Dorsey & Shelton, for plaintiff in error:

An agreement, without limitations as to space or territory, not to carry on a particular trade or business, said trade in itself being lawful, is unenforceable, as being against the policy of the law. Such a contract has been held to be in general restraint of trade, and therefore null, void, and unenforceable.

Equity will enjoin an employee from entering the service of a rival concern, provided there is a reasonable limitation as to time, the only limitation as to territory being the scope of the employer's business, and the fact of rivalry or competition between the first and second employers.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Two divergent lines of decisions have arisen in regard to the territorial limitation necessary for the upholding of contracts in restraint of trade, in connection with a sale of a business and good will, the retiring of a partner, or the like. Two points of view affect this: First, looking at the matter with a special consideration of the parties immediately concerned and their protection; and, second, viewing it from the standpoint of the public, and the interest which it has in the freedom of trade, and in not having parties cut off from a means of livelihood, thus tending to diminish the resources, wealth, and useful population of the state or country. In the earlier English cases the rule was quite stringently declared against contracts in restraint of trade, and it was thought to have been fully adjudicated that contracts in restraint of trade, without territorial limitation, would not be upheld, as being against public policy. Year Book 2 Henry V, pl. 26; Claygate v. Batchelor, Owen, 143; Price v. Green, 16 Mees. & W. 346, 16 L. J. Exch. N. S. 108, 9 Jur. 880, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 406. Contracts in restraint of trade within a limited area, and reasonable in their nature, came to be recognized and enforced as not being in general restraint. In later English cases the older ones have been explained as being cases in which the territory over which the restraint operated was greater than was necessary to protect the business of the contracting party. The earlier decisions had been followed in numerous jurisdictions before this explanation, and a number of courts adhered to the rule. It is considered in such jurisdictions that, where the area within which the limitation operates is so large as to cause the public interest to suffer, the contract cannot be upheld, although the business sought to be protected may extend over the entire area. On the other hand, some of the state and Federal courts have followed the modern English view, and hold that, if the area over which the restraint is to operate is not greater than that covered by the business to be protected, it is not against public policy, although it may include the entire country. 1 Page, Contr. §§ 376-379.

Without undertaking to discuss how large an area may be embraced in a contract in restraint of trade, if reasonably necessary for the protection of the good will of a business transferred, it is settled in this state that a contract in restraint of trade without territorial limitation is contrary to public policy and unenforceable. Civil Code 1910, § 4253; Seay v. Spratling, 133 Ga. 27, 65 S. E. 137. We are not now dealing with contracts of monopoly, strictly so called, or contracts merely agreeing not to do business, without being ancillary to a sale of business or good will. They may involve another feature.

The jurisdiction of equity to enjoin a person from doing business or performing service of a certain character has generally been invoked under one of four heads: (1) Where there has been a sale of a business and good will, with an ancillary agreement by the seller not to engage in the business in a certain territory. (2) Contracts by which an employee agrees to give his entire service to the employer, which sometimes include an express negative covenant not to serve any other person within a fixed time and territory. In such cases the negative covenant will not be enforced by injunction, unless the services are of a peculiar merit or character, and cannot be performed by others. Hammond v. Georgian Co. 133 Ga. 1 (3), 65 S. E. 124. Contracts binding one to desist from the practice of a learned profession. (4) A contract by an employee, ancillary to his contract of employment, not to engage in a competing business, for himself or as an employee of another. In the present case the effort to obtain an injunction is made under the last head mentioned. The general principles as to territorial limitation upon restraint of trade, above mentioned, are applicable to all of the subdivisions of that topic, though each may have some differentiating features. Indeed, the courts have shown greater reluctance in reference to enjoining a man from performing personal service or labor than from conducting a business.

It was contended in behalf of the defendant in error that in Rakestraw v. Lanier, 104 Ga. 188, 201, 69 Am. St. Rep. 154, 30 S. E. 735, 741, a distinction was made between a contract binding one to desist from the practice of a learned profession and a contract binding a person who has sold out a mercantile or other kind of business, and the good will connected therewith, not to again engage in that business. This is true, but the distinction was not that in the former contract no limitation as to space was necessary, but that a reasonable limitation as to time was also necessary. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

After referring to contracts in general and partial restraint of trade, Mr. Justice Little said: "We test this contract by the rules before referred to, and find it supported by a legal consideration. Being limited as to space, although unlimited as to time, we find that it may properly be classed among contracts in partial restraint of trade. When we seek its terms to ascertain whether it is reasonable, made to protect the promisee, and not oppressive on the promisor, we find that the facts were such as to render the limitation arbitrary and unreasonable. Thus it was held that in such a case, not only must the restraint of trade be partial, and not general, but it must also be proportioned to the legitimate object to be subserved, and not unreasonable in character. If the doctrine of that case be applied to the present one, it will not help the plaintiff. We are aware that there are a number of cases which have sustained agreements, ancillary to employment, that the employee would not enter into the service of a competitor or rival of the employer for a specified time after leaving his service. In some of them there was a limitation as to space. In some, courts which follow the modern English rule above mentioned looked at the matter from the standpoint of reasonable protection entirely. But we are of the opinion that our decisions require a limitation as to space, and that this rule applies to the present case as well as to one in which there has been a sale of property and good will. We therefore hold that the provision of the contract here involved, which was unlimited as to space, was not enforceable.

2. It does not appear that any secret formula or technical trade secrets were involved. But there was evidence tending to show that the defendant, by virtue of his position, had acquired knowledge of the customers of the plaintiff; that, while pretending to be acting in their interest, informing them that he had taken a number of orders, and promising to make reports, he had actually contracted to represent a rival company; that he pursued a policy of double dealing for some time; that, when he finally left the employment of the plaintiff, and notified them of the fact, he failed to deliver to them the orders which he previously reported that he had taken; and that he intended to fill such orders with maps furnished by his new employer. This can be prevented by injunction; and on the interlocutory hearing the questions of fact involved were for the consideration of the presiding judge.

3. Furthermore, there was evidence tending to show that the defendant had sought to induce his successor in the employment of the plaintiff to violate the contract of employment with the plaintiff and to join him in the new employment, and that he boasted that he had induced some of the plaintiff's employees to leave its service and take positions with the new employer. As if to emphasize the fact that the plaintiff had no adequate remedy at law for the injuries thus done, the defendant proceeded to go into voluntary bankruptcy. Aside from the question of restraint of trade involved in the preceding discussion, such conduct on the part of a trusted employee furnished sufficient basis to authorize a temporary injunction as to this matter. It is true that the defendant denied most of the allegations of the plaintiff, and claimed that he had been voluntarily released from its service. But the presiding judge was not compelled to accept his theory of the transaction, and there was sufficient evidence on which to base an injunction touching the matters last mentioned.

It was argued on behalf of the defendant that injunction should not be granted to protect the contracts of the plaintiff with its other employees against interference by this insolvent exemployee; and in support of this position were cited the cases of Stein v. National Life Asso. 105 Ga. 821, 46 L.R.A. 150, 32 S. E. 615, and Jones v. Van Winkle Gin & Mach. Co. 131 Ga. 336, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 848, 127 Am. St. Rep. 235, 62 S. E. 236. But in each of those cases it was distinctly declared that no question of inducing violation of contracts was involved. On the general subject, see Beekman v. Marsters, 195 Mass. 205, 80 N. E. 817, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 201, and note, 122 Am. St. Rep. 232, 11 Ann. Cas. 332; Employing Printers' Club v. Dr. Blosser Co. 122 Ga. 509 (2), 69 L.R.A. 90, 106 Am. St. Rep. 137, 50 S. E. 353, 2 Ann. Cas. 694.

4. In so far as the injunction restrained the defendant from taking orders or engaging in the map business with the second company for six months from the termination of the contract existing between him and the plaintiff, it must be reversed. In so far as it was sought to enjoin the defendant from delivering maps of the new company on orders taken by the defendant while in the employment of the plaintiff, and from inducing or endeavoring to induce the agents and salesmen of the plaintiff to violate their contracts with the plaintiff, and leave its service, in violation thereof, the injunction was authorized. Direction is given that the injunctive order be modified so as to accord with this decision.

material modification of the judgment, is entitled to costs of the exception.

Judgment affirmed in part and reversed in part, with direction.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF IOWA

v.

JOE DEWEY et al., Appts.

(— Iowa, —, 136 N. W. 533.)

Kidnapping — possession by parent — liability.

1. Neither a father nor his assistant is guilty of kidnapping where they obtain by misrepresentation peaceable possession of his child from its mother, who has begun divorce proceedings against the father, but no order has been made affecting the custody of the child.

Criminal law — transcripts of evidence — right to.

2. A defendant with property and one who does not intend to press his appeal are not entitled to free transcripts of notes of evidence taken at the trial.

(June 5, 1912.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Calhoun County, convicting them of conspiring to kidnap certain children. Reversed in part.

Statement by Sherwin, J.:

The defendants were convicted of the crime of conspiracy to commit a felony; to wit, to kidnap the two minor children of the defendant Joe Dewey. The defendants appeal.

Mr. W. E. Gray, for appellants:

A father who takes possession of his minor child from its mother or other person, where its custody has not been awarded to her or them by a competent tribunal, does not commit the crime of kidnapping.

Com. v. Myers, 146 Pa. 24, 23 Atl. 164; Burns v. Com. 129 Pa. 138, 18 Atl. 756; Hunt v. Hunt, 94 Ga. 257, 21 S. E. 515; State v. Angel, 42 Kan. 216, 21 Pac. 1075; State v. Beslin, 19 Idaho, 185, 112 Pac. 1055; John v. State, 6 Wyo. 203, 44 Pac. 51; Biggs v. State, 13 Wyo. 94, 77 Pac.

Note. — The question whether the taking of a child by or at the instance of one parent, from the custody of the other parent, constitutes kidnapping, is considered in the note to State v. Brandenburg, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 845.

The person who assists the father under these circumstances to obtain possession of his minor child or children has not committed the crime of kidnapping.

Com. v. Myers, 146 Pa. 24, 23 Atl. 164; State v. Beslin, 19 Idaho, 185, 112 Pac. 1055; John v. State, 6 Wyo. 203, 44 Pac. 51; State v. Angel, 42 Kan. 216, 21 Pac. 1075.

It is immaterial how reprehensible their actions may have been.

John v. State, 6 Wyo. 203, 44 Pac. 51; State v. Beslin, 19 Idaho, 185, 112 Pac. 1055.

It is no crime for a number of persons to confederate, agree, or conspire together to do an act that is lawful in itself.

Com. v. Myers, 146 Pa. 24, 23 Atl. 164; United States v. Goldberg, 7 Biss. 176, Fed. Cas. No. 15,223.

Upon a reasonable showing of inability of a person found guilty of a crime to have the shorthand notes extended at his own expense, the court before whom the trial was had shall order the same extended at the expense of the county where tried.

State v. Adams, — Iowa, —, 133 N. W. 706; State v. Goodsell, 136 Iowa, 445, 113 N. W. 826; State v. Wright, 111 Iowa, 621, 82 N. W. 1013; State v. Harris, 151 Iowa, 234, 130 N. W. 1082.

Messrs. George Cosson, Attorney General, and John Fletcher, Assistant Attorney General, for the State:

Two or more persons may be jointly indicted for a criminal act which is of such a nature that it can be actually committed by but one of such persons.

State v. Berger, 121 Iowa, 581, 96 N. W. 1094; State v. Rowe, 104 Iowa, 323, 73 N. W. 833; State v. Comstock, 46 Iowa, 265.

Slaughter was engaged in the commission of an act which was unlawful for him to commit; and to say that because the person with whom he conspired to commit the act was the father of the children would purge the act of its unlawful character is far exceeding the bounds of good reasoning.

State v. Munchrath, 78 Iowa, 268, 43 N. W. 211; State v. McCahill, 72 Iowa, 111, 30 N. W. 553, 33 N. W. 599; State v. Pasnau, 118 Iowa, 501, 92 N. W. 682.

Sherwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

two little girls under five years of age, and prior to September, 1911, Mrs. Dewey lived with her husband in New Mexico, which place is still his home. In September, 1911, a brother of Mrs. Dewey visited the Deweys in New Mexico, and while there he caused the arrest of the husband, Joe Dewey, and his incarceration in jail; and while Dewey was in jail, Mrs. Dewey left New Mexico with her children and her brother and came to Calhoun county, Iowa. She did not tell Dewey that she was going to leave New Mexico, and, so far as the record discloses, he did not know of her action until she had left. While she had before this time commenced an action for a divorce, which was then pending, no order had been made in the case that would in any way affect the right of either to the custody of the children. On the 19th day of December, 1911, Mrs. Dewey and the two children were at the home of her uncle, Mr. A. N. Sumner, who was a farmer in Calhoun county. About 9 o'clock that night these two defendants, Joe Dewey and Fred Slaughter, went to the home of Mr. Sumner and obtained peaceable possession of the two children by representing that Slaughter was an officer from New Mexico, and that he had an order of court for the delivery of the children to him. This claim was false, and before the children were taken from the state, or in fact far from Mr. Sumner's home, the defendants were arrested and the children were returned to Mrs. Dewey. The appellants insist that many errors were committed by the court in its rulings during the trial, but most of the complaints are wholly without merit; and, in view of our conclusion on the main question, whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain the conviction, we need not more specifically notice these alleged errors. It is conceded by the state that, had Dewey in his own right, as the parent of the children, gone to the Sumner home, and peaceably obtained possession of the children for the purpose of taking them to New Mexico, he would not be guilty of any offense. And it must follow, of course, that under such circumstances Slaughter could not be any more guilty than Dewey, because, if he was simply aiding Dewey to do a lawful act in a lawful way, he could not be more guilty than his principal.

Where a father is entitled to the possession of his minor child as against all of the world except its mother, and where the father and mother are equally entitled to its possession, he does not commit the crime of kidnapping by taking possession of it. Com. v. Myers, 146 Pa. 24, 23 Atl. 164; Hunt v. Hunt, 94 Ga. 257, 21 S. E.

515; People v. Congdon, 77 Mich. 351, 43 N. W. 986; 24 Cyc. 797.

And a person who assists the father under such circumstances is not guilty of the crime. Com. v. Myers, 146 Pa. 24, 23 Atl. 164; State v. Bealin, 19 Idaho, 185, 112 Pac. 1055; John v. State, 6 Wyo. 203, 44 Pac. 51; State v. Angel, 42 Kan. 216, 21 Pac. 1075.

The case is then really brought down to the narrow question whether these defendants took possession of the children for Dewey or for Slaughter; the state insisting that the latter was the case. We cannot agree with the contention. Every line of the record points in the one direction,—that Dewey was after his children, and that Slaughter was merely assisting him by personating an officer. For some unaccountable reason, the exact way in which Slaughter came to be connected with the affair does not appear; but enough is shown to convince us that he was only assisting Dewey, and that he should not be punished therefor on the evidence before us. On the main case, therefore, the judgment will be reversed as to both defendants.

Both defendants asked for transcripts of the shorthand notes of the evidence at the expense of the county, and both requests were refused, and we think rightly so. Dewey was shown to have considerable property in New Mexico, and he was clearly not entitled to a free transcript; and, when the court ruled on Slaughter's application, the court had before it Slaughter's own statement that he did not intend to press his appeal to this court.

The judgment convicting the defendants is reversed, and the order refusing them free transcripts is affirmed.

Reversed in part and affirmed in part.

Provosty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant keeps a confectionery where refreshments are served to the public, to be consumed on the premises. Plaintiff alleges that he was ptomaine-poisoned from having eaten cakes and chocolate with whipped cream at defendant's establishment, and demands $750 damages for the sufferings caused by the illness.

The defense is that the said food was wholesome, and plaintiff was not poisoned; but that, if he was, defendant is not responsible, because not guilty of any negligence; and that, at all events, the measure of the damages is simply the restitution of the price.

which is corrupt, without warranty, an action lies, because it is against the commonwealth." Roswel v. Vaughan, Cro. Jac. 196, citing the Year Books, Hen. VI. pl. 53; 7 Hen. IV. pl. 15; 11 Edw. IV. pl. 6.

And it was said that a publican who sold unwholesome food or drink was liable for consequent injuries to a patron. Rolle, Abr. 95, 1 Bl. Com. 430.

In Bishop v. Weber, 139 Mass. 411, 52 Am. Rep. 715, 1 N. E. 154, holding that a public caterer employed to furnish refreshments at a public ball is liable for injuries occasioned by unwholesome provisions furnished by him, the court says that the furnishing of provisions which endanger human life or health stands clearly upon the same ground as the administering of improper medicine, from which a liability springs irrespective of any question of privity of contract between the parties. It was further held that it was not necessary 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

We agree with the trial court and with the court of appeal in finding that plaintiff was poisoned as alleged. He partook of the said refreshments at about 11 o'clock at night, and, on leaving defendant's establishment, went home and to bed, after having escorted to her home a lady who accompanied him; and at about 5 o'clock the next morning the symptoms of the poisoning manifested themselves. He had taken no other food during that day or the day before except such as all his family had shared with him without being made sick. The lady who accompanied him at defendant's establishment on the occasion in question ate ice cream and cakes, and was, like him, taken sick during the night from ptomaine poisoning.

In proof of absence of negligence on its part, defendant produced its purchasing agent and its head baker and the traders from whom it buys its flour, sugar, eggs, and butter. The clerk testified that he purchased none but the best flour, sugar, eggs, milk, and butter, and that great care was exercised in keeping everything about defendant's establishment clean. The baker testified that he took great care to keep things clean, and that they were kept so. On cross-examination, he said that an investigation had been made of defendant's establishment by the health authorities in the early part of 1909, and that some two months before the time of his testifying the boss had told him of a young man having been made sick. Comparison of dates shows that this young man was not plaintiff, and that the board of health's investigation was some nine months before the poisoning of plaintiff. The traders called as witnesses testified that defendant bought none but the best flour, sugar, eggs, and butter.

This evidence falls short of showing even ordinary care, since it contains not a word to aver that the defendant knew of the injurious quality of the food, but that it was sufficient if it appeared that he ought to have known of it.

But it is held in Sheffer v. Willoughby, 163 Ill. 518, 34 L.R.A. 464, 54 Am. St. Rep. 483, 45 N. E. 253, that, in order to recover damages from the keeper of a restaurant for injuries resulting from unwholesome food served by him, it must appear that there was negligence on his part; and that the mere fact of the eating of the food and the consequent sickness is not sufficient to make a prima facie case of negligence.

As to criminal liability for adulteration of food by servant, agent, or partner, see the note in 41 L.R.A. 656.

As to whether ignorance that an article furnished as butter is oleomargarin constitutes a defense, see the note in 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 746.

touching the time when the particular eggs, milk, cream, and butter served to plaintiff and his lady companion had been bought, or when the ice cream, cakes, and chocolate had been made; so that, for what appears, the materials out of which these refreshments had been made may have had ample time to deteriorate on defendant's hands, and the refreshments themselves may have been of long standing—kept on hand indefinitely until they should be disposed of in due course of business.

The principle which governs in this case is that everyone ought to know the qualities, good or bad, of the things which he fabricates in the exercise of the art, craft, or business of which he makes public profession, and that lack of such knowledge is imputed to him as a fault, which makes him liable to the purchasers of his fabrications for the damage resulting from the vices or defects thereof which he did not make known to them and which they were ignorant of.

This principle obtains both in the civil and the common law, as appears from the excerpts hereinafter given.

It is needless to consider what qualifications or restrictions this principle may suffer in particular cases. Suffice it to say that it has full play in the present case, where chocolate and cakes were sold at a public eating place, to be consumed on the premises. It is easily possible for the keeper of such a place to know in all cases whether the eggs, milk, and butter he sells, or the articles of food he has made out of them, are fresh and fit for human consumption. He is therefore at fault if these articles prove to be vitiated and deleterious.

The measure of damages in a case of this kind, where there was no actual knowledge of the vices of the things sold, but only an imputed knowledge, is not simply reimbursement of the price, as contended by defendant, but liability on the part of the seller for all the damages that were foreseen, or could easily have been foreseen, as likely to result from the putting of the thing sold to the use for which it was sold. This fully appears from the excerpts hereinafter given.

It is common knowledge, to which the keeper of a public eating place must be held, that food in which the process of decomposition has begun is liable to make the person who eats it ill. Indeed, we do not think there can be any serious difference of opinion on the point that an eating establishment which sells unwholesome food to be consumed by its customers must be held to have contemplated the probable effects of such tainted food upon the customer.

The sole question must then be as to what amount of damages was caused to plaintiff by his illness. He says he was attacked with intense pains in the stomach, with vomiting and great looseness of the bowels; that he tried to get a physician at once, but did not succeed in getting one for two hours; that until the physician came he was badly frightened, thinking himself in danger of death; that he remained in bed that day; that he continued to have pains in his stomach for about a month; that this illness brought on an attack of jaundice which lasted about six weeks.

The physician testified that he found plaintiff prostrated and in a stupor, with small, weak pulse, and that plaintiff was vomiting, and suffering from cramps in the bowels, which seemed to be intense.

The court of appeal allowed $100 damages.

Excerpts bearing upon imputed fault.

In the case of McCubbin v. Hastings, 27 La. Ann. 713, where a druggist's clerk had by mistake sold spirits of camphor instead of camphor water for the purpose of an enema, and the plea of absence of negligence was made, this court said: "It may, however, be assumed that he was competent. The defendant's liability would be none the less certain. The defendant is himself represented as being a most competent druggist. If he had made the mistake, would his proficiency in his calling shield him? Or would it not rather aggravate the fault? Incompetency and carelessness—and such mistakes arise from one or the other of these causes—result in the same way. Either or both produce suffering and sometimes death. And can it be that if a physician should prescribe for his slightly ailing patient a small quantity of calomel and soda, and the druggist were to substitute arsenic for soda, that he could shield himself from the consequences which might result by saying, if the prescription was compounded by himself, that it was a mistake, and, if the act of his servant, that he could not have prevented it? The law does not place a community in the position of being poisoned by mistakes with no one to be held responsible therefor. If it was the master who did the wrong, the master is responsible. If it was his servant who did it, he is still responsible, for the master is responsible for the acts of his servant when done in the course of his usual employment."

From 2 Kent, Com. 588: "Every man is presumed to possess the ordinary skill requisite to the due exercise of the art or trade which he assumes, Spondet peritiam artis, and imperitia culpa annumeratur,"—citing Dig. 19, 2, 25, 7.

From Pothier, Vente, § 214: "This is a case where the vendor, although he was entirely ignorant of the vice of the thing sold, is nevertheless bound to repair the damage which this vice may have caused the vendor in his other property; it is the case where the vendor is a workman or a merchant who sells the fabrications of the art or trade of which he makes profession. Such workman or merchant is bound to repair whatever damage the buyer may have suffered from the vice of the thing sold in putting it to the use for which it was intended, even if such workman or merchant would pretend to have been ignorant of said vice.

"The reason is that a workman, by reason of the profession which he makes of being skilled in his craft, spondet peritiam artis (makes the solemn promise, or gives the solemn pledge, of his proficiency in his art). He renders himself responsible towards all those who contract with him, for the things he makes being fit for the use to which they are naturally destined. His unskillfulness or lack of knowledge in all that concerns his art is a fault which is imputed to him, as no one should publicly make profession of an art if he is not possessed of all the knowledge necessary for exercising it well; imperitia culpa annumeratur (incompetency is reckoned a fault). Dig. L. 132, Reg. Juris."

From Dalloz, Codes Annotés, art. 1645, No. 15, 16: "But there is an hypothesis under which the purchaser will not be required to make this proof" (the proof that the vice was apparent, or that the vendor had knowledge of it). "It is where, by reason of the profession which he exercises, the vendor should have known even the hidden defects of the things he sells."

"Thus, even though the vendor was ignorant of the vices of the thing sold, if by his profession he was bound to know them, he is in fault, and ought to indemnify the purchaser for the damage suffered; good faith does not exclude incompetency,"—citing Aix, 4 Jan. 1872, Dalloz & Journal du Palais, 1873, pt. 2, p. 55; Troplong, Vente, vol. 2, No. 574; Duvergier, Vente, vol. 1, No. 412; Aubry & Rau, Vente, 4th ed. vol. 4, No. 355, bis. p. 389; Gouillouard, 3d ed. vol. 1, No. 462; Baudry-Lacantinerie & Saignat, Vente, No. 436.

This last reference, loc cit., reads as follows: "However, it is generally conceded that the vendor is presumed to know the vices of the thing sold when he is a workman or manufacturer, selling the things of his own fabrication; he ought to know their defects, and, if he makes the sale without revealing these defects to the purchaser, he ought to repair the damage which the latter may suffer therefrom; he ought to know what he sells, since it is his own production, and, if he does not know it, there is on his part an incompetency which is a professional fault, whereby he is rendered responsible for the damage."

See George v. Shreveport Cotton Oil Co. 114 La. 498-505, 38 So. 432, for a citation from Laurent to same effect.

From Troplong, Vente, art. 1647, C. C. No. 574: "The workman or merchant who sells fabrications of their craft or commerce are assimilated to the person who knows the vices of the thing he sells, and who, by the vice of the thing sold, has caused damage to the purchaser."

In the case of George v. Shreveport Cotton Oil Co. supra, this court had occasion to affirm the doctrine that a manufacturer is conclusively presumed to have known the defects of the things of his own manufacture which he has sold.

That doctrine is well recognized at common law. Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, 110 U. S. 108, 28 L. ed. 86, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 537.

It can be considered to be also well settled at common law that the vendor of articles of food for consumption by the purchaser warrants their wholesomeness. This is shown by the following excerpts:

From Addison on Contracts, Morgan's ed. vol. 2, p. 218, § 621: "Every victualer and dealer in provisions who sells provisions impliedly warrants them to be wholesome and fit for food. If I come to a tavern to eat, and the taverner gives and sells me meat and drink corrupted, whereby I am made sick, an action lies against him without any express warranty, because it is a warranty in law."

And in a note to the above: "In a case of provisions it will readily be presumed that the vendor intended to represent them as sound and wholesome, because the very offer of articles of food for sale implies this, and it may readily be presumed that a common vendor of articles of food, from the nature of his calling, knows whether they are unwholesome and unsound or not. From the fact of their being bad, therefore, a false and fraudulent representation may readily be presumed. But these reasons do not apply to the case of provisions packed, inspected, and prepared for exportation in large quantities as merchandise,"—per Shaw, Ch. J., in Winsor v. Lombard, 18 Pick. 57.

And see French v. Vining, 102 Mass. 132, 136, 3 Am. Rep. 440; Van Bracklin v. Fonda, 12 Johns. 468, 7 Am. Dec. 339; Marshall v. Peck, 1 Dana, 612; Humphreys

v. Comline, 8 Blackf. 516; Moses v. Mead, 1 Denio, 378, 43 Am. Dec. 676; Hoover v. Peters, 18 Mich. 51; Divine v. McCormick, 50 Barb. 116; Davis v. Murphy, 14 Ind. 158; Osgood v. Lewis, 2 Harr. & G. 495, 18 Am. Dec. 317; Emerson v. Brigham, 10 Mass. 197, 6 Am. Dec. 109. It has been held that there is no implied warranty in selling provisions as articles of merchandise, to one to sell again. Winsor v. Lombard, 18 Pick. 57; Moses v. Mead, 5 Denio, 617; Hart v. Wright, 17 Wend. 267; Emerson v. Brigham, 10 Mass. 197, 6 Am. Dec. 109.

From 22 L.R.A. 195, note: "In the case of the sale of articles of food to be consumed directly in domestic uses, there is, as between the dealer and consumer, an implied warranty that such articles are sound and wholesome,"—citing a long list of cases.

From the note to Sheffer v. Willoughby, in 54 Am. St. Rep. 483: "A public caterer employed to furnish refreshments at a public ball is liable for an injury suffered by one attending, by reason of unwholesome provisions furnished by him. Bishop v. Weber, 139 Mass. 411, 52 Am. Rep. 715, 1 N. E. 154. In the sale of provisions for domestic use there is an implied warranty that they are sound and wholesome. Van Bracklin v. Fonda (12 Johns. 468), 7 Am. Dec. 339, and note."

It will be noted from the foregoing that the vendor of food to be consumed by the purchaser is conclusively presumed to know the condition of the food he sells, and to represent to the purchaser that such food is wholesome. In other words, the representation which he is thus presumed to make to the purchaser is not merely that he has been careful in the selection, preparation, and preservation of the food, but that the food is, as a matter of fact, wholesome. When, therefore, the food proves to be unwholesome, the warranty is breached, and he is responsible.

Excerpts bearing upon the measure of damages.

From Mourion, arts. 1645, 1646: "A dealer in barrels has sold you a barrel that was defective, but he was ignorant of the defect. He is not guilty of fraud, but he is in fault; for one can easily ascertain the qualities and defects of the things the dealing in which constitutes one's business. In such a case, the vendor owes, in addition to the restitution of price, the damages foreseen, or which could easily have been foreseen, at the time of entering into the contract; for example, the loss of the wine which you have put in the barrel. But he does not answer for those damages that could not have been foreseen at the time of the contract. So that, if you have put into the barrel a liquor of great value, he owes you only an indemnity equal to the value of ordinary wine to which the barrel was naturally destined."

From Pothier, Obligations, No. 162, Evans's Translation: "Sometimes the debtor is liable for the damages and interests of the creditor, although extrinsic; which is the case when it appears that they were contemplated in the contract, and that the debtor submitted to them either expressly or tacitly, in case of the nonperformance of his obligation. For instance, I sell my horse to a canon, and there is an express clause in the agreement, by which I am obliged to deliver it to him, so that he may arrive at the place of his benefice in time to be entitled to his revenues. If in this case I make default, in discharging my obligation, though without any fraud, and the canon could not either get another horse or any other conveyance, I shall be answerable even for the extrinsic damages arising from the loss of his revenues; for by the clause of the agreement the risk of this damage was foreseen and expressed, and I am deemed to have taken it upon myself.

"So, if I let my house to a person in his quality as a tradesman, or for the purpose of being used as an inn, and the tenant is evicted, the damages and interests, for which I am answerable to him, will not be confined to the expense of removal, and the advance of rents, as in the former instance. The loss of custom, if he cannot meet with any other suitable house in the neighborhood, ought also in some degree to be taken in the account; for having let my house for the purpose of a shop, or an inn, this kind of damage is one whereof the risk is foreseen, and to which I am considered as having tacitly submitted.

"The following is another instance of this distinction: A person sells me some pieces of wood, which I have used to prop my building, and on account of the insufficiency of the props, the building gives way. If the seller was not a person acting in the course of his business, and had fairly sold me these pieces of wood without knowing of their defect, the damages and interests would only consist in a reduction of the price on account of my having given him too much, by buying the wood as good, which was defective, and will not extend to the loss arising from the failure of the building. For the seller, who sold me the wood fairly, and who was not obliged to know any more of it than I, is not deemed to have undertaken this loss. L. 13. ff. de act. empt.

"But if the person who sold me these props acted in the course of his business, and was a carpenter, selling them for the purpose of supporting my building, he will be answerable for my damages and interest arising from the building giving way on account of the insufficiency of the props, and will not be permitted to allege that he thought they were good and sufficient; for, admitting what he says to be true, this ignorance on his part would not be excusable in a person making a public profession of an art; for in this case imperitia culpa annumeratur, l. 132. ff. de R. I. In selling me these props, and selling them in his quality of a carpenter, he is held to render himself responsible for their sufficiency, and to have subjected himself to the risk of my building, if they were not so. Melin. tract. de eo quod interest, N. 51."

In the case of Aix, Jan. 1872, Dalloz, Juris. Gen. & Journal du Palais, 1873, pt. 2, p. 55, cited supra, in support of the extract, supra, from Dalloz, Codes Annotés, the court held a merchant who had sold a gun was responsible for the damage caused to the purchaser by the explosion of the gun. From a most learned note to the report of said decision, in Dalloz, we extract the following: "It is impossible not to consider the accident caused by the explosion of the gun as a damage flowing directly from the fault of the seller of the gun."

From 35 Cyc. 443: "The buyer may show not only the diminished value of the goods, but also damage suffered by the breach [of the warranty] in excess of the seller's claim."

From the decisions of the court of appeals of New York in the case of Milburn v. Belloni, 39 N. Y. 53, 100 Am. Dec. 403: "In the recent case of Passinger v. Thorburn, 34 N. Y. 634, 90 Am. Dec. 753, all the cases are reviewed by Judge Davies. There the defendant had sold a quantity of cabbage seed, and had warranted that it would produce Bristol cabbage. It turned out to be seed of an inferior quality, and the crop produced was of little value. Under the ruling of the judge, the jury gave the plaintiff as damages the value of the crop as it would have been if of Bristol cabbage, as ordinarily produced that year, deducting the expense of raising the crop, and deducting the value of the crop actually raised thereupon. This principle was sustained in this court. The case of Smeed v. Foord, 1 El. & El. 602, 28 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 178, 5 Jur. N. S. 291, 7 Week. Rep. 266, laid down the rule that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the damages which are the natural consequence of the breach of the contract. A machine to be used for threshing wheat was not delivered at the time agreed upon, in consequence of which the wheat was stacked and afterward injured by the rain. This injury, and the loss and expense which it involved, were held to be the natural results of the defendant's delay.

"In Borradaile v. Brunton, 8 Taunt. 535, the loss of the anchor was held to be a natural result of the insufficiency of a cable sold for holding an anchor, and warranted to last for two years.

"In Brown v. Edgington, 2 Mann. & G. 279, the loss of a pipe of wine by the breaking of a rope attached to a crane, sold for that use, was held to fall properly within the scope of damages for selling an insufficient rope to be used upon such crane."

From Parsons on Contracts, 9th ed. vol. 1, *593: "The general rule of the amount of damage would be the price paid if the would be the difference between the price paid and the actual value. But if further damage resulted directly from the breach of warranty, that, too, would be recovered. Thus one selling coal dust to be used in making brick, and warranting it free from soft coal, was held responsible for the damage done to the bricks by the soft coal dust in that which was sold. Milburn v. Belloni, 39 N. Y. 53, 100 Am. Dec. 403."

From 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1259: "While . . . the ordinary measure of damages applying to warranties of personal property is the difference between the actual value of the articles sold and their value if they had been such as warranted, additional damages may be recovered for breach of the implied warranty of quality, if they are such as may be fairly supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties when they made the contract, when they are such as might naturally be expected to follow its violation, and when they are capable of being definitely ascertained."

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be affirmed. Defendant to pay all costs.

TRI-STATE TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(118 Minn. 217, 136 N. W. 741.)

Master and servant — negligent use of X-ray — liability.

1. Plaintiff was injured while in the employ of defendant, and defendant, for its own purposes, employed a doctor to take an X-ray picture of plaintiff's injury. Plaintiff protested against this, but finally consented. An attempt to take the picture resulted in injury to plaintiff. In this action to recover for such injury it is held that in exposing plaintiff to the X-ray the physician was the agent or servant of defendant, and the rule of respondet superior applies.

Same — negligence — res ipsa loquitur.

2. The instrumentality being entirely under control of defendant, there being evidence that with proper instrumentalities and proper care the exposure to the X-ray does not result in injury to the subject, and evidence that such injury did so result in this case, the rule of res ipsa loquitur applies, and defendant failed to show conclusively that it was not negligent.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Hennepin County, denying its motion for judgment notwithstanding a verdict in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries sustained from exposure of plaintiff's person to the X-ray. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Olson v. Great Northern R. Co. 68 Minn. 155, 71 N. W. 5; Shockley v. Tucker, 127 Iowa, 456, 103 N. W. 360.

Bunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by defendant Telephone Company from a judgment against it after a verdict in favor of plaintiff, and a denial by the trial court of defendant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. There was no motion for a new trial, and therefore we need only consider whether there was evidence tending to support a verdict for plaintiff.

The somewhat unusual facts may be briefly stated as follows: Plaintiff was in the employ of defendant Telephone Company as a lineman. October 19, 1910, while in the performance of his duties, he received an injury. A physician was called who diagnosed the case as a displacement of the sacro-iliac joint, and used heroic treatment that is claimed to have resulted in forcing the joint into place. Plaintiff was making good progress toward recovery, when the general manager of defendant requested him to submit to an X-ray picture being taken. Plaintiff opposed this, expressing his fear of injurious consequences, assuring defendant's manager he was all right, and offering to release defendant from all claims for damages on account of the injury. Plaintiff's physician also opposed the taking of the X-ray picture. But the manager guaranteed that the taking of the picture would not injure plaintiff, and threatened to discharge him if he refused to submit. After a good deal of hesitation and resistance, plaintiff finally consented that the picture might be taken, and on December 5, 1910, he was taken by defendant's manager to the office of Dr. Roberts, who applied the X-ray over the abdomen for the purpose of taking a picture of the sacro-iliac joint. Dr. Roberts was employed by defendant for the purpose of taking the picture. Plaintiff testified that the current was left turned on for more than seven minutes. He claims to have received a severe burning of the tissues by the application of the X-ray, and, as a result, to be suffering from paralysis of the bowels.

The relation of physician and patient did not exist between Dr. Roberts and plaintiff. The doctor was the servant of defendant. The case is the same, therefore, as if defendant's manager, or any other agent or employee, had inflicted the injury, and the rule of respondet superior applies, rather than the law relative to the liability of a physician or surgeon to his patient, or to the liability of a master who employs a physician to treat his servant. There can be no doubt that defendant wanted the picture for its own purposes; probably as evidence in case plaintiff should bring suit against it to recover for the injury received in the accident.

It is quite clear to us that it was a case for the jury. It is not necessary to determine the effect of the manager's guaranty of safety on the liability of defendant. The instrumentality was under the exclusive control of defendant, and there is sufficient evidence that injury to the subject is not a necessary result of the taking of an X-ray picture, if proper instrumentalities and proper care are used. Certainly we cannot say that plaintiff's injuries were not the result of the exposure. These facts are enough to make the case one of res ipsa loquitur, and to make the burden on defendant to show that there was no negligence. Defendant did not show this, at least conclusively. Indeed, there was sufficient evidence of negligence, even without the res ipsa rule, to make a case for the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

P. J. HUNEYCUTT & COMPANY

v.

WILLIAM THOMPSON, Appt.

(— N. C. —, 74 S. E. 628.)

Parent and child — liability for burial expenses — child driven from home.

That a father has driven his minor child from home, and permitted it to enjoy its own earnings, does not relieve him from liability for its burial expenses.

Note. — Liability of parent for necessities furnished minor child who is living away from the parent's home.

For cases on the criminal responsibility of parents for failure to support child, where support is furnished by others, see the note to State v. Thornton, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 841.

This note does not include cases after a divorce, or where there is a legal or other separation of the parents. For recovery by mother against father for money expended in support of children, see the note to De Brauwere v. De Brauwere, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 508.

As to the right of one who employs minor without parent's consent, to allowance on account of expenditures for necessities, see the note to Culberson v. Alabama Constr. Co. 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 411.

It is the doctrine of the English cases that there is no legal common-law duty of a father to furnish necessities for his child, and that he will not be liable for such furnished without authority, or a promise, APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Stanley County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover an amount alleged to be due for burial expenses of defendant's son. Affirmed.

Statement by Allen, J.:

This action is to recover $40, alleged to be due the plaintiff for the burial expenses of the son of the defendant. The son was a minor, and was living apart from the defendant at the time of his death, and was in the enjoyment of his own earnings; but the plaintiff offered evidence tending to prove that the defendant wrongfully drove him from home. It was in the evidence that the son owned personal property of the value of $60 or $70, which was disposed of by his relations; and there was no evidence that the defendant expressly authorized the expense incurred. At the conclusion of the evidence, the defendant moved for judgment of nonsuit, which was denied, and the defendant excepted. Exceptions were also taken to the charge of his Honor; but they are all involved in the motion for judgment of nonsuit.

The following verdict was returned by the jury:

"(1) Had the deceased, William Thompexpress or implied, and that the authority or promise will not be implied from mere exigency or destitution.

In America some of the cases incline to the English doctrine; others, while holding that the only liability rests on authority or promise, will imply such authority or promise from the exigency of the case alone; and still others hold directly that there is a legal liability of the father to maintain his child.

There are comparatively few cases in the books where the question of the father's liability has been squarely presented without evidence of express or implied authority or promise outside the exigency of the occasion. But the inviting nature of the subject has produced a great amount of obiter opinions. So the law in a number of jurisdictions seems to oscillate between the wide extremes of the personal views of the judges writing the opinions.

Besides P. J. HUNEYCUTT & Co. v. THOMPSON, the only case in which the question seems to have been raised of the liability of the parent for the funeral expenses of a child living apart from him is Gobber v. Empting, 72 Misc. 10, 129 N. Y. Supp. 4, where, in holding that a father was liable for the general expenses of an infant son, although the parents were separated, and the son was living with his mother, who was receiving a small temporary alimony in a pending separation suit, the court said: "It appears that the child was about son, Jr., been emancipated by his father, and was he still emancipated at the time of his death? Answer: No.

"(2) In what amount, if any, is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff? Answer: Thirty-five dollars."

Judgment was entered on the verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

Messrs. I. R. Burleyson and R. L. Smith, for appellant.

Defendant was not liable for the burial expenses of his son, who had been completely emancipated.

Mr. A. C. Huneycutt, for appellee:

A parent is responsible for reasonable burial expenses of his minor child who has been by himself driven away from home.

Rowe v. Raper, 23 Ind. App. 27, 77

one year old, and was residing with the mother, who was residing apart from the defendant. . . . Passing over the question as to whether the wife was justified in leaving her husband, and as to his liability for the burial as for a necessity for the wife, I think that the husband was liable, on the theory that he is liable for the funeral expenses of a minor child, and that, if the child is not living with him, anyone furnishing a burial for the child can recover from the father the reasonable value of the services and for materials furnished. In his work on Domestic Relations, Mr. Schouler states the rule as follows (5th ed. § 242): 'Liability for minor child's funeral expenses.—A father is, in general, liable for the decent funeral expenses of his deceased minor child.' Here the father and mother were living separate and apart. The child of only one year old could not be well separated from the mother."

Abandonment or driving child away.

It will be seen that in P. J. HUNEYCUTT & Co. v. THOMPSON, the decision is put upon the ground that the absence of the child was because the father had driven him from home.

"If a father abandon his duty to his infant child, so that he is forced to leave his house, he is liable for a suitable maintenance." Owen v. White, 5 Port. (Ala.) 435, 30 Am. Dec. 572 (obiter).

In Stanton v. Willson, 3 Day, 37, 3 Am. Dec. 255, a father was held liable for support and education furnished by a stranger to his child, who had fled on account of fear of personal violence. The court said: "If it is admitted, that 'he eloped from his father for fear of personal violence and abuse, and could not with safety live with him,' every reason for the rule that can be given ceased to operate. . . . Because the father has abandoned his duty and trust, by putting the child out of his protection, he cannot thereby exonerate himself from its maintenance, education, and support. The duty remains, and the law will enforce its performance, or there must be a failure of justice. The infant cast on the world must seek protection and safety where it can be found; and where with more propriety can it apply than to the next friend, nearest relative, and such as are most interested in its safety and happiness? The father, having forced his child abroad to seek a sustenance under such circumstances, sends a credit along with him, and shall not be permitted to say it was furnished without his consent, or against his will." The rule referred to by the court is that minors under the government of parents cannot bind their parents for necessities without their consent.

In Finn v. Adams, 138 Mich. 258, 101 N. W. 533, 4 Ann. Cas. 1186, it was held that a man who had been sentenced to state prison for life was under legal obligation to furnish his minor son with the necessities of life. The court said: "While the authorities are not fully agreed, we think the better rule is that, where the duty to maintain one's children is made a legal duty by statute, as by our statute (§ 4495, 2 Comp. Laws), the same agency to bind the father for necessities is to be implied where there is a total abandonment of a minor child, incapable of supporting himself, as is implied in the wife on desertion by her husband."

An implied promise to pay for necessities consisting of bread and lodging, clothing and personal care furnished a child without the physical ability of providing himself with the necessities of life, is raised by the fact that the father had abandoned and repudiated the child, and had been notified of the whereabouts and the necessities of the child before the supplies in question were furnished. Manning v. Wells, 85 Hun, 27, 32 N. Y. Supp. 601, where the court said, referring to the authorities, that one class held "that, independent of statute, a parent is not liable for necessities furnished his infant child, while another class holds that a person furnishing such necessities may recover of the parent therefor. The principle upon which the latter proceeds is that, as a parent is under a natural obligation to fur-

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is conceded, on the one hand, that the defendant would have been liable for the burial expenses of his son, a minor, incurred without his express authority, if the son had been living with the defendant at the time of his death; and, on the other, that there is no liability if the son left the home of the father voluntarily, and without fault on the part of the father. The point in debate, therefore, is whether the defendant can avoid liability when he has wrongfully driven his child from home.

The position taken by the defendant's counsel is sound, that "if a father neglects and refuses to support or maintain his son during his minority, and denies him a home, so that he is forced to labor abroad and procure a living for himself, he is not entitled to the earnings of such son, as, under such circumstances, the law will imply that the father has emancipated his son from his service, and conceded to him the right to enjoy the fruits of his own labor;" but it does not necessarily follow that the father is relieved from all responsibility, because he has nish necessities for his infant children, if he neglects that duty a person who supplies such necessities is deemed to have conferred a benefit upon the delinquent parent for which the law raises an implied promise on his part to pay. If the latter doctrine is correct, it would follow that the plaintiff's complaint is sufficient, as it shows a clear and palpable omission of duty in that respect on the part of the defendant. Without discussing in detail or attempting to harmonize the various opinions that have been expressed upon this question, we are disposed to hold that upon the facts alleged in the complaint the law raised an implied promise on the part of the defendant to pay for the necessities furnished his infant son. . . . In view of the fact that the plaintiff at once notified the defendant that his son was at the plaintiff's house in a destitute condition, and without the physical ability to provide himself with the necessities of life, as was alleged in the complaint and admitted by the demurrer, under all the cases it must be held that an implied promise on the part of the defendant to pay for the necessities thus furnished arose. In such a case very slight evidence would be sufficient from which to infer such a promise by the parent."

Voluntary absence.

The cases concerning expenses of illness generally present the legal question of the parent's liability more clearly and directly than where the expense is of a different nature. In most of the American cases the question is treated as one of the extent of the emancipation.

Where the defendant's son, while working for the plaintiff with his father's consent, broke his leg, and the plaintiff took him to his house, and the next day notified the defendant to come and care for him, which the defendant refused to do, saying the county would have to care for him, and the plaintiff then told the defendant that if the boy remained at his house, he would care for him and look to the plaintiff for the expense of it, it was held that "the parent is bound for necessities furnished his minor child, if the parent refuses to furnish them when the child is living apart from the parent, with his consent." De Wane v. Hansow, 58 Ill. App. 575.

In Porter v. Powell, 79 Iowa, 151, 7 L.R.A. 176, 18 Am. St. Rep. 353, 44 N. W. 295, it was held that a father was liable for a physician's services to his minor daughter, seventeen years of age, attacked with typhoid fever, 30 miles away from her father's house, at a place where she had resided for three years, earning and controlling her own wages, and providing herself with clothing, the father not furnishing or agreeing with his daughter to furnish her with any money, or means of support, but consenting to her absence from home. The court said: "In our view, there was, at most, but a partial emancipation,—an emancipation from service for an indefinite time. The father had a right at any time to require the daughter to return to his home and service; and she had a right at any time to return to his service, and to claim his care, custody, control, and support. There was no such an emancipation as exempted the father from liability for actual necessities furnished to his daughter. In view of the legal as well as the moral duty of appellant to furnish necessary support to his daughter during minority, and especially when unable, from infancy, disease, or accident, to earn her own necessary support, we think he may well be understood as promising payment to any third person for actual necessities furnished to her. . . . He had not relieved himself from the duty to furnish her such support, and, from his obligation to do so, may be presumed to have promised payment to anyone who did furnish it in his absence."

In Kubic v. Zemke, 105 Iowa, 269, 74 N. W. 748, where a boy of fifteen, who was living with the plaintiff, became sick, the plaintiff paid the expenses of his illness, and having sued the father for them, the trial court directed a verdict for the plaintiff. But, on appeal, this was set aside on the ground that it was a question of eman-lost the right to control the earnings of his son.

The objection to such a conclusion is that it would permit the father to take advantage of his own wrongful act, and to relieve himself from responsibility by conduct which the law condemns; and, in our opinion, the charge of his Honor was a clear and accurate statement of the law. He said: "The mere fact that a child is living away from home, with the consent of the parent, does not relieve the parent from liability for necessities furnished to the child, and the parent is liable, where his misconduct or abuse has driven the child to leave him; but ordinarily, where there is no fault upon the part of the parent, a child who voluntarily abandons the parent's home, for the purpose of seeking its fortune in the world, or to avoid parental discipline and restraint, forfeits the claim to support, and the parent is under no obligation to pay therefor. A boy may be emancipated for some purposes, and may not be emancipated for others. There may be a total emancipation or a partial emancipation. If the plaintiff's contention is true in this case, the father ran the boy off and permitted him to go to work, and to earn wages and to collect his money. That would be an emancipation for certain purposes. That would authorize the boy to make contracts, collect the money, and spend the money. The father couldn't then come and collect his money. That cipation, on which the burden of proof rested upon the father, and he should have an opportunity to show it.

But where the child goes across the continent as his own master, the father will not be liable. Thus, in Johnson v. Gibson, 4 E. D. Smith, 231, a minor who had been living in his father's family in the East, but receiving his own wages, departed for California. His father advanced him money for his passage, but neither received his earnings nor provided for his support abroad. While in California he was taken sick and was nursed by the assignor of the plaintiff, and it was held upon the whole case that there was evidence sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the father had waived his son's earnings, and that he was not responsible for his son's necessities for this reason.

So, in Brosius v. Barker, 154 Mo. App. 657, 136 S. W. 18, where the plaintiff, a physician, had rendered medical services to the defendant's son, ill of typhoid fever, in Oregon, and had guaranteed or assumed the hospital charges, of which he had an assignment, the father being resident in Missouri, the court said: "We hold that where the child who is physically and mentally able to take care of himself has voluntarily abandoned the parental roof and turned his back to its protection and influence, and has gone out to fight the battle of life on his own account, the parent is under no obligation to support him. . . . The plaintiff claims he had no knowledge of the fact that the son was no longer under parental control, and for that reason the emancipation defense cannot be made against his claim. We have been unable to find any authorities supporting appellant's contention. . . . In this case, the plaintiff knew, at the time the defendant's son applied to him for assistance, that the boy was not living with his parent. He was informed that the father lived in this state, and therefore, it seems to us that the arrangement between the father and son, under which the boy had left home, was a matter plaintiff should have inquired into before rendering the services to the boy on the credit of the father."

The English rule was enforced in Mortimore v. Wright, 6 Mees. & W. 482, 9 L. J. Exch. N. S. 158, 4 Jur. 465, where the son, for the last two and a half years of his minority, lodged with the plaintiff, having an occupation for which he received about a pound a week, and paid his board, but for the last six or seven months of his minority he was not able, through illness, to pursue his usual occupation, and was supplied with board and the necessities of his illness by the plaintiff. It was held that his father was not liable to the plaintiff therefor.

But if the son returns home and is treated in illness by a physician, with his father's knowledge, while again a member of the family, the father will be liable for the services. Deane v. Annis, 14 Me. 26; Swain v. Tyler, 26 Vt. 9.

So, on the other hand, the father will not be liable where the credit is given only to the son. Thus, where a son was taken ill while in the service of the plaintiff, under a contract between them that the plaintiff should pay him his wages, and the father, at the request of the plaintiff, had relinquished to the son by a written instrument all claim for his services, authorizing him to contract for himself, and stating that he would pay no debts incurred by the son, and the plaintiff's account for the expenses of the son's illness was charged to the son, it was held that the father was not liable for such expenses, as the credit was given entirely to the son. Varney v. Young, 11 Vt. 258.

The cases where expenses other than those of illness are concerned vary so much in the particular circumstances that it is not easy, considering the diverse and often shifting views of the general liability of the parent for necessities, to formulate general rules on the subject. But it is generally conceded that the parent is not liable for the ordinary expenses of his child who lives away from home and is self-supporting. Gotts v. Clark, 78 Ill. 229; Coop- would be an emancipation for that purpose. But if the father was in fault, if he ran the boy off from home, then there could be no emancipation which would relieve the father from the duty of providing necessities for the son, in the event he was down sick and died. I charge you that if the plaintiff has satisfied you by the greater weight of the evidence that the defendant drove his young son, William Thompson, away from his home, you will answer the first issue, 'No.' The first issue is: 'Had the deceased, William Thompson, Jr., been emancipated by his father, and was he still emancipated at the time of his death?' So, then, if you find from this evidence, and by the greater weight of it, that his father drove him away from home, and he remained away, according to the evidence, twelve months or sixteen months, or whatever you may find to be the time, and was taken sick and died, your answer to the first issue will be, 'No,' because that didn't emancipate, didn't relieve the father from his duty to look after and protect and care for his son, because he was in fault, if you find that he ran him away from home. But if you find that the boy left of his own volition, because he wanted to go, because he was tired of home and wished to escape parental control and correction er v. McNamara, 92 Iowa, 243, 60 N. W. 522; Weeks v. Morrow, 40 Me. 151 (where, however, it is not clear whether the minor received his own wages); Kelley v. Davis, 49 N. H. 187, 6 Am. Rep. 499; Raymond v. Loyl, 10 Barb. 483.

Where the action was founded on an account which the plaintiff had against the defendant for necessary articles of clothing, which he had furnished to the defendant's minor daughter while she was at work for him (with the defendant's consent), beyond the price of her labor, and there was no proof that the defendant had relinquished his right to the earnings of his daughter, or that he consented to her buying any of the articles of clothing of the plaintiff, or that the defendant had neglected to furnish her with clothing necessary and proper for her condition in life, it was held that there could be no recovery, as the defendant gave his daughter no authority to procure the clothing, and the plaintiff had none from the defendant to let her have any; and also there was no omission of duty on the part of the defendant as to furnishing his daughter with all necessary clothing. Clinton v. Rowland, 24 Barb. 634.

In Gordon v. Potter, 17 Vt. 348, where a boy, with the consent of his father, who allowed him part of his earnings, worked away from home, it was held that the father would not be liable for clothes furnished his son without some authority from him, express or implied; and the court seemed to be of the opinion that no authority would be implied from absolute destitution.

So, where the minor is away without the parent's consent, the parent is, in general, not liable for necessities furnished. Miller v. Davis, 49 Ill. App. 377, where the court said: "Where the child resides away from home without the consent of the parent, in order to hold the parent for goods furnished, an express promise must be proven, or the facts and circumstances must be such that a promise can be inferred. There is a difference between circumstances from which a promise may be inferred, and circumstances that would lead a reasonable man to believe the goods would be paid for. Parents often pay debts improvidently made 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by children when there is no legal obligation to do so. It is sometimes done from a spirit of pride, and sometimes to prevent unpleasant consequences following the child. Under such circumstances a reasonable man would be led to infer that the parent would pay."

"If a child leave his father's house, to seek his fortune in the world, or avoid domestic discipline and restraint, or escape from justice, the authority of the father to purchase necessities is not implied." Owen v. Wright, 5 Port. (Ala.) 435, 30 Am. Dec. 572 (obiter).

In Carney v. Barrett, 4 Or. 171, where the defendant engaged board for his son at the plaintiff's hotel, and after paying for the same for two weeks, he told the landlord that he would not be responsible for his son's board any longer, and to put him out of the hotel, it was held that the defendant was not liable for any further board for his son.

In Schnuckle v. Bierman, 89 Ill. 454, it was held that where a daughter leaves her father's house without cause, and is sequestered by a neighbor, the neighbor cannot recover for her board.

But a girl between eight and nine years of age is subject to the parents' will, and does not forfeit her claim to support by voluntarily remaining away from her father's house, against his will. Bradley v. Keen, 101 Ill. App. 519.

In Angel v. McLellan, 16 Mass. 28, 8 Am. Dec. 118, an action against a father for necessities furnished in a foreign country to a son, who was a fugitive from the justice of his native country, the court said: "The father is obliged to support his children while they remain part of his family. Perhaps if he fail to furnish them with clothing and food necessary for the support of life, anyone who furnished such necessities may maintain an action against the father, upon the presumption of an assent on his part. Perhaps, also, if he cruelly and causelessly turn them out of doors, they would carry with them a credit on the father for the means of support. . . . However this may be, we think it clear that, when a child leaves his parent's house voluntarily, for the purpose of seeking his and seek his fortune in life for himself, and was earning money, and had on hand at the time of his death this buggy, which sold for $37.50, according to the testimony, and the watch, which sold for $5, and this balance in the hands of Mr. Efrd of $16.20, then you would find, gentlemen, the answer to this first issue to be 'Yes.'"

The authorities are not uniform on this question; but they fully sustain the charge. 2 Kent, Com. 193; Tyler, Infancy, 114; 29 Cyc. 1609; Owen v. White, 5 Port. (Ala.) 435, 30 Am. Dec. 573; Weeks v. Merrow, 40 Me. 151; Bennett v. Gillette, 74 Am. Dec. note on page 782.

In 2 Kent, supra, the author says: "If fortune in the world, or to avoid the discipline and restraint so necessary for the due regulation of families, he carries with him no credit; and the parent is under no obligation to pay for his support."

In Hunt v. Thompson, 4 Ill. 179, 36 Am. Dec. 538, an action for clothes furnished a minor son, it was held that it was not reasonable to presume that a father, because he allowed a son between fifteen and eighteen years of age to visit friends in another state, also gave him authority to take board at a tavern for five or six months, and until he should outgrow his clothes or wear them out, and then purchase others at will; the court stating that those who supply the infant must know of his relations with his father.

Knowledge of the relations between the parent and the child which is required of one supplying the child, in Hunt v. Thompson, supra, and Brosius v. Barker, 154 Mo. App. 657, 136 S. W. 18, has been held not to be required in a case where there had been an agency, as the continuance of that might be presumed until actual or constructive notice was received of its termination. Murphy v. Ottenheimer, 84 Ill. 39, 25 Am. Rep. 424.

The question whether the child had the parent's authority for a course of conduct which made necessary the incurring of the obligation in question is sometimes one of ordinary business agency. Thus, in Bushnell v. Bishop Hill Colony, 28 Ill. 204, where articles had been ordered for a farm, the question was simply one of fact whether a young man under twenty-one was carrying on a farm on his own account, his mother keeping house for him, or whether they were cultivating and conducting the farm for the benefit of the father, who owned it and lived in another state.

But a son supplied with expenses for a week or ten days, and sent to London to look out for a ship, may not bind his father for his board during an indefinite stay without authority. Shelton v. Springett, 20 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 281.

a father suffers the children to remain abroad with their mother, or if he forces them from home by severe usage, he is liable for their necessities."

In Tyler on Infancy, supra: "If the parent turn away his child from home, or so cruelly treat him that he cannot remain under the parental roof, or abandon him without adequate provision, the rule is well settled that such parent may be made to pay for necessities furnished such infant child."

In Cyc. supra: "The mere fact that a child is living away from home, with the consent of the parent, does not relieve the latter from liability for necessities fur-house, and the daughter was for many years supported by her grandmother. After the father's decease an application was made in equity by his representatives to be relieved of a judgment in favor of the personal representatives of the grandmother, for the daughter's support, and it was held that equity would not interfere. Tomkins v. Tomkins, 11 N. J. Eq. 512.

While children at school are not within the scope of this note, reference may be made here to Parker v. Tillinghast, 19 Abb. N. C. 190, where a resident of New York placed his minor son at school in New Hampshire, and the boy, who (stated that he) had only a thin overcoat, and had outgrown his other clothes, ordered clothes of the plaintiff; and the court, in holding that the question of the father's liability was one for the jury, stated that the boy was entitled to clothing suitable to the climate, and which would permit him to make a presentable appearance at the school, and that "if the father failed to supply these necessities, the son had the right to procure them on the father's credit. This is founded on the rule that if the parent neglects his duty, any other person who supplies the necessities is deemed to have conferred a benefit on the delinquent parent, for which the law raises an implied promise to pay on the part of the parent."

In Farmington v. Jones, 36 N. H. 271, where the plaintiff's daughter, over eighteen years of age, was residing, presumably with his consent, at the house of another person, smallpox broke out at that house and she became ill with it. The town authorities declared it a pesthouse, and quarantined the inmates without authority. It was held that they could recover of the father for the expenses of the girl's sickness, paid out for her while she was so detained.

It may be noted that in cases where the question arises of the liability of the father for the support of a child when the parents are separated, it is sometimes laid down as a principle that the father is liable for the support of a young child where he suffers the child to remain with a person from whose custody he could have regained him by habeas corpus.

nished the child; and the parent is liable, where his misconduct or abuse has driven the child to leave home."

In Owen v. White, supra, the court says: "If a child leave his father's house to seek his fortune in the world, or avoid domestic discipline and restraint, or escape from justice, the authority of the father to purchase necessities is not implied. But if a father abandon his duty to his infant child, so that he is forced to leave his house, he is liable for a suitable maintenance. And the principle of the distinction is that in the one case the father is blameless, and in the other blamable." And in Weeks v. Merrow, supra: "If a minor is forced out into the world by the cruelty or improper conduct of the parent, and is in want of necessities, such necessities may be supplied, and the value thereof collected of the parent, on an implied contract."

It follows, therefore, as there was evidence that the defendant had driven his minor son from home, that there was no error in denying the motion for judgment of nonsuit; and the charge being in accordance with law and justice, the judgment is affirmed.

ERROR to the County Court for Marshall County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the negligent failure of defendants to deliver a shipment of freight as required by contract. Affirmed.

Statement by Harrison, C.:

This action was filed in the county court of Marshall county December 7, 1908, by J. P. Williams against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company and the Ft. Smith & Western Railroad Company for damages for failure of the two carrier companies to deliver a certain merry-go-round from the town of Indianola, Oklahoma, to Madill, Oklahoma, within time to be used by plaintiff at a picnic held in Madill, Oklahoma, on August 14 and 15, 1908. On August 10, 1908, plaintiff, J. P. Williams, tendered for shipment to the Ft. Smith & Western Railroad Company at Indianola, Oklahoma, the merry-go-round in question, the same being accepted by said railroad company under an agreement between plaintiff and said company that said property would be delivered to plaintiff at Madill, Oklahoma, not later than the morning of the 14th of August, and was loaded for shipment August 10th. The Ft. Smith & Western Railroad Company delivered same to the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company at Weleetka, Oklahoma, and the St. Louis & San Francisco Company carried it from Weleetka to Madill; the same reaching Madill about 5 o'clock in the evening of August 14th. The evidence shows that the defendant Ft. Smith & Western Railway Company was informed of the nature of the shipment and of the necessity for having the merry-go-round at Madill in time for use on the morning of the 14th of August, and that hibition or show by breach of contract of carriage.

Numerous other aspects of the general question as to loss of profits as measure of damages are covered in notes cited in the Index to Notes under the title "Damages," subtitle "Loss of Profits."

it was fully explained to the defendant company by plaintiff that plaintiff was going to use said merry-go-round at Madill during the two days' picnic, and particularly and definitely informed plaintiff that he wanted it to reach Madill in time to be put up and ready for use on the morning of the 14th of August; that being the first day of the two days' picnic. The waybill issued by the defendant company to plaintiff, a copy of which is made a part of the record, bears this notice: "Please hurry through. MUST be at Madill by the 8-14." From the evidence in the record the distance from Indianola over the Ft. Smith & Western Railway to Weleetka is 28 miles, and the distance from Weleetka over the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway to Madill is 109 miles. It also appears from the evidence that the merry-go-round was received by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company at Weleetka some time during the evening of August 13th, and was handled or forwarded by such company on the first train out to Madill, reaching Madill over the Frisco about 5 o'clock on the evening of the 14th, having been three days in transit from Indianola to Weleetka, a distance of 28 miles, and having been carried by the Frisco road, a distance of 109 miles, in something like twenty-four hours' time. The plaintiff below sued for $425 alleging that he had been damaged in the sum of $400 in loss of profits, and the sum of $25 in amount paid as license to run his machine at Madill, and that all of such losses were the direct result of the negligence and unnecessary delay in shipment by the defendant carriers.

Each of the defendant carriers appeared and filed their separate answers to plaintiff's petition; the same being, in effect, general denials of the allegations contained in the petition. Upon a trial of the cause, which was had to a jury, the plaintiff obtained a verdict against the Ft. Smith & Western Railroad Company for $200, the court having peremptorily instructed the jury to return a verdict releasing the San Francisco Railway Company from any liability, upon which verdict the court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendant Ft. Smith & Western Railroad Company in the sum of $200, from which judgment and order of court overruling the motion for new trial the Ft. Smith & Western Railroad Company appeals to this court.

Messrs. C. E. Warner and H. P. Harper for plaintiff in error.

Harrison, C., filed the following opinion:

Plaintiff in error complains of nineteen separate assignments of error, but in its brief discusses and reviews them all under three general heads, viz.: First. It was error for the court to admit evidence tending to show, and to instruct the jury, that plaintiff was entitled to recover the profits which he alleges he would have received. Second. The court erred in refusing to give instruction No. 1, asked by the defendant, which reads as follows: "You are instructed that upon the evidence in this case it is your duty to return a verdict for the defendant, Ft. Smith & Western Railroad Company." Third. The measure of damage in any event could not be the gross receipts; but plaintiff's recovery should have been limited to the net receipts. These three propositions are all included in the one general proposition "whether a loss of contemplated profits is a proper element of damage."

This has ever been looked upon and treated by the courts as a vexed and difficult question. It has been, and will always be, impossible to lay down any fixed and definite rule correctly applicable in all cases. There has never been a rule established which was decisive and universally followed by the courts in all cases, but the inclination of the earlier authorities to hold that contemplated profits per se were improper elements of damage has given way under the riper wisdom of jurisprudence, and, instead of holding to the earlier inclination, the weight of authorities in modern jurisprudence either holds or concedes that, where a loss of profits is not too remote or conjectural to be susceptible of computation with reasonable accuracy, they are proper elements of damage. This rule is recognized with approval by each and all of the following authorities cited by counsel for plaintiff in error in support of his first proposition: Strawn v. Cogswell, 28 Ill. 461; Frazer v. Smith, 60 Ill. 145; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Jessee, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 351, and authorities cited; People's Sav. Bank v. Waterloo & C. F. Rapid Transit Co. 118 Iowa, 740, 92 N. W. 691; Bartow v. Erie R. Co. 73 N. J. L. 12, 62 Atl. 489; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Hill, 63 Tex. 381, 51 Am. Rep. 642; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Crall, 39 Kan. 580, 18 Pac. 719; Moulthrop v. Hyett, 105 Ala. 493, 53 Am. St. Rep. 139, 17 So. 33; Williams v. Island City Mercantile & Mill. Co. 25 Or. 573, 37 Pac. 51; Brigham v. Carlisle, 78 Ala. 244, 56 Am. Rep. 28; Paola Gas Co. v. Paola Glass Co. 56 Kan. 622, 54 Am. St. Rep. 598, 44 Pac. 621; Cutting v. Miner, 30 App. Div. 457, 52 N. Y. Supp. 288; Griffin v. Colver, 10

N. Y. 489, 69 Am. Dec. 718; Western Gravel Road Co. v. Cox, 39 Ind. 263; Florida Northern R. Co. v. Southern Supply Co. 112 Ga. 1, 37 S. E. 130; Bell v. Reynolds, 78 Ala. 511, 56 Am. Rep. 55; Pollock v. Gantt, 69 Ala. 373, 44 Am. Rep. 519; Witherbee v. Meyer, 155 N. Y. 446, 50 N. E. 58. In each of the above cases the rule had been either rejected or followed in the lower courts; and the appellate courts in reversing the judgment where the rule had been followed, or in affirming the judgments where the rule had been denied, did so purely upon the ground that the profits contended for in such cases were entirely too remote, speculative, and conjectural to be estimated with any degree of accuracy, and not upon the ground that, though the profits might be estimated with a reasonable degree of certainty, they were per se improper elements of damage.

In the case of Paola Gas Co. v. Paola Glass Co. 56 Kan. 622, 54 Am. St. Rep. 598, 44 Pac. 621, cited by plaintiff in error, Mr. Justice Johnston in rendering the opinion says: "It is urged that damages cannot be measured by the anticipated profits, as the calculation is necessarily based on conjecture rather than upon facts. It is the aim of the law to give a party injured by the breach of a contract all the damages which he may suffer from such breach; and, where the contract is made with a view to future profits and such profits are within the contemplation of the parties, they may, where they can be established with certainty, form a just measure of damage. It has been said that as a general rule, with a few exceptions, 'anticipated profits prevented are not recoverable in the way of damages for the breach of contract; but it is well settled in this state that damages based on prospective profits which would have been realized had the contract been performed may be allowed, providing they are fairly within the contemplation of the parties, are the direct and natural consequence of the breach of the contract, and are susceptible of being ascertained with reasonable certainty,'—citing Hoge v. Norton, 22 Kan. 374; Brown v. Hadley, 43 Kan. 267, 23 Pac. 492; Arkansas Valley Town & Land Co. v. Lincoln, 56 Kan. 145, 42 Pac. 706. In the case of Williams v. Island City Mercantile & Mill Co. 25 Or. 573, 37 Pac. 49, cited by plaintiff in error, Mr. Justice Bean in rendering the opinion says: "The object of damages is, primarily, compensation to an injured party for a loss sustained; and the rule is, primarily, that only such damages can be recovered as are the natural and proximate result of a breach, and that damages which are purely speculative or conjectural are not recoverable. But the application of this rule varies as much as the facts of the adjudged cases in which it has been applied. There is nothing in the term 'profits' which of itself excludes their being given in evidence, and used as the measure of damages; and when excluded, it is because they are either unnatural or remote, or there are no criteria by which to estimate them with that certainty which the law requires. Indeed, in many cases, profits are the only certain or reliable measure of damages." In case of Moulthrop v. Hyett, 105 Ala. 493, 53 Am. St. Rep. 139, 17 So. 33, cited by plaintiff in error above, Mr. Justice McClellan, in rendering the opinion of the supreme court of Alabama, says: "It seems reasonable that, where profits are thus lost, the defaulting party should make them good, for the machinery is purchased with a view to the profits, and the contract would not be entered into if the profits were not expected and counted upon. But the difficulty in measuring damages by profits is that they are commonly uncertain and speculative, and depend upon so many contingencies that their loss cannot be traced with reasonable certainty to the breach of the contract. When that is the case, they are said to be too remote, and the damages must be estimated on a consideration of such elements of injury as are most directly and certainly the result of the failure of performance. But in some cases profits are the best possible measure of damages, for the very reason that the loss is indisputable and the amount can be estimated with almost absolute certainty."

None of the above authorities have held against the justness of the rule of applying profits as a measure of damages, but have merely held it inapplicable to the cases decided. There is more or less inaccuracy in every action for damages for breach of contract, but in order to justify a recovery in any case, assuming that a breach has been committed, there are two necessary elements to be considered: One, that a damage has been done; the other, that such damage is the result of the breach. The amount of the one should be computed with reasonable accuracy. The fact of the other must be determined with reasonable certainty. A less degree of accuracy is required in the former than of certainty in the latter, but neither is required to be absolute or beyond conjectural possibilities. Where it reasonably appears that a party has been damaged, and that such damage is the direct result of the breach, then a recovery is justified. The next step is to ascertain how much will reasonably compensate the injured party. This should be computed by the plainest, easiest, and most accurate measure which will do justice in the premises, and if from the conditions in the contract, and the nature of the breach, it reasonably appears that the extent or amount of damages may be more readily, easily, correctly, and justly ascertained by applying the loss of profits as a measure, if it is evident that profits were lost and the amount thereof can be calculated with reasonable accuracy, then such profits are the true measure to be applied. In such cases, however, it should appear evident that profits were lost. The amount may be estimated with only reasonable accuracy; but the fact that profits were lost should require stricter proof. This doctrine is deduced from a vast weight of authorities, both American and English, including 2 Joyce on Damages, and authorities; 1 Sutherland, Damages, 3d ed. and notes and cases cited; 1 Sedgw. Damages, 8th ed.; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed., and authorities cited in notes; 13 Cyc. and cases cited; Bryson v. McCone, 121 Cal. 153, 53 Pac. 637; Blagen v. Thompson, 23 Or. 239, 18 L.R.A. 315, 31 Pac. 647; Dart v. Laimbeer, 107 N. Y. 664, 14 N. E. 291; Brown v. Hadley, 43 Kan. 267, 23 Pac. 492; Hoge v. Norton, 22 Kan. 374; Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, 2 C. L. R. 517, 23 L. J. Exch. N. S. 179, 18 Jur. 358, 2 Week. Rep. 302, 26 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 398, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 502 (a leading case both in England and America); Tootle v. Kent, 12 Okla. 674, 73 Pac. 310; Choctaw O. & G. R. Co. v. Jacobs, 15 Okla. 493, 82 Pac. 502; Mace v. Ramsey, 74 N. C. 11; Butler v. Div. 274, 45 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 182, 33 L. T. N. S. 805, 24 Week. Rep. 294.

Hence we conclude that where a carrier contracts to deliver certain machinery to a certain place by a certain day for specific purposes, and has full notice of the nature of the purpose, is fully warned of the use to which the machinery is to be put, and of the importance of having it there on the particular day specified, and of the damage or loss of earnings which would result from failure to deliver same on the day agreed upon, and undertakes such shipment with full knowledge that such conditions, and the expected earnings, are the moving motive on the part of the shipper, and thereupon through want of diligence fails to deliver such machinery until after the day agreed upon, and after the time has expired when such machinery can be operated with any profit, such carrier is liable in such amount as will reasonably compensate the shipper for the damage done. And, if the amount of earnings or profits can be estimated with a reasonable degree of accuracy, they then become the most just and adequate measure of damages.

This, we think, correctly presents the real conditions of the case at bar. The plaintiff herein owned the merry-go-round. It was at Indianola on the day the contract was entered into. There was going to be a two days' picnic at Madill, Oklahoma. Plaintiff had purchased a right from the picnic committee to operate his machine there during the two days. He informed the carrier of all these circumstances, and asked the carrier if delivery of the machinery could be made by at least one day before the picnic began, or in time to have the merry-go-round ready for operation on the morning of the first day of the picnic. The agent of defendant company fully understood from the evidence in the record, undenied, all the conditions involved in the case, fully understood the importance of having the machinery at Madill on the first day of the picnic, and understood that it would be worthless for operation if it failed to reach Madill until after the picnic was over, and with this understanding promised plaintiff that he would deliver the machinery on time. And thereupon, with this understanding between the parties, plaintiff delivered the machinery to the defendant company for shipment to Madill. These facts are undisputed in the record. It also appears from the record that the machinery in question was turned over to defendant for delivery on the 10th of August, and that defendant company was nearly four days shipping such machinery a distance of only 28 miles, from Indianola to Weleetka, no excuse whatever being given for the delay; that on the evening of the 13th it was delivered by defendant company to the Frisco Company and by the Frisco Company, within the next twenty-four hours, delivered a distance of 109 miles to consignee, at Madill, reaching Madill near the close of the first day of the picnic. The evidence showed, also, that plaintiff upon receipt of the machinery immediately set to work with a number of hands and worked all night in order to get the machinery ready for operation, but failed to do so until between 9 and 10 o'clock of the last or second day of the picnic.

The record further discloses that the number of people present on the first day was, if any difference, greater than on the second day. It showed, also, that the plaintiff, after getting his machinery ready for operation, at about 10 o'clock the second day, from about 10 o'clock on the morning of the second day to the close of the evening of the same day, took in $245. The plaintiff claimed that he lost $400 by reason of not having his machinery ready as agreed upon. He testified that he would have taken in $400 more had he had his machinery ready for operation during the whole of the two days. This testimony, of course, was a mere supposition, and not to be treated as a basis upon which to compute the amount of damages. But the fact that he took in $245 during a little more than two thirds of the second day, and the witness Jorden, who operated the machine and who had been operating merry-go-rounds for seven years, testifying that the net profits of the time lost on the second day would have been at least $40, reckoning from what had been taken in during the remaining portion of the day, and the fact that the crowd was larger, if any difference, on the first day than on the second, it appears to be reasonable that under ordinary circumstances he would have taken in $200, the amount of the judgment, during the one and one third days lost to him. The record shows there were 2,500 to 3,000 people present each day; that there was no other merry-go-round on the grounds; that the receipts were from $1 to $5 each run of the machine; that a run lasted three to four minutes. This, it seems to us, would offer a reasonable basis upon which to estimate an approximate loss. It is not unreasonable to suppose that the receipts would have been approximately the same on the first as on the last day. Had he been able to run all of the second day at the same rates which he did run, his receipts would have been from $325 to $380. Hence we do not feel that it would be unreasonable for the jury to say from all the facts before them that defendant was damaged at least $200 for the one and one third days lost. It would appear more unreasonable and conjectural and more out of harmony with business experience and common judgment to say that he would not. And in view of all the circumstances we think the verdict is not the result of mere guesswork or conjecture, but that it is fair, reasonable, and should be allowed to stand.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE P. TURNER, Plff. in Err.,

v.

BERT WILCOX.

(— Okla. —, 121 Pac. 658.)

Landlord and tenant — negotiation for renewal — holding over.

1. Where landlord and tenant are negotiating for a new lease for farm land at the time of the expiration of the original lease, and the tenant remains in possession pending the negotiations, with the express or tacit consent of the landlord, the landlord is estopped from treating the tenant as holding over for another term under the condition prescribed in the original lease, but the tenant becomes a tenant from year to year.

Same — removal of crops — attachment.

2. Under § 4101, Comp. Laws 1909, a landlord is entitled to an attachment on the crops grown by his tenant, whether the rent be payable in money or other things, in case the tenant has, within thirty days, removed, or is moving, or intends to remove, his property, or crops, or any part thereof, from the leased premises, and neither the intent of the tenant in removing, nor the distance, nor the place to which the crops or portion thereof, or other property, is removed, is material. It is the removal, or the intent to remove, which is the justification for the attachment.

Same — refusal — error.

3. In a case where the undisputed evidence and admitted facts show that the tenant had paid the landlord no rent for a farm, but had removed a large portion of the crop grown thereon, and deposited the same in an elevator in a town, it was error for the court to refuse to sustain an attachment brought under § 4101, Comp. Laws 1909.

Note. — Landlord and tenant: effect of holding over pending unsuccessful negotiations for a new lease.

Although the relation of landlord and tenant is ordinarily founded upon express contract, the relation is sometimes presumed from the conduct of the parties towards each other, it being the general rule that a tenant holding over after the expiration of his lease continues, by implication of law, to be a tenant upon the same terms, without any other or new agreement with his landlord. (24 Cyc. 1011.) The class of cases under annotation, however, seems to form an exception to the general rule, the decisions in the main being founded upon the principle that since a holding over constitutes a renewal only when the landlord so elects, a holding over ERROR to the District Court for Canadian County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to enforce a landlord's rights in crops grown on rented premises under the terms of the lease contract. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Mr. Charles H. Garnett, for plaintiff in error:

A tenant holding over after the expiration of a written lease for a year, with the assent of the landlord, and without making and signing a new lease, holds under the terms of the old lease. If the landlord elects to treat him as tenant, he has a right to exact from him a compliance with the terms of the old lease, so far as applicable.

pending negotiations for a new lease cannot be said to be pursuant to the original lease, especially where the holding over is with the consent of the landlord. This is illustrated by Woodstrom v. Freeman, 159 Ill. App. 340, wherein it was held that a holding over under an arrangement for a new lease which was void and unenforceable was not under the terms of the old lease, the ground being that such an implication arises only when the landlord has so elected; and that when negotiations for a new lease are pending, it cannot be said that the landlord was relying on the original lease; and by Schilling v. Klein, 41 Ill. App. 209, wherein it was held that negotiations for a new term are inconsistent with an election to hold one holding over pending such negotiations as a tenant upon the old terms upon the failure of the negotiations. And in Burckle v. Adams Bros. Co. 59 App. Div. 109, 69 N. Y. Supp. 40, where the prior lease was regarded as terminated by both parties, and the holding over was upon new terms, with an understanding that there was to be a new lease, it was held that there could be no claim of a holding over such as would give the landlord the right to regard the tenant as a tenant for another year under the terms of the original lease.

In some instances the question is made to depend upon whether or not the holding over is with the landlord's consent, it being quite generally held that a holding over pending negotiations for a new lease with the landlord's consent does not constitute a renewal, while, if such consent has not been extended, either expressly or impliedly, a renewal is effected at the option of the landlord.

Thus, in Mastin v. Metzinger, 99 Mo. App. 613, 74 S. W. 431, it was said: "In this case there was no evidence whatever that plaintiff [landlord] consented to defendant's [tenant's] holding over. There was no evidence of an implied consent; indeed, the implication is to the contrary. It is true that the agent [of the landlord] did not bodily eject him from the premises, nor did he, immediately on the expiration 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of the lease, institute an action against him; but there was at no time the slightest indication that he consented to a continuance of the tenancy. It would be a strange condition of affairs if a landlord, in order to avoid implied consent to a continued tenancy under an expired lease, would be compelled to refuse to listen to a proposition of further lease, and set about immediately to eject the tenant."

And in Salas v. Davis, 120 Ga. 95, 47 S. E. 644, where the tenant held over pending unsuccessful negotiations for a new lease, it was held that he became a tenant by sufferance, there being no evidence that the holding over was by permission of the landlord. (In Georgia a tenant at sufferance is a wrongdoer; i. e., one in possession without the consent of the landlord, but as the result of laches or neglect.)

And in Smith v. Allt, 7 Daly, 492, 4 Abb. N. C. 205, it was held in effect that remaining, pending negotiations for a new lease, if with the consent of the landlord, did not constitute a renewal of the original lease upon the same terms.

And that a landlord is estopped from treating a tenant holding over for another term on the conditions prescribed by the original lease, where he remained in possession pending negotiations for a new lease, with the express or tacit consent of the landlord, see Leggett v. Louisiana Purchase Exposition Co. 157 Mo. App. 108, 137 S. W. 893, prior appeal 134 Mo. App. 175, 114 S. W. 92, as set out in TURNER v. WILCOX.

In Fall v. Moore, 45 Minn. 515, 48 N. W. 404, where the subsequent holding over was referable to a new lease which was void, it was held that the tenant could not be regarded as a tenant from year to year, holding over under the old lease, where there was no acknowledgment by the landlord that the tenancy was so continued, but was a tenant at will. And in Doe ex dem. Hollingsworth v. Stennett, 2 Esp. 717, 6 Revised Rep. 769, a case upon all fours with Fall v. Moore, a similar conclusion was reached. And in Woodstrom v. Freeman, supra, it was held that where the good, and will not prevent the plaintiff from recovering the principal sum and costs.

Messrs. Phelps & Cope, for defendant in error:

Where the parties are negotiating for a new lease, and the tenant remains with the express or tacit acquiescence of the landlord pending such negotiations, the landlord cannot treat him as a tenant holding over for another term.

Wilcox v. Raddin, 7 Ill. App. 594; Pusey

holding over is under an agreement for a new lease which is void and unenforceable, the tenant is a tenant at will. And that where the holding over is pending a treaty for a further lease, and with the permission of the landlord, the tenancy is at will, and not from year to year, see Grant v. White, 42 Mo. 285; Leggett v. Louisiana Purchase Exposition Co. supra; and Re Grant, 8 Ont. L. Rep. 297.

And in Henderson v. Schuylkill Valley Mfg. Co. 24 Pa. Super. Ct. 422, it was held that continued occupation under an agreement for a new lease which was never executed did not convert the occupancy into a tenancy from year to year under the original lease. But in Gardner v. Dakota County, 21 Minn. 33, where a tenant held over with the consent of the landlord, but negotiations for a new lease were never completed, it was held that the tenancy was one from year to year upon the terms of the original demise, so far as applicable to the new conditions.

And in Schilling v. Klein, 41 Ill. App. 209, a tenant, remaining in possession by consent of the landlord pending a treaty for a new lease, and paying monthly rental after the expiration of the original lease, which was one for years, was held not to be a tenant upon the former terms, but to be a tenant by the month. See also Burckle v. Adams Bros. Co. supra, which is to the same effect.

In Kenwood Hotel Co. v. Hiland, 153 Ill. App. 108, where the tenant, induced by the conduct of the landlord, held over pending unsuccessful negotiations for a new lease, it was held that the tenant had a reasonable time after the termination of such negotiations in which to vacate, and that the landlord could not enforce against such tenant liquidated damages, as provided for in the original lease, beyond the rental value of the premises for the time over-held.

v. Presbyterian Hospital, 70 Neb. 353, 113 Am. St. Rep. 788, 97 N. W. 475; Burckle v. Adams Bros. Co. 59 App. Div. 109, 69 N. Y. Supp. 40; Leggett v. Louisiana Purchase Exposition Co. 134 Mo. App. 175, 114 S. W. 92.

The burden of proof is on the landlord to establish, by a preponderance of the evidence, the holding over on the old terms.

Montgomery v. Willis, 45 Neb. 434, 63 N. W. 794.

The presumption of a continuance of the tenancy upon the same terms may be rebutted by proof of a different agreement between the landlord and tenant, or of facts which are inconsistent with the presumption.

So it is held that a tenant holding over by consent of the landlord pending a treaty for a new lease cannot be treated as a trespasser. Schilling v. Klein and Doe ex dem. Hollingsworth v. Stennett, supra.

In Smith v. Snyder, 168 Pa. 541, 32 Atl. 64, it was held that a tenant was not justified in holding over upon the failure of the landlord's agent to notify him as to the acceptance or refusal of an offer to lease the premises for a further term upon terms different from those of the original lease, where the agent had promised to let him know before the end of the original term. And the mere demand of a tenant that certain conditions be complied with will not qualify the effect of a holding over, where the landlord's conduct is not such as to induce him to believe that the terms would be accepted or the conditions complied with. Abeel v. McDonnell, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 457, 87 S. W. 1066. But where the landlord promises to comply with the condition imposed as one precedent to the taking of a new lease, a holding over in reliance thereon cannot be treated as a renewal, where the condition was not complied with. Williams v. Houston Cornice Works, 46 Tex. Civ. App. 72, 101 S. W. 839, 1195.

As to effect of holding over after expiration of lease, with option for extension or renewal, without promptly exercising option, see note to Kuhlman v. William J. Lemp Brewing Co. 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 174.

As to whether each holding over by a tenant after expiration of a term for years constitutes a new and separate term, distinct from that which preceded or followed, see note to Kennedy v. New York, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 847. And as to rent period as the criterion of the term implied by holding over after the expiration of a lease for a fixed term, see the note to Kaufman v. Martin, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 855.

Whether or not the tenant holds under the terms and conditions of the former lease is a question of fact to be determined by the jury.

Robertson, C., filed the following opinion:

Plaintiff in error, who was plaintiff below, commenced this action against defendant in error, who was defendant below, in the district court of Canadian county, on the 3d day of October, 1908, and alleged in his petition, in substance, that he was the owner of a certain farm in Canadian county; that defendant entered into possession of said premises as tenant on or about the 1st day of January, 1907, under a written lease for a period of one year; that at the end of the year 1907 the defendant, with the assent of the plaintiff, held over in possession of said premises for the year 1908; that the rent for the premises for the year 1908 had not been paid by the defendant according to the terms and provisions of the said lease, and that said premises had not been cultivated and cared for by the defendant, as provided for in said lease, for which plaintiff asked damages. And he further alleged that the defendant had begun to gather and market the crop grown on the premises, without the consent of the plaintiff, and without having first delivered and set apart to the said plaintiff his share of the said crop as rent, and that plaintiff claimed a lien as landlord on the premises for the year 1908 for the rent thereof, and prayed for judgment for damages and his rent, and that an attachment be issued and levied upon the crops grown on said premises. On the same day he filed his affidavit in attachment, also an undertaking which was duly approved by the clerk of the court, and a writ of attachment was issued, and was levied upon the crops grown on the premises. On the 11th of November, 1908, the defendant made a forthcoming bond, and thereby secured the release of said crops from the levy of said attachment. On December 21, 1908, defendant filed his answer, which was a general denial, except that he admitted that plaintiff was the owner of the premises, and that the defendant went into possession thereof under a written lease on January 1, 1907, but denied specially that he held over under the terms and conditions of said lease, and he prayed judgment for costs and for the discharge of the attachment. On the issues thus formed by the pleadings the cause was tried before a jury on March 25, 1909, and a verdict returned for the defendant for his costs. Motion for new trial was presented, considered, overruled, exceptions taken, and the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal to reverse said judgment.

The first error complained of, and treated in the brief of plaintiff in error, is that the court erred in permitting defendant to introduce evidence showing the usual and customary rental for premises, such as the farm in question, in the neighborhood where this farm was situated.

The second assignment of error is that the court erred in refusing to give instructions numbered 1 and 2, requested by the plaintiff, which stated that, as a matter of law, the terms of the lease for the year 1907 would extend to the year 1908, and would govern the payment of rent for that year. The determination of the second proposition will suggest the answer to the first, and we will therefore consider the second specification of error first. Plaintiff in error contends that a tenant holding over after the expiration of a written lease for a year, with the assent of the landlord, and without making and signing a new lease, holds over under the terms of the old lease. As a general proposition, subject to some exceptions, this was true under the common law, and also under the statute in force in this state; and the many authorities in support of this doctrine, cited by plaintiff in error, amply sustain this contention, and their correctness is conceded by defendant in error. However, this is but a presumption of law, and a rebuttable presumption at that; and when the undisputed facts show that the parties are negotiating for a new lease, and the tenant remains in possession with the understanding, or by acquiescence, of the landlord, pending such negotiations, the landlord cannot treat him as a tenant holding over under the old term. In this case the defendant in his answer charged that, while he remained in possession of the premises, yet that his holding over is not by virtue of the 1907 lease, but by reason of negotiations for a new lease, which were pending between the parties long prior to the termination of the former term, and in such case the burden is on the landlord to show that the holding over is under and by virtue of the terms of the old contract. In this case the testimony, while conflicting, warrants us in saying that there was a holding over by the tenant, but the jury found by its general verdict that it was not by virtue of the terms of the 1907 contract, and this verdict is sustained by the testimony, which shows that in September, 1908, the parties had a conversation relative to the occupancy of the farm for the next year; that the tenant at that time objected to the terms of the old contract, and stated that, while he wanted the farm for the year 1908, yet he would not assent to some of the conditions imposed by the old agreement, and it further appears from said conversation that the landlord agreed to eliminate certain terms and conditions of the same, but as to the extent of the modification we cannot determine from the record. The subject was again considered by the parties some time in January, 1908, and the landlord at that time submitted a written lease to the tenant for his signature, who, for some reason or other, failed to sign it. The testimony further shows that the landlord called the tenant's attention to this lease, and several times requested him to sign it, but that finally in April the tenant refused to sign the same, giving as his reasons for such refusal that the terms were unsatisfactory. Whereupon the landlord suggested that the tenant draw a lease in accordance with his ideas, and submit the same to the landlord, which was done, but which was unsatisfactory to the landlord, and which was never signed. These facts are cited merely to show that there was a dispute between the parties as to the supposed terms of the tenancy, and that the parties did not intend to rely upon the old contract, but that they were then negotiating for a new lease agreement.

Counsel for plaintiff, in support of his contention, cites the rule laid down in 24 Cyc. 1031, that "where a tenant, under a demise for a year or more, holds over at the end of his term without any new agreement with the landlord, he may be treated as a tenant from year to year,"—and cites in addition thereto § 4076, Snyder's Comp. Laws (Okla.) 1909, which reads as follows: "When premises are let for one or more years, and the tenant, with the assent of the landlord, continues to occupy the premises after the expiration of the term, such tenant shall be deemed to be a tenant from year to year." But the above has reference solely to those cases where there is no agreement between the parties to change or alter the terms of the tenancy; or, rather, to those cases where nothing has been said by the parties relative to the same, the presumption being in such case that it is the intent of the parties to continue the relation of landlord and tenant under the identical terms of the old lease. In the case at bar, as has been seen, the old lease was, in effect, abrogated because the tenant had told the landlord, in September, before the term ended, that, while he would like to remain on the farm for the year 1908, yet he would not remain under the terms of the old contract, and the landlord, by then and there agreeing to eliminate the objectionable features, as suggested by the tenant, thereby acquiesced, so to speak, in the abrogation, or, rather, the termination on January 1, 1908, of the old lease contract. In Leggett v. Louisiana Purchase Exposition Co. (decided in 1911) 157 Mo. App. 108, 137 S. W. 893, it was held that "where a tenant holds over after the end of his term, the common law presumes an intention to continue the tenancy for a similar term, and on the same conditions as to rental stipulated in the lease, and all that is necessary to complete the contract for such new term is the acquiescence of the landlord." A similar holding by the same court in Leggett v. Louisiana Purchase Exposition Co. 134 Mo. App. 175, 114 S. W. 92, is cited by plaintiff in error as supporting his position, but it will be noticed that the court in both cases held further, and especially in the case decided in 1911, that "where landlord and tenant are negotiating for a new lease at the time of the expiration of the original lease, and the tenant remains in possession pending the negotiations, with the express or tacit consent of the landlord, the landlord is estopped from treating the tenant as holding over for another term on the conditions prescribed in the original lease, but the tenant becomes a tenant at will." This case also holds that, where a matter turns on a question of intention (as it does in the case at bar), it is relevant to show the situation at the time in order to reach the truth as to the intentions of the parties. In 24 Cyc., at page 1014, the rule laid down is that the presumption of a continuance of the tenancy upon the same terms, or of the character of the tenancy, from remaining in possession after the expiration of the terms, is a rebuttable one, although it will not be overcome merely by the intention of the tenant, and it will not conclude either party as against proof of a different agreement between the landlord and the tenant, or of facts which are inconsistent with the presumption. In this case there was testimony, not only from the tenant, in support of his position, but also he was corroborated by the testimony of the landlord to the effect that negotiations for a new lease were pending prior to the termination of the old term, as well as for several months subsequent thereto; and it seems to be a well-settled rule that whether or not the tenant holds under the terms and conditions of the former lease, it is a question of fact, to be determined by the jury under proper instructions (Grant v. White, 42 Mo. 285; Withnell v. Petzold, 17 Mo. App. 669; Prosser v. Pretzel, 8 Kan. App. 856, 55 Pac. 854); and where there is evidence on material issues reasonably tending to support the verdict of the jury, the same will not be disturbed by this court on appeal. The presumption raised by the section of our statute above cited, having been rebutted by proof of a different speaking, by an agreement to make a new contract eliminating certain objectionable features of the old, and thereafter failing to agree upon the terms, shows beyond question that Wilcox did not hold over under the terms of the 1907 lease, but was in fact a tenant from year to year; and the measure of recovery for rent for the year 1908 was therefore, under the facts of this particular case, correctly stated by the court in his instructions to the jury, and this, therefore, disposes of the first specification of error hereinabove referred to, and no further consideration of this phase of the case need be given. Having concluded that Wilcox did not hold over under the terms of the 1907 lease, it becomes evident that no error was committed by the court in admitting testimony offered by defendant, showing the usual and customary rental for premises such as the farm in question in the same neighborhood.

Therefore the only remaining question in this case to be considered is: "Was the attachment in this case wrongfully issued?" Section 4098, Snyder's Comp. Laws (Okla.) 1909, reads as follows: "Any rent due for farming land shall be a lien on the crop growing or made on the premises. Such lien may be enforced by action and attachment therein, as hereinafter provided." Section 4101 reads as follows: "When any person who shall be liable to pay rent (whether the same be due or not, if it be due within one year thereafter, and whether the same be payable in money or other things) intends to remove or is removing, or has within thirty days removed his property, or his crops, or any part thereof, from the leased premises, the person to whom the rent is owing may commence an action in the court having jurisdiction; and upon making an affidavit, stating the amount of rent for which such person is liable, and one or more of the above facts, and executing an undertaking as in other cases, an attachment shall issue in the same manner and with the like effect as is provided by law in other actions." Section 4102: "In an action to enforce a lien on crops for rent of farming lands, the affidavit for attachment shall state that there is due from the defendant to the plaintiff a certain sum, naming it, for rent of farming lands, describing the same, and that the plaintiff claims a lien on the crop made on such land. Upon making and filing such affidavit and executing an undertaking as prescribed in the preceding section, an order of attachment shall issue as in other cases, and shall be levied on such crop, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and all other proceedings in such attachment shall be the same as in other actions."

In this case the undisputed facts show that Wilcox was Turner's tenant; that he was liable to Turner for rent for said land, and that nothing had been paid by him to Turner on the rent; that Turner had a statutory landlord's lien on the crops grown on said land to secure the payment of the rent; that this action was begun on October 3, 1908, and the attachment issued the same day; that the tenant had gathered a large portion of the crops within thirty days prior to the issuance of the attachment, and was engaged in gathering and removing the same at the time the attachment was served; that he had removed the same from said farm and deposited it in an elevator in the town of Yukon; that no agreement had been reached by the parties as to what amount of the crop Turner was to have, or Wilcox was to give. Under these facts and provisions of the statute cited above, Turner undoubtedly had a cause of action and a right to an attachment on October 3, 1908. These facts are undisputed. On the contrary, they appear affirmatively of record, and stand admitted by the parties. Turner never waived his landlord's right, nor is it anywhere in the record charged that he did; and, in fact, no attempt was made to show that he had. In Knowles v. Sell, 41 Kan. 171, 21 Pac. 102, the supreme court of Kansas, in discussing this question, under a statute identical with paragraph 4101, supra, says: "It is admitted by the defendant that he took the 22 bushels of corn from the premises without the consent or knowledge of the plaintiff, and there was no testimony showing that there was any other amount of grain removed. It is also apparent from the evidence that this load of corn was not taken away for the purpose of hindering or delaying the plaintiff in the collection of his rent, or with any intent to defraud him. The testimony shows, further, that there were 1,500 bushels of corn grown on the place that year. Under these facts, the question is presented whether the removal of this part of the crop is sufficient to sustain an attachment by the landlord, who claims a lien thereon. Section 24 of chapter 55 provides that the landlord shall have a lien upon the crops growing or made upon the premises, and such lien may be enforced by action and attachment therein. Under this statute his lien extends to the entire crop that may have been grown, not simply to any part of it; and in keeping with its provisions said § 27 provides in plain terms that the removal of any part of the crop from the premises is ground for an attachment. It does not require any intention of the tenant to delay, hinder, or defraud the landlord. By the terms of this statute the intent of the party is immaterial. The simple fact of removal is enough. The language of the statute compels this construction. No other could be given without doing violence to the language used. If the motive of the tenant was material, then probably the judgment would have been correct, and the manner of removal and the purpose of defendant would have been proper matters to inquire into, but under the view we take of the case, all that it was necessary for the plaintiff to establish was that the tenant had removed an appreciable part of the crop within thirty days, without the consent of the landlord." In a later case, viz., Harmon v. Payton, 68 Kan. 67, 74 Pac. 618, it was said: "It would seem clear that, under the facts found in the case at bar, the attachment should have been sustained. While the tenants were authorized, under the contract as found, to dispose of the broom corn, and pay the landlord his share in money, and while the kafir corn had been cut and delivered to the landlord in accordance with the custom of the neighborhood, there being no contract regulating the matter, yet the field corn was still to be husked and delivered, and the landlord had the right to his lien upon the entire crop to compel this. Under the statute quoted, a landlord is not required to rely upon the promise or purpose of the tenant to carry out his part of the contract. He is given a lien upon the entire crop to secure from the tenant the performance of his contract, and the tenant may not remove any appreciable portion of the same, no matter how good his purpose, without subjecting himself to the penalty of the statute, except by the consent of the landlord or a waiving of 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the lien. In this case there were neither pleadings nor findings . . . that the tenants owed the landlord nothing at the time of the commencement of his action. This finding was based upon the fact that the time for husking and delivery of the field corn had not then arrived. This, however, was immaterial, as the lien continued until the rent had been paid or the share delivered. If the rent is to be paid in a share of the crop, it is the landlord's right to have this matter adjusted, and his share delivered, before the tenant removes any portion from the premises. This right inheres in the contract of rental; and, if the tenant removes any portion of the crop, he breaks his contract, and the landlord may then recover from the tenant the value of his share at the time it should have been delivered, in money, the same being secured by an attachment." Turner, without doubt, had a cause of action against Wilcox on October 3, 1908, and was entitled, under the provisions of our statute, to sue out an attachment and to have the same levied on the crops grown on his land. This statute gives to the landlord a positive right to an attachment to crops grown on his land when the tenant intends to remove, or is removing, or has, within thirty days, removed, his property, or his crops, or any part thereof, from the leased premises; and neither the intent of the tenant in removing, nor the distance, nor the place to which the crops or other property is removed, is material. It is the removal, or the intent to remove, which is the justification for the attachment. As was well said in Masterson v. Bentley, 60 Ala. 520: "The language of the statute renders it incapable of any other construction, and no other can be given it. . . . So long as the crop remains on the rented premises, the lien of the landlord will prevail over any alienation the tenant may make of it. . . . Therefore, whenever, by the removal, the lien of the landlord is left in peril,—is liable to be defeated by an alienation, which could not have affected it so long as the crop remained upon the demised premises,—the right of the landlord to an attachment is confirmed by the statute."

It therefore follows that, as to this phase of the case, Turner was entitled to a judgment holding that the attachment had properly issued, and sustaining the same, and for costs of the action, and it became and was the duty of the court, under the undisputed facts of this case and the law applicable thereto, to enter judgment sustaining the attachment, and to tax the costs of the action to the defendant. There being no dispute whatsoever as to the facts on this phase of the case, the same should not have been submitted to the jury, nor can we say from the record before us that it was.

As to the first proposition, the judgment of the court as entered on the general verdict of the jury in favor of the defendant was undoubtedly correct.

The judgment is silent as to the attachment proceedings, yet this phase of the case should have been covered, and for the reasons hereinabove given, the judgment, in so far as the attachment proceedings are concerned, should be reversed, and the cause should be remanded to the District Court of Canadian County, with instructions to modify the judgment so entered, so as to hold that the attachment was properly issued and levied, and to tax the costs in both courts to the defendant in error.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

ARTHUR C. HUIDÉKOPER, Plff. in Err.,

v.

HERBERT S. HADLEY et al.

(100 C. C. A. 395, 177 Fed. 1.)

Action—state equalization board.

1. A suit to compel a state board of equalization to make a true equalization of the valuation of the property throughout the state for purposes of taxation is not against the state, within the meaning of a constitutional provision exempting the state from suit.

Taxes—equalization board—control of court.

2. The courts are not deprived of power to interfere with an arbitrary inequality in property values throughout the state, and an undervaluation of a portion of it, effected by the state board of equalization in violation of the provisions of the statute, on the theory that the act of the board is an exercise of discretion and beyond the control of the courts.

Mandamus—governor—ministerial duty.

3. The governor of a state is exempt from the control of the courts through a writ of mandamus even when performing duties imposed upon him as member of the state board for equalization of taxes.

Note.—For mandamus to governor, see notes to State ex rel. Irvine v. Brooks, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 750, and Rice v. Draper, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 355.

Same—governor's exemption—effect on others.

4. That mandamus will not lie to coerce the action of the governor of a state as a member of the state board for equalization of taxes will not prevent its running against the other members of the board, where by statute a majority of the board may transact the business required.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri to review a judgment sustaining a plea to the jurisdiction of the court and dismissing the petition for a writ of mandamus to compel respondents to make a true equalization of the valuation of property for the purposes of taxation. Affirmed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Adams, Circuit Judge, and Riner and Wm. H. Munger, District Judges.

Mr. E. Y. Mitchell, with Mr. W. D. Tatlow, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Elliott W. Major, Attorney General, John M. Atkinson, Assistant Attorney General, Guthrie & Franklin, B. R. Dysart, E. S. Jones, and John T. Barker, for defendants in error:

Respondents, acting under the Constitution and laws of the state in equalizing the property of the various counties and cities of the state, as the state board of equalization, represent the state, and their action is the action of the state.

In performing its duties the state board of equalization acts judicially. The writ of mandamus can only require the performance of a ministerial duty, not a judicial one involving discretion.

Adams, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a petition for a writ of mandamus against the members of the board of equalization of the state of Missouri, the members of a like board of the county of Macon, and the assessor and collector of the revenue of that county, to compel them to discharge duties which the relator, Huidekoper, avers they declined to perform. The circuit court sustained a plea to the jurisdiction, and, treating it also as a demurrer, dismissed the petition on two grounds: (1) Because the suit was against the state of Missouri in violation of the 11th Amendment of the Constitution, and (2) because the court was asked to review action of state officers resting in discretion. From that judgment error is prosecuted.

In order to understand the several questions which we are called upon to decide, a general statement of the case as made by the petition seems to be required.

Pursuant to authority conferred by law, Macon county in May, 1870, made a subscription to the capital stock of the Missouri & Mississippi Railroad Company and issued its negotiable bonds in payment therefor. The only recourse the holders of the bonds had for their payment was the right to compel the levy of a tax of $\frac{1}{20}$ of 1 per cent, upon the assessed value of the taxable property of the county, and to participate with other creditors of the county in the proceeds of a tax of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent authorized for general county purposes. Macon County Ct. v. Huidekoper (Macon County Ct. v. United States) 134 U. S. 332, 33 L. ed. 914, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 491, and cases cited. The relator became the owner of some of these bonds with attached coupons, and on default of payment recovered final judgments thereon. The subsequent securing of warrants upon the county treasurer, and other futile proceedings taken to secure satisfaction of his judgments, need not, for our present purposes, be dwelt upon. Suffice it to say the relator has not been able to collect his judgments, which amount in the aggregate to over \$263,000, and has resorted to this proceeding to enable him to do so.

The gravamen of his petition is: That the annual levies of $\frac{1}{2}$ and $\frac{1}{20}$ of 1 per cent upon the valuation of the property in the county, as assessed by the assessor and equalized by the state board of equalization, are entirely inadequate to raise the necessary fund to pay his judgments. That the present assessor of Macon county and his predecessors, for some time past, have intentionally, purposely, and fraudulently failed to assess the property of the county at its true value in money, but have assessed it at as low a fractional part thereof as would suffice to meet local needs, and have so done for the purpose of preventing the creation of a fund to pay the indebtedness of the county. That assessors of other counties of the state have also placed low values upon the property of their counties for the purpose of escaping their just proportion of the state tax.

That the state board of equalization, well knowing these facts, has for many years divided the counties of the state into groups, and, instead of equalizing the property among all the counties as required by law, has equalized it among the several groups only, so that the property of the same class in one group of counties has been assessed at a different per cent of its value than the same property in other counties or in different groups of counties. That in no case has the property of the different counties of the state been so assessed or equalized at its true value in money, but on the contrary has been assessed and equalized on an average of from 30 to 50 per cent only of that value. That the relator appeared before the state board at its last session, and informed its members of the fact that he was a judgment creditor of Macon county, advised them that the facts already detailed prevented the collection of his judgments, and demanded that the board equalize the various classes of property in Macon county on the basis of the real value in money, and certify the same to the proper officer of that county, to the end that, by the annual levies of $\frac{1}{4}$ and $\frac{1}{20}$ of 1 per cent allowed by law, a fund might be created to satisfy his judgments. That after a hearing of his petition a resolution was offered by Governor Hadley, a member of the board, in the words following: "That the true value in money of each class of property as the same is returned to this board for equalization in each county be ascertained by this board; that this true value in money of each class of such property in each county be set aside in a tabulation to be prepared, and that where the value of any of the classes of property in any of the counties, as returned to this board, is less than its true cash value, that such per centum of its true value be added thereto by this board as will make its assessed value as equalized by this board, equal to its true value in money, so that all classes of property in all the counties will be and is hereby equalized and assessed on a basis of its true value in money." That this resolution was voted down by a vote of three out of the five members constituting the board. That afterwards a resolution was offered by Mr. Cowgill, vice president of the board, providing that the true value in money of each class of property be ascertained by the board and set aside in a tabulation to be prepared, and that in the event the value of any of the classes of property in any of the counties as returned to the board is less than 50 per centum of its true cash value such per centum shall be added thereto as will make its assessed value equal to at least 50 per cent of its true value in money, to the end that all classes of property in the counties shall be equalized and assessed on a basis of not less than 50 per centum of its true value in money. That this resolution also failed to carry by a vote of three to two.

It is then alleged that by the action of a majority of the board in the particulars just mentioned and in other respects unnecessary now to be repeated, it arbitrarily, capriciously, and maliciously refused to equalize the property of the state and particularly that of Macon county on the basis of its true value in money, and knowingly, unlawfully, and fraudulently pretended to equalize the property of Macon county at $8,270,123, when its members knew that its true value was in excess of $25,000,000, that the act of the majority in so refusing was done intentionally, malevolently, and fraudulently with a view and for the purpose of assisting the officers of Macon county to defeat the payment of relator's judgments.

It is further alleged that the pretended equalization of the property of Macon county as well as that of the property of the entire state has been fictitious and fraudulent, and that the majority of the board have given out that at the sessions of the board to be held in the years 1910, 1911, and 1912, during which years they remain in office, they will continue the unlawful and fraudulent method of equalizing the property of the state by fixing the value at only a fraction of its real value not in excess of 33 per cent thereof.

In short, the petition discloses that, by a majority of its members, the state board has resorted to a method of dividing the counties of the state into groups and equalizing the values of property in each group without reference to values in counties embraced in other groups, and that as a result of that and other methods complained of and of a deliberately formed and expressed purpose to continue them, the property of the state as a whole has been equalized and will be continued to be equalized, not at its true value in money, but at a small fractional part thereof only. It is conceded in argument that the state board cannot take action solely with respect to Macon county, but must act in the equalization of values on a comprehensive plan embracing the property of all the counties and independent municipalities of the state.

Notwithstanding the fact that the members of the board of equalization and the assessor and collector of taxes of Macon county are made parties to this action, it is conceded that the performance of the duty upon which relator's remedy depends rests primarily with the state board; and it is only when that body shall have done its duty that the officers of the county can take effective action. In other words, it is the position of counsel for the relator that no relief can be granted to the judgment creditor as against the action of the county assessor and other county officers until the state board, as the final arbiter of values, shall have been appealed to and shall have done its duty.

Accordingly, the argument on both sides has been directed chiefly to the question whether the members of the state board are amenable to this proceeding by mandamus.

It is claimed by the respondents that for three reasons they are not: First, because the proceeding against them is, in effect, one against the state of Missouri and, therefore, prohibited by the 11th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States; second, that their action in declining to equalize the property of the state, as requested by the relator, was the exercise of a discretion which is not reviewable by the courts; third, that as respondent Hadley is the governor of the state he is not subject to the writ of mandamus to compel him to do a duty as a member of the board of equalization.

1. Is this proceeding a suit against the state?

Section 9140, Rev. Stat. Mo. 1899 (Anno. Stat. 1906, p. 4210), provides that the assessor of each county shall take an oath to faithfully and impartially perform the duties of his office and to assess all the property in the county at what he believes to be its actual cash value.

Section 9180 provides that the assessor shall value and assess all the property of his county according to its true value in money at the time of the assessment.

Sections 9127 and 9195 provide that a statement or abstract of the taxes so assessed in each county shall be forwarded to the state auditor on blanks furnished by him, to be by him laid before the state board of equalization.

The Constitution of the state (art. 10, § 18) creates the board and ordains that "there shall be a state board of equalization, consisting of the governor, state auditor, state treasurer, secretary of state, and attorney general. The duty of said board shall be to adjust and equalize the valuation of real and personal property among the several counties in the state, and it shall perform such other duties as are or may be prescribed by law."

Section 9126 provides that a majority of the members of the board shall constitute a quorum, and that the members shall each take an oath or affirmation that he will, "to the best of his knowledge and ability, equalize the valuation of real and personal property among the several counties in the state, according to the rules prescribed by this chapter for equalizing and valuing real property."

Section 9127 provides that the board, after receiving from the auditor abstracts or statements of all the taxable property in the state, and after classifying the same under certain headings, "shall proceed to equalize the valuation of each class thereof among the respective counties of the state in the following manner: "First—it shall add to the valuation of each class of the property, real or personal, of each county which it believes to be valued below its real value in money, such percentum as will increase the same in each case to its true value. Second—it shall deduct from the valuation of each class of the property, real or personal, of each county which it believes to be valued above its real value in money such percentum as will reduce the same in each case to its true value."

This brief epitome of the legislation clearly discloses that the policy of the state requires property to be assessed on the basis of its true value in money, and that a duty is cast upon the state board to equalize the property among the several counties of the state on that basis. Without now discussing the exact nature of that duty, its extent, or its limitations, it is sufficient, for our present purpose, to observe that it is an imperative duty imposed by the law of the state. A majority of its members constituting a working quorum refused to permit the board to perform that duty, and compelled it to decline to do so. In so acting they did not stand for the state of Missouri, and were not the state within the meaning of the 11th Amendment of the Constitution. A sovereign state must be presumed to be willing that its laws shall be obeyed. Through its laws it spoke to its servants and commanded them to do something. Certainly those servants, by their act of disobedience, do not represent or stand for the state. This suit, therefore, instead of being against the state, is against its servants to compel them to do a duty which, by accepting office, they agreed to perform.

A few authorities out of the many which might be referred to may not be out of place here.

In Board of Liquidation v. McComb, 92 U. S. 531, 23 L. ed. 623, a decree restraining the board of liquidation of the state of Louisiana from making improper use of certain bonds was under review. The Supreme Court, speaking by Mr. Justice Bradley, said: "The objections to proceeding against state officers by mandamus or injunction are: "First, that it is, in effect, proceeding against the state itself; and, secondly, that it interferes with the official discretion vested in the officers. It is conceded that neither of these things can be done. A state, without its consent, cannot be sued by an individual; and a court cannot substitute its own discretion for that of executive officers in matters belonging to the proper jurisdiction of the latter. But it has been well settled that, when a plain official duty, requiring no exercise of discretion, is to be performed, and performance is refused, any person who will sustain personal injury by such refusal may have a mandamus to compel its performance."

That the petition filed in this case does not seek to control the discretion of the members of the board will appear later in the discussion of that branch of the case.

In the case of Rolston v. Missouri Fund Comrs. (Rolston v. Crittenden), 120 U. S. 390, 30 L. ed. 721, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 599, the trustees in a mortgage made by the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad Company sought to restrain the executive officer of the state from selling mortgaged property under a prior statutory mortgage in favor of the state, on the ground that the liability for which the earlier lien was created had been satisfied, and that they, as trustees, were entitled to an assignment of the lien. Whether the suit was in effect a suit against the state and prohibited by the 11th Amendment arose. The court, speaking by Mr. Chief Justice Waite, said: "It is next contended that this suit cannot be maintained because it is in its effect a suit against the state, which is prohibited by the 11th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States; and Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S. 711, 27 L. ed. 448, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 128, is cited in support of this position. But this case is entirely different from that. There the effort was to compel a state officer to do what a statute prohibited him from doing. Here the suit is to get a state officer to do what a statute requires of him. The litigation is with the officer, not the state."

In Graham v. Folsom, 200 U. S. 248, 50 L. ed. 464, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 245, judgment creditors of a township, whose judgment was founded upon certain bonds issued in favor of a railroad, sought by mandamus to compel county officers to levy and collect a tax to satisfy their judgment. It was contended that those officers were state officers, and, being so, that the suit was an attempt to require the state to perform its contract, and was therefore in effect a suit against the state, which was prohibited by the Constitution. This contention was 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) denied on the authority, among other cases, of Rolston v. Missouri Fund Comrs. supra.

In Taylor v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 31 C. C. A. 537, 60 U. S. App. 166, 88 Fed. 350, a suit was instituted to enjoin certain state officers from certifying a tax which they claimed the right to do by authority of the state, but which the complainant averred was without authority. Judge Taft, speaking for the court of appeals for the sixth circuit in that case, said: "This is not a suit against the state. It is a suit against individuals, seeking to enjoin them from doing certain acts which they assert to be by the authority of the state, but which the complainant avers to be without lawful authority. The point has been so often decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that it is sufficient to refer to a few of the cases."

We find nothing in the later decisions of the Supreme Court, particularly in Ex parte Young and General Oil Co. v. Crain, 209 U. S. 123, 52 L. ed. 714, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 932, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441, 14 Ann. Cas. 764, and 209 U. S. 211, 52 L. ed. 754, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475, where the subject under consideration was exhaustively discussed, in conflict with the foregoing.

In the case of Raymond v. Chicago Union Traction Co. 207 U. S. 20, 52 L. ed. 78, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7, 12 Ann. Cas. 757, many expressions are found and urged upon our attention by learned counsel for respondents to the effect that the action of the state board of equalization in making the assessment there involved was the action of the state, but those expressions in our opinion are inapplicable to the present case. In that case the traction company was contending that the assessment of its property as made by the board, if enforced, would violate the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States by taking its property without due process of law, and would deprive it of the equal protection of the laws. It was there held that the state board was an instrumentality through which the state acted, and that the provisions of the 14th Amendment prohibited the taking of property without due process of law by the state, not only through its legislature or by its executive or judicial department, but by or through any other instrumentality whatsoever. The conclusion there announced was not that the board of equalization was the state within the meaning of the 11th Amendment, so as not to be suable without its consent, but that the board was an agent of the state in taking steps preliminary to the imposition and collection of taxes charged to have been illegal, and was therefore the state within the meaning of the 14th Amendment. Most obviously the doctrine of this case has nothing to do with the question now under consideration.

The contention that the present suit is prohibited because against the state, and therefore in violation of the 11th Amendment of the Constitution, is not sound, and cannot be sustained.

2. Was the action of the board here complained of the exercise of a discretion with which the courts cannot interfere? The learned trial court, from the showing made by the petition alone, answered this question in the affirmative. Whether that answer is correct or not depends upon the applicatory law and the facts stated in the petition, which for the purposes of this case must be taken to be true.

Article 10, § 3, of the Constitution of Missouri, ordains that "taxes may be levied and collected for public purposes only. They shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and all taxes shall be levied and collected by general laws."

The legislature of the state, by way of executing this constitutional mandate, provided a scheme for equalizing the valuation of property among all the counties of the state, based on actual value, as a standard of procedure. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 9127. To work out this general scheme the state board of equalization was created (art. 10, § 18, Mo. Const.) and endowed with the power and charged with the duty of equalizing the values of property as classified by the legislature in the manner prescribed by § 9127, supra. The words "equalize" or "equalization," as used in revenue statutes of the kind now under consideration, have an accepted meaning throughout the country. Cooley, in his work on Taxation, 2d ed. p. 421, says: "Equalization of assessments has, for its general purpose, to bring the assessments of different parts of a taxing district to the same relative standard so that no one of the parts may be compelled to pay a disproportionate part of the tax."

The statute imposing a duty upon the state board, taken in connection with the constitutional requirements of uniformity, is imperative that the equalization shall comprehend all the counties and similar subdivisions of the state, and shall be accomplished by taking the abstracts or returns of the county and city assessors as the basis, and adding to or deducting therefrom enough to bring the equalized valuation to the true value of the property of such county or city.

With this understanding of the legal duty resting upon the state board, let us examine the petition and ascertain therefrom 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

what the board actually did in response to the demand of the relator that it proceed to equalize the property of Macon and other counties according to its true value in money.

In the first place, it is made to appear that the board arbitrarily divided the counties of the state into several groups, and proceeded to equalize the property in the counties composing each group without equalizing the property of the several groups themselves, and thereby, as it is claimed, defeated the uniformity of values among all the counties as contemplated by the law. It is also charged that the board ignored the statutory command requiring it to equalize the valuation of the property in the several counties and independent cities by adding or deducting from the valuation as returned by the local assessing boards such sum as would bring the same to the true value of the property, and in lieu thereof adopted a standard of valuation not in excess of 33 per cent of the real value of the property, and equalized the valuations throughout the state on that basis; that the standard so adopted and the method so employed by the state board was by direction of a working majority arbitrarily, capriciously, and uniformly followed for many years with the intent and purpose, among other things, of aiding the officers of Macon county in defeating the collection of the relator's judgments.

The rule is well settled and fully recognized by us that when discretion is conferred upon public agents or officers their acts in the lawful exercise of that discretion cannot be controlled by mandamus. The rule is also well settled that, although the exercise of discretion will not be controlled by mandamus, yet the writ will lie to compel the person or the body in whom the discretion is lodged to proceed to its exercise. In view of these rules, we are of opinion that the discretion which cannot be controlled by mandamus is that discretion, and that only, which the law has vested in the person or body to be exercised. If the law has pointed out how or in what way the discretion shall be exercised, it is obviously not the exercise of the discretion imposed by law to proceed in any other way. To so proceed would be contrary to the law, and would be the exercise of arbitrary power, rather than discretion. To decline or refuse to proceed according to law or in the way pointed out by law is, in our opinion, equivalent to not proceeding at all. In other words, the discretion which will withstand review by the courts must be exercised under law, and not contrary to law.

In Madison v. Smith, 83 Ind. 502, 516, it is said: "It is no doubt the general rule that an inferior tribunal will only be compelled to act,—not to make a decision one way or the other; but where a body not strictly judicial, although possessing quasi judicial powers, is under an absolute duty to act, and to act only in a certain way, the performance of that duty, both as to the action and its character, will be coerced by mandate. . . . Where there is a discretion, courts will not compel its exercise in any given direction; but where, upon the facts, the duty is a plain and absolute one, it is otherwise."

In State ex rel. Wayne County v. Her-rald, 36 W. Va. 721, 15 S. E. 974, it was held that where the assessor was required to impose a value upon property as town lots, and undertook to do so by the acre or tract, its action was not the exercise of discretion, and could be corrected by mandamus.

In the case of State Board v. People, 191 Ill. 528, 58 L.R.A. 513, 61 N. E. 339, the state board adopted a method of assessing property contrary to that prescribed by law. A mandamus proceeding was instituted to correct it. The trial court commanded the board to proceed to value and assess the property in the manner prescribed by law, and specified what that was. The supreme court, in affirming that judgment, said: "The court does not, by its said order and judgment, undertake to control the discretion or judgment of the respondents in the valuation or assessment of the capital stock, including the franchises, of said corporations. It only lays down the rules of law which govern and the methods which should be pursued by the respondents in making such valuation and assessment. This we think proper."

In the case of Ramsay v. Hayes, 187 N. Y. 367, 80 N. E. 193, it was held by the court of appeals of that state that where a commissioner of a relief fund adopted a method for determining the amount, contrary to law, the remedy was by mandamus to compel him to fix the pension according to the rules prescribed by statute therefor. To the same effect is People v. Sanilac County, 71 Mich. 16, 38 N. W. 639, and Cleveland v. United States, 93 C. C. A. 274, 166 Fed. 677.

In State ex rel. McCleary v. Adcock, 206 Mo. 550, 121 Am. St. Rep. 681, 105 S. W. 270, the supreme court of Missouri sustained a proceeding by mandamus against the state board of health, and held that the law does not place in the hands of administrative parties arbitrary power, and that their simple ipse dixit is not sufficient evidence of exercise of lawful discretion.

In Illinois State Dental Examiners v. People, 123 Ill. 227, 13 N. E. 201, the supreme court of Illinois observed: "A public officer or inferior tribunal may be guilty of so gross an abuse of discretion or such an evasion of positive duty, as to amount to a virtual refusal to perform the duty enjoined, or to act at all in contemplation of law; in such a case mandamus will afford a remedy,"—citing Tapping, Mandamus, 66 and 19; Wood, Mandamus, 64.

The United States circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit, in the case of Cunningham v. Cleveland, 82 C. C. A. 55, 152 Fed. 907, in a case involving a question similar to that now before us, observed: "So long as the board acts lawfully and in good faith, its discretion cannot be supervised by the court. But it cannot, under the guise of its discretion, be permitted to accomplish an unlawful purpose."

We conclude, therefore, that the proceedings of the state board of equalization, in so far as they were not taken according to law and certainly in so far as they were taken in disregard and violation of the law, are not protected from judicial control as the exercise of a vested discretion.

3. The conclusions already reached dispose of the objections made in the trial court to issuing the writ of mandamus in this case; but it is now urged as an additional reason against it that the governor of the state, who constitutes one member of the board of equalization, cannot be coerced by the writ of mandamus to perform any executive duty, and that the balance of the board cannot be compelled to act without his co-operation. The governor, who is the chief executive officer of the state and as such required "to perform such duties as may be prescribed by law" (art. 5, § 1, Const.), including service upon the state board of equalization art. 10, § 18, Const. and § 9127, Rev. Stat.), when acting in that capacity, is performing an executive duty in no other or different sense than when performing any ministerial act devolving upon him as chief executive of the state.

Mr. High, in his work on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, 3d ed. § 120, after citing and considering many authorities on the subject, says that, according to the clear weight of authority, "the chief executive of the state is, as to the performance of any and all official duties, entirely removed from the control of the courts; and that he is beyond the reach of mandamus, not only as to duties of a strictly executive or political nature, but even as to purely ministerial acts whose performance the legislature may have required at his hands."

Judge Cooley, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of Michigan in People ex rel. Sutherland v. The Governor, 20

Mich. 320, 18 Am. Rep. 89, calls attention to the practical difficulty of distinguishing between political and ministerial duties, and says: "But when duties are imposed upon the governor, whatever be their grade, importance, or nature, we doubt the right of the courts to say that this or that duty might properly have been imposed upon a secretary of state, or a sheriff of a county or other inferior officer, and that inasmuch as, in case it had been so imposed, there would have been a judicial remedy for neglect to perform it, therefore there must be the like remedy when the governor himself is guilty of a similar neglect. The apportionment of power, authority, and duty to the governor is either made by the people in the Constitution, or by the legislature in making laws under it; and the courts, when the apportionment has been made, would be presumptuous if they should assume to declare that a particular duty assigned to the governor is not essentially executive, but is of such inferior grade and importance as properly to pertain to some inferior office, and consequently, for the purposes of their jurisdiction, the courts may treat it precisely as if an inferior officer had been required to perform it. To do this would be not only to question the wisdom of the Constitution or the law, but also to assert a right to make the governor the passive instrument of the judiciary in executing its mandates within the sphere of his own duties. Were the courts to go so far, they would break away from those checks and balances of government which were meant to be checks of co-operation, and not of antagonism or mastery, and would concentrate in their own hands something at least of the power which the people, either directly or by the action of their representatives, decided to intrust to the other departments of the government."

In State ex rel. Robb v. Stone, 120 Mo. 428, 23 L.R.A. 194, 41 Am. St. Rep. 705, 25 S. W. 376, the supreme court of Missouri cited and considered the numerous authorities relating to this subject, and stated the following conclusion: "Abundant authority establishes the position here taken that mandamus will not issue to the governor to compel the performance of any duty pertaining to his office, whether political or merely ministerial; whether commanded by the Constitution or by some law passed on the subject."

This doctrine was afterwards affirmed in the later case of State ex rel. North & South R. Co. v. Meier, 143 Mo. 439, 45 S. W. 306.

Whether, therefore, the duty imposed upon the governor of Missouri to act as a 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

member of the state board of equalization is ministerial, executive, or political in its character, he is not, according to the law of this state as interpreted by its highest judicial tribunal, responsible to the judiciary for his action. The high sense of duty which must be presumed to actuate the chief executive of a state is the sole arbiter to which appeal can be made in such matters.

Whether the decision of the highest judicial tribunal of the state exempting the governor from coercion by the writ of mandamus is so a construction of the Constitution and statutes of Missouri or so a rule of property or action in the state, as under familiar rules bind the Federal courts and forbid their independent judgment may be doubted. As to this we desire to express no opinion.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 34, 27 L. ed. 359, 365, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10, 21, after laying down the rule governing the exercise of independent judgment by the Federal courts in cases where state courts have made decisions which were not, properly speaking, controlling upon the national courts, said: "But even in such cases, for the sake of harmony and to avoid confusion, the Federal courts will lean towards an agreement of views with the state courts if the question seems to them balanced with doubt. Acting on these principles, founded as they are on comity and good sense, the courts of the United States, without sacrificing their own dignity as independent tribunals, endeavor to avoid, and in most cases do avoid, any unseemly conflict with the well-considered decisions of the state courts."

In view of these wise and temperate observations, and of the fact that the Missouri doctrine is in harmony with the great weight of authority, we shall conform to that doctrine, and hold that the respondent Hadley is not subject to the writ of mandamus in the present case.

But this is not conclusive of the inquiry before us. The governor is only one out of five members of the state board of equalization. Any three of them, according to the statute (§ 9126, Rev. Stat.) constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. The reason why the governor cannot be coerced by mandamus is that he needs no such coercion; he is conclusively presumed to be willing to perform all his executive duties. His constitutional obligation is to see that the laws of the state shall be faithfully executed (art. 5, §§ 4, 6, Const.) and his oath of office requires him to support the Constitution and demean himself faithfully in office (art. 14, § 6, Const.). The very reasons which exempt him from liability to the writ of mandamus are the ones which insure the performance of his duty as a member of the board of equalization. Not only is this theoretically true, but the petition in this case shows that it is actually so. He led a movement in the board to secure equalization of values according to law, and it must be conclusively presumed that he will take no different course when occasion requires him to act.

But whatever the fact may be in this regard, the board is not one which requires either unanimity of consideration or of action by all its members. By special provision of law (§ 9126, Rev. Stat.) any three of them constitute a quorum and are therefore competent to transact the business of the board in the absence of the other members. If the governor should be disabled by sickness or other infirmity from attending the sessions of the board, can it be doubted that the remaining members of that body could be compelled to proceed with the performance of their duty? Obviously not. Accordingly, we think the writ of mandamus may lawfully be awarded to secure action by a statutory quorum of the board in this case when circumstances are such that the entire membership cannot be reached by that writ.

Other less important questions have been argued to us, but they involve nothing which compels a different conclusion from that which we have reached.

When the writ shall be issued, as it must be, the return made and the proof, if any, taken, the court will doubtless better understand all the facts and circumstances of the case, and be better able to consider some of the contentions of learned counsel concerning the fiscal policy of the state and the proper exercise of discretion by its officers. As it is, however, the petition, to the averments of which we are necessarily confined, makes it appear that the relator's judgments against Macon county, which a just regard for civil rights requires should be paid, are rendered practically worthless by a failure to discharge a duty imposed by law upon the respondents. For such a breach of duty there ought to be a remedy.

The judgment must be reversed as to all the respondents except Governor Hadley, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to proceed in the usual way in such cases, and in harmony with the views here expressed.

Appeal dismissed by the Supreme Court of the United States, October 19, 1911.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

MINNEAPOLIS SELLING COMPANY

v.

R. N. COWIN & COMPANY, Appt.

Sale — by description — acceptance — effect.

One who offers to manufacture a quantity of cards of a certain description does not, by displaying work for the inspection of the purchaser, warrant that the cards will equal the work displayed, and therefore if the purchaser accepts the cards delivered without inspecting them within a reasonable time to see if they conform to the description, or if he makes sales after learning of defects, he will be precluded from claiming damages because of an alleged nonconformity.

(November 20, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Blackhawk County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on goods sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. Affirmed.

Statement by Weaver, J.:

Action at law to recover the selling price of a quantity of post cards. There was trial to a jury, and at the conclusion of the testimony the court upon plaintiffs' motion directed a verdict in their favor. From the judgment entered upon this verdict, the defendants have appealed.

Messrs. Courtright & Arbuckle and F. S. Merriau, for appellant:

Plaintiff warranted the quality and merchantability of the post cards in the contract of sale.

Note. — The above case is authority for the doctrine that the exhibition by the seller to the buyer of post cards as illustrative of the quality and excellence of the card which the former agrees to manufacture for the latter is not a sale by sample because the cards to be manufactured under the agreement were not to represent the same views as the card exhibited, and hence the rule that a sale by sample constitutes a warranty of quality which sur-

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the date of the transaction out of which this litigation has arisen, the defendants were proprietors of a news stand in the city of Waterloo, Iowa, and plaintiffs were manufacturers and jobbers of post cards at Minneapolis, Minnesota. On May 3 and 4, 1907, plaintiffs' traveling representative called upon defendants and solicited their order for cards. On the day first mentioned defendants gave the solicitor an order for certain Christmas goods amounting to $62.70, over which, as we understand the record, there is no controversy. On the following day defendants gave him another order for 30,000 post cards. These cards were to be decorated with colored pictures of specified views of scenery in and about Waterloo, to be copied from photographs obtained for that purpose. The cards were manufactured by plaintiffs and shipped in three separate consignments, namely, June 17th, July 1st, and November 19th, following the date of the order. The larger part of the cards was contained in the consignment of July 1st. Upon the account thus created defendants made payments as follows: August 22, $50; October 14, $50; and November 6, $25. The remainder of $132.70 not being paid on demand therefor, this action was begun at law to recover the same.

Defendants admit giving the orders revives acceptance does not apply. This doctrine seems to be in accord with the weight of authority. See note in 70 L.R.A. 653, as to warranty on sale of goods by sample.

And upon the question of whether the implied warranties raised by a sale of a character very similar to that involved in MINNEAPOLIS SELLING Co. v. R. N. COWIN & Co. will survive acceptance, see Heath Dry Gas Co. v. Hurd, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 160, and note thereto.

The doctrine of MINNEAPOLIS SELLING Co. v. R. N. COWIN & Co. that a sale by description does not constitute a sale by warranty which will survive acceptance after inspection, with knowledge that the article does not correspond with the description, at least, where the sale is by executory contract, is discussed at length in a note in 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 258, considering effect of a sale by a particular description of kind or quality. And as bearing upon the same question, see note in 36 L.R.A. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

(N.S.) 467, discussing the question of use as a waiver of the right to rescind for breach of warranty or noncompliance with the contract.

And see also note in 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1167, as to the right of the buyer to retain the goods and defeat an action for the purchase price on discovering that the goods do not comply with the requirements of the contract; also note in 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1167, as to the effect of delivery to carrier upon buyer's right to reject goods for lack of quality.

As to the right of a purchaser of goods deliverable in instalments to rescind the contract or refuse further deliveries for breach of quality, see note in 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 539.

For an exception to the general rule that a sale by description does not constitute an express warranty of quality, see note in 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 79, on the liability of the vender of seeds.

ferred to, but alleged by way of counterclaim that plaintiffs' agent negotiating with them for a sale of the post cards produced a sample of the kind of work which plaintiffs could or would do for the defendants; that such card so exhibited was "of artistic quality and a character of card which would have been easily and readily salable on the market in Waterloo." They further allege that the cards when made and delivered to them "were imperfect and defective from the standpoint of salability, and the views represented thereon were dim and imperfect," by reason of which they were "inartistic, absolutely unsalable, and of no value whatever."

Giving the evidence its most favorable construction in support of the defense and counterclaim, it tends to show plaintiffs' agent displayed to defendants one or more cards which had been made in Germany, and said that the cards with which plaintiffs would fill the order given him would be as good or better than those of German make. The cards delivered upon this order, defendants testify, were plainly of quality and finish inferior to the German cards had in view at the time the order was given. The pictures were not composed of as many colors, and the colors were blurred or run together and less distinct in perspective than they should have been to equal the sample, and according to defendants' testimony had little or no market value.

It is conceded, however, that defendants did sell and dispose of some 13,000 of them. No complaint of the quality or workmanship of the cards appears to have been made to plaintiffs until some time after the last small shipment made in November, 1907. Apparently in the latter part of December, 1907, this last consignment was reshipped to the plaintiffs without any letter of explanation; but plaintiffs refused to receive it. Indeed, no express objection or complaint of the character or quality of the cards is shown until after this action was begun.

The position taken by appellants is that upon the record so made the jury would have been justified in finding that plaintiffs warranted the quality and workmanship of the cards, and that the cards were not in fact as warranted. Under such conditions they claim they are entitled to the benefit of the rule which permits a purchaser with a warranty to receive and retain the subject of the purchase and still preserve his right of action for a breach of the warranty. That there is a well-recognized rule in this state to the effect here stated is not open to question. 2 Mechem, Sales, § 1811; Upton Mfg. Co. v. 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Huiske, 69 Iowa, 557, 29 N. W. 621; Aultman, M. & Co. v. Theiler, 34 Iowa, 272.

The serious question at this point is whether, under the facts in the case as stated by defendants themselves, they come within the benefit of the principle which they invoke. Is any warranty shown? The cards which the plaintiffs were to deliver were not then in existence. They were yet to be printed and colored and put in completed shape for the market.

The agreement stated by defendants themselves in their testimony on the trial was in substance an agreement to manufacture and deliver certain specified described goods. Many courts, including this court, have been disposed to draw a distinction between executory contracts of this character and ordinary executed contracts of sale and warranty, and to hold that representations which might sustain a claim of warranty in cases of the latter kind will, in cases of the former class, be treated not as warranties, but as what is sometimes denominated "sales by description." Chantler v. Hopkins, 4 Mees. & W. 399, 1 Hurlst. & N. 377, 8 L. J. Exch. N. S. 14, 3 Jur. 58; Allison v. Vaughan, 40 Iowa, 421; Hirshhorn v. Stewart, 49 Iowa, 418; Mackey v. Swartz, 60 Iowa, 710, 15 N. W. 576; Schopp v. Taft, 106 Iowa, 612, 76 N. W. 843; Berthold v. SeEVERS Mfg. Co. 89 Iowa, 506, 56 N. W. 669; Electric Storage Battery Co. v. Waterloo, C. F. & N. R. Co. 138 Iowa, 369, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1183, 116 N. W. 144.

In cases of this kind it is held that the purchaser is required to inspect the goods, when delivered or tendered for delivery, and if he finds they do not conform, in kind or quality or description, to the terms of his order or contract, he may refuse to accept them and so notify the seller. Failing to do so within a reasonable time, or proceeding to use or sell the property as his own after inspection has disclosed its nonconformity to his order, he is held to waive objection thereto, and must pay the agreed price. The writer of this opinion is not impressed with the soundness of this distinction or the logical sufficiency of the arguments by which it is supported, but the court has been too long committed to it to justify us in overruling the numerous precedents to that effect. The most plausible ground for the distinction is in the proposition that an order given for property of a particular kind or description, and particularly where it is contemplated that the article is to be manufactured and prepared for the special purpose of filing the order, the undertaking of the seller with reference to the quality and description of the article is not so much a warranty as a condition precedent to the duty of the purchaser to accept it. If then, when the tender is made of an article differing in any respect from the one ordered, and the defect is plainly apparent upon examination, and purchaser does not insist upon the condition precedent and refuse to accept the tender as a fulfillment of the seller's contract, he is held to have admitted the sufficiency thereof and to waive his right to thereafter raise the objection, and the seller is entitled to recover the agreed price.

In Berthold v. Seevers Mfg. Co. 89 Iowa, 508, 56 N. W. 669, which involves the question we are here considering, this court said: "When goods are delivered on an existing contract requiring a particular quality, the absence or presence of which can be seen on mere view, in such case the purchase is without warranty or [and?] the acceptance without objection leaves the seller relieved of all responsibility for the goodness, quality, or fitness of the property." This fairly sums up the effect of our decisions applicable to the issue here submitted.

In this connection it should be said defendants testify that the inferior quality of the cards delivered to them was clearly visible from the first. They received them without objection or complaint, and proceeded to sell nearly half of them before suggesting any dissatisfaction with the purchase. If the rule of our prior decisions is to be adhered to, the trial court did not err in holding it applicable to this situation.

It is to be remembered, also, that in this case the German card exhibited to the defendants was not in any proper sense a "sample," because, as we have noted, the cards to be sold were as yet unmanufactured, and no sample of them either as to kind or quality could be produced. It was rather an exhibit illustrating the quality or excellence of the work plaintiffs claimed they were able to do. The matter of artistic excellence or degree of artistic perfection, which is the question most insisted upon by the defendants, is so much a matter of taste, and taste is so much a matter of education and training, that a promise that a picture to be produced shall be "as good or better" than one which is referred to as a standard can hardly be more than a mere expression of opinion on which no one can be supposed to rely as a warranty.

Millions of the American people, who would look with more or less weariness upon the masterpieces of Raphael, Titian, Turner, and West, discover great merit in the highly colored supplements of their Sunday morning newspapers. Under the golden dome of a Western capital is a 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

specimen of the painter's art for which the people cheerfully paid many thousand dollars, but the writer has the word of an eminent Scotch-American that in his judgment "it is not worth 50 cents." The same canvas which appeals to one as an excellent portrait by Whistler will be readily recognized by another of less technical learning, but perhaps keener perception, as a graphic portrayal of a Western cyclone.

While the use of the word "warranty" or "warrant" is of course not essential to sustain such a defense or counterclaim, its absence is a circumstance of some significance; and, if the words actually employed are under all the circumstances clearly to be understood as mere expressions of opinion or boastful praise of an article yet to be manufactured, neither the court nor jury is at liberty to treat them as a warranty.

An examination of the record in this case leads us to the conclusion that no express warranty was shown, and that under the rule established by our own cases the facts presented do not call for an application of the law as to implied warranties.

It follows that the judgment of the District Court must be affirmed.

Brooke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Anna Cameron died intestate April 16, 1910. She was never married, but had an illegitimate son, Antoine Dennoyer, who 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

died November 13, 1900. The appellant, Anastasia Goodell, is the legitimate and only child of Antoine Dennoyer. The estate of Anna Cameron was duly administered in probate court and an order there made assigning the residue thereof to Casimir Yezerski and Elizabeth Blavet, the brother and sister of Anna Cameron. An appeal was taken to the circuit court, where the order of distribution was affirmed. Anastasia Goodell has now removed the case to this court for review by writ of error. The sole question raised upon the record is the proper construction to be given to Comp. Laws 1897, § 9065: "Every illegitimate child shall be considered as an heir of his mother, and shall inherit her estate, in like manner as if born in lawful wedlock; but shall not be allowed to claim, as representing his mother, any part of the estate of any of her kindred, either lineal or collateral."

Michigan adopted this statute from Massachusetts, and it will be found in the Revised Statutes of 1838 at page 268. Some eight years after it became a part of the statute law of Michigan, it received judicial construction by the Massachusetts court. Curtis v. Hewins, 11 Met. 294. In that case the precise situation had arisen which is here presented, and the court held, without discussion, that "the statute provision did not apply to grandchildren of the mother of an illegitimate child."

It is contended by the appellees that this construction is controlling upon this court, under the authority of Besser v. Alpena Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 631, 119 N. W. 902; Preston Nat. Bank v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 142 Mich. 272, 105 N. W. 757. In the latter case it is said that "it is an established rule of construction that the adoption of a statute of a sister state is presumed to have been had with reference to the previous construction given to such statute by the courts of such state,"—citing cases. This rule is not absolutely imperative. Stellwagen v. Wayne Probate Judge, 130 Mich. 166, 89 N. W. 728. The rule, however, can have no application in the instant case, because the statute under consideration did not receive judicial construction in Massachusetts until long after its adoption by this state. The decision in that state should receive just that consideration as authority to which it would be entitled under ordinary circumstances. Examined in this light, it is not convincing. The statute is not analyzed, and no reason or authority is advanced in support of the conclusion. It is a bald determination of the point at issue without more.

We are therefore free to adopt such a construction of the law in Michigan as commends itself to our judgment. Cyc. vol. 5, p. 642, note 95, states the rule as follows: "The death of the illegitimate before descent cast will not preclude his issue from receiving the estate which would have vested in him and be thereby transmitted to his issue were he alive." Cases from various jurisdictions are cited by the author in support of the rule. In addition to those cited, the following cases also lend strength in some measure to the proposition: Turnmire v. Mayes, 121 Tenn. 45, 114 S. W. 478; Houston v. Davidson, 45 Ga. 574; Bales v. Elder, 118 Ill. 436, 11 N. E. 421; Jenkins v. Drane, 121 Ill. 217, 12 N. E. 684; McGuire v. Brown, 41 Iowa, 650; Brewer v. Hamor, 83 Me. 251, 22 Atl. 161; Coor v. Starling, 54 N. C. (1 Jones, Eq.) 243; McBryde v. Patterson, 78 N. C. 412; Powers v. Kite, 83 N. C. 156; Grundy v. Hadfield, 16 R. I. 579, 18 Atl. 186. It is stated in 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, at page 333: "According to the construction placed upon some of the statutes which confer inheritable qualities upon illegitimate children, the lawful issue of a deceased illegitimate parent does not inherit the estate of a paternal or maternal ancestor of the parent, to which the bastard would have been entitled if living." Four cases are cited in support of the text, only one of which is direct authority upon the point. That one is Curtis v. Hewins, supra. The text continues: "But the statutes of some of the United States are given a different construction, and the children of a deceased illegitimate child succeed to any estate which the illegitimate would have inherited if alive,"—citing many of the cases noted above. An examination of all the decisions will disclose that the statutes under which they were pronounced were not exactly like our own, nor are the facts the same in any case except Curtis v. Hewins, supra. The facts in the case of Grundy v. Hadfield, supra, are not similar to those in the case at bar, and the Rhode Island statute differs from our own. It provides: "Bastards shall be capable of inheriting or transmitting inheritance, on the part of their mother, in like manner as if they had been lawfully begotten of such mother." In an earlier case (Briggs v. Greene, 10 R. I. 495) the court in construing the statute said: "They shall inherit as the same mother's legitimate children might. The illegitimate are put upon the same footing as the legitimate for the purpose of inheritance, and for this purpose are legitimate. They have then all the same kindred as her legitimate children have, and when those born in lawful wedlock take by descent according to degrees 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) prescribed by the statute, the others take also."

It will be noted that the foregoing excerpt deals only with the rights of the bastard to inherit under the statute. His right to transmit such inheritance collaterally is granted by the statute. He could always at common law transmit his inheritance lineally to his own descendants. This case dealt with the right of one illegitimate daughter to inherit under the statute from another illegitimate daughter of the same mother, the mother having predeceased her. The Iowa statute provides that "illegitimate children inherit from the mother and the mother from the children." In the case of McGuire v. Brown, supra, this statute was construed. There, the deceased left surviving him two brothers and one Martha L. Gibbins, an illegitimate daughter of his deceased sister, Sarah McGuire. The facts therefore are, upon principle, the same as those in the case at bar. The court said: "This section constitutes an illegitimate child a lawful heir of the mother, for, the capacity to inherit being conferred, it follows that the child is in effect an heir to the mother and the mother an heir to the child." The North Carolina cases are not of value because they do not deal with the precise question here at issue. The Illinois statute is so much broader than our own that the decisions in that state lose value as direct precedents. The case of Ash v. Way, 2 Gratt. 203, is instructive. See also Turnmire v. Mayes, supra.

While many of the cases cited have no direct or controlling effect upon the question now before us, they do serve to illustrate the fact that the progress of civilization and the spread of correct ideas upon the subject have tended largely to the amelioration of the condition of illegimates and to the obliteration of the old common-law doctrine that they were to be regarded as outcasts. The statute in question is remedial in character, and it is to be presumed that the legislature intended the most beneficial construction of the act consistent with a proper regard for the ordinary canons of construction. Notwithstanding the rule that a statute in derogation of the common law must be construed strictly, it is well settled that it must be construed sensibly and in harmony with the legislative purpose. What was that purpose as indicated by the statute? If it was the legislative intent to take care of the interest of the illegitimate alone, the statute would have been complete when it said: "Every illegitimate child shall be considered as an heir of his mother." Those words alone were sufficient to clothe the illegitimate himself with heritable qualities so far as his mother's estate was concerned. But other words were added: "And shall inherit her estate in like manner as if born in lawful wedlock." This language is used to qualify or define the character of his heirship provided for earlier in the section. He is an heir of his mother. What kind of an heir? An heir the same as if born in lawful wedlock. What are the incidents of heirship of one born in lawful wedlock? Obviously the first and most important is the right to transmit his inheritance to the heirs of his body. But we are of opinion that, even without the definitive words, the situation would be the same, for at common law the illegitimate could transmit his inheritance to the heirs of his body.

The judgment assigning the residue of the estate to the brother and sister of Anna Cameron is reversed, and the case remanded, for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

MARGARET MOSER

v.

PHILADELPHIA, HARRISBURG, &
PITTSBURG RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(233 Pa. 259, 82 Atl. 362.)

Railroad — lease — discrimination in sidings — liability.

1. A railroad company is not liable for

Note. — Liability of lessor of railroad for discrimination by lessee against shippers.

On the question as to the liability of the lessor of a railroad for injuries caused by negligence of another company using the road under a lease, license, or contract, see note to Caruthers v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 44 L.R.A. 737.

The grant of a franchise to a railroad company is a trust carrying with it the duty to serve the public faithfully and impartially and to perform the duties and obligations imposed upon it by its charter or the general laws of the state; and the railroad company cannot, in the absence of charter stipulation or legislative authority to the contrary, by lease or other contract, transfer to another company its road and the use of its franchise, and thereby absolve itself from responsibility for the conduct and management of the road, or evade any duty it may owe the public. This is because the leasing is without authority of law, and the lessee stands in the relation of agent of the lessor, acting for the lessor, and binding the lessor by every act done in the management of the road. But even where there is due authority of law for the 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

discrimination in siding facilities, made contrary to the provisions of a statute, by its lessee, against an adjoining mill owner, after the lease was executed, and the lessee had gone into possession of the property.

Same — duty to furnish siding facilities.

2. A railroad company is under no obligation to furnish siding facilities to adjoining landowners.

Estoppel — position in litigation — subsequent denial.

3. A property owner who has asserted the validity of a lease of a railroad to compel the lessee to furnish him siding facilities cannot, in another proceeding to hold the lessor liable in damages for refusal to do so, deny its validity.

Judgment — equity decree — effect of law action.

4. A decree in chancery in a suit against a lessor and lessee railroad, requiring them to furnish siding facilities to an adjoining mill owner, as required by statute, is not conclusive of the liability of the lessor in a subsequent action at law to hold it liable in damages for refusal to furnish such facilities.

Estoppel — finding of facts — effect in subsequent action.

5. A finding in an equity suit to compel the furnishing of siding facilities by a railroad of repeated demands upon the railroad company to do so, covering a long period of time, not necessary to the decree, and based upon immaterial evidence, is not sufficient to establish such demand in a subsequent action at law to hold the company liable in damages for failure to do so.

leasing of a railroad, the company cannot, by leasing its line, discharge itself of those responsibilities which are imposed upon it by the law of its incorporation and the positive duties which it owes to the public. Considerable discussion upon the liability for duties absolutely imposed by law upon the lessor company and duties arising from the manner of the operation of trains is found in the cases passing upon the liability of the lessor for negligence of the lessee.

No case has been found passing upon the liability of the lessor for discrimination by lessee against shippers, where a lease of the road was authorized by law, as was the case in MOSER v. PHILADELPHIA, H. & P. R. Co.

Accordingly it has been held that the original grantee of the franchise is liable in damages to a shipper for the refusal of its lessee to furnish transportation facilities upon demand, where such lease is not authorized by law. Central & M. R. Co. v. Morris, 68 Tex. 49, 3 S. W. 457.

Generally, as to power to compel a railroad to build, maintain, or connect with, side tracks for accommodation of shippers, see State ex rel. Mt. Hope Coal Co. v. White Oak R. Co. and note appended thereto in 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1013. A. L. R.

Damages — Increase in cost — Liability under decree.

6. The mere fact that a stranger offered to construct a railroad siding for a certain amount before the entry of the decree requiring a railroad company to do so, and some time after the decree, complainant was compelled to pay him a much larger amount for the work, does not establish the liability of the railroad company for the difference especially where there is nothing to show when demand was made upon it or its duty began.

(January 2, 1912.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Cumberland County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for undue and unreasonable discrimination in the matter of furnishing facilities for transportation. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Conrad Hambleton and John W. Wetzel, for appellant:

The defendant having leased its railroad prior to the cause of action, there can be no recovery against it for an act of the lessee, in discriminating in the furnishing of rates or facilities.

Pinkerton v. Pennsylvania Traction Co. 193 Pa. 229, 44 Atl. 284; Caruthers v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 59 Kan. 629, 44 L.R.A. 737, 54 Pac. 673.

The character of injuries set up by the plaintiff is not such as is contemplated by the act of 1883.

Hoover v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 156 Pa. 220, 22 L.R.A. 263, 36 Am. St. Rep. 43, 27 Atl. 282; Wright v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 5.

There can be no recovery for any part of the cost of the siding, except through a reformation of the decree.

Head v. Meloney, 111 Pa. 99, 2 Atl. 195; Monongahela Nav. Co. v. Wood, 194 Pa. 47, 45 Atl. 73; Peebles v. Pittsburgh, 101 Pa. 304, 47 Am. Rep. 714; De la Cuesta v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 136 Pa. 78, 9 L.R.A. 631, 20 Atl. 505.

Messrs. Joseph P. McKeehan and S. B. Sadler, for appellee:

An adjoining landowner has, as such, a special and peculiar right to a railroad siding. In estimating damages for land taken, a railroad takes credit for the benefit conferred incidental to this right. No credit can be taken for benefits incident to rights enjoyed by the public.

Moser v. Philadelphia, H. & P. R. Co. 35 Pa. Co. Ct. 49; Pittsburgh & L. E. R. Co. v. Robinson, 95 Pa. 426; Reeser v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 215 Pa. 136, 64 Atl. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

376; Beech Creek R. Co. v. Olanta Coal Min. Co. 85 C. C. A. 148, 158 Fed. 36.

No statute authorizes the transfer, by lease or otherwise, of the right to take land and build a railroad. The owner company must pay for its right of way, and if, in building its road, it discriminates in constructing permanent shipping facilities, such as sidings, it must answer.

Noyes, Intercompany Relations, §§ 210, 216, 217; Snyder v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 210 Pa. 500, 60 Atl. 151; St. Louis, W. & W. R. Co. v. Curl, 28 Kan. 622; Caruthers v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 44 L.R.A. 727, note.

Stewart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment in this case can be sustained only as it can be made to appear that liability for the injury complained of attached to the defendant company prior to the lease of its road to the operating company. The action was for the recovery of damages for undue and unreasonable discrimination in the matter of furnishing facilities for transportation. The appellee not only admits that the action was based on the statute of June 4, 1883 (P. L. 72), which prohibits such discrimination and allows recovery of triple damages for any violation, but insists upon it, in view of the contention made by appellant to the contrary. Without this, it is too apparent for argument that the action was so based, and there can be no question as to the sufficiency of the declaration for that purpose. That appellee was unduly and unreasonably discriminated against by the refusal of siding privileges, which, under similar conditions, had been allowed to others, is a fact established by the verdict.

The governing question, however, remains, Where did legal liability for the injury attach? The defendant had constructed its road long before the plaintiff became an adjoining landowner. Fifteen years before she became such owner, the defendant company, in the exercise of a statutory right, leased its entire road to the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company, which latter company has ever since continued to operate it. It is settled law in Pennsylvania that, when a railroad company leases its road to another company, the former is exempted from liability for any default or negligence in the operation of the road by the lessee. Pinkerton v. Pennsylvania Traction Co. 193 Pa. 229, 44 Atl. 284. This exemption, of course, does not extend to liabilities incurred by the owning company prior to the lease. Whatever legal liability the owning company incurred before the lease, and which remained undischarged, continued as an obligation of that company, from which neither lease nor statute could discharge it. No authority is needed for so plain a proposition. When did the liability arise which the plaintiff is here seeking to enforce? There can be but one answer: When the discrimination was practised. When was it practised? To this, also, there can be but one answer. When plaintiff was denied facility which, under like conditions, had been allowed to others. This was fifteen years after the defendant company had parted with the control of its road. How, then, could liability attach to the defendant company for the default?

The effort of appellee is to refer the default to an antecedent original obligation resting on the defendant company to allow siding privileges to adjoining landowners. We know of no such antecedent obligation. The right to siding connection as specific privilege is purely statutory. Under our acts of assembly, the owners of mills and manufactories may of right connect their private sidings with railroads in their vicinity. So much was decided in Pittsburgh & L. E. R. Co. v. Robinson, 95 Pa. 426. The right there spoken of, it is to be observed, is not a right incident to adjoining ownership, but to the ownership of mills and manufactories in the vicinity of the railroad; and the right is given whenever such ownership has associated with it the right, however acquired, whether through ownership of all the land between mill or manufactory and the railroad, or by privilege, through grant, license, or otherwise of an intervening owner, to construct a siding from the mill or manufactory, up to the line of the railroad. The one test is the right of ownership of the mill or manufactory, and, with it, the right to construct a siding therefrom to the line of the railroad. When these concur, the right to the connection follows: Mere ownership of land adjoining a railroad, without more, confers no such right as here claimed. The plaintiff only acquired the right to build a siding up to the line of defendant's right of way in 1905, when she purchased the land lying between her land, on which were her quarries and lime kilns, and the defendant's right of way; and not until then was she in position to demand, under the statute, a connection with the railroad. That, as we have seen, was fifteen years after the defendant company had leased its road. Clearly, the railroad company owed no antecedent statutory duty to the plaintiff in this regard. Nor did it owe any original duty distinguishable from the original duty it owed to every citizen of the commonwealth. All such duties, by the act of leasing, devolved upon the defendant's lessee. Corporate liability for disregard of them attaches, of course; but it attaches only to the company that inflicts the injury. An examination of the case of Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Crane, 113 U. S. 424, 28 L. ed. 1064, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 578, cited and relied upon by appellee's counsel, will show that it gives no support whatever to their contention in this regard. There the original company had engaged, for a consideration paid it, to construct its road to a point within a certain township. After building its road conformably to the agreement, it leased it to another company, which, in reconstructing the road, avoided the point designated in the agreement. At the suit of a taxpayer of the township against both lessor and lessee, it was held that the change in the road had been improperly made, and that the lessor was a necessary party for the determination of the controversy, because it had incurred whatever liability there was before it leased the road. We are unable to see anything in the case now before us that this case illustrates in the remotest degree. Admittedly there was a distinct, express agreement, for a consideration which the lessor company had received, to maintain the line to a certain point, and this agreement antedated the lease. In the present case, there never was any agreement, and the duty arose only after the defendant had leased its road. Without agreement to be observed, and without duty to be performed, no liability could arise. The only original duty that rested on the original company in this regard was the duty to treat all citizens of the commonwealth alike with respect to transportation facilities. Quite as much of an antecedent duty rested upon the lessor to see that all were treated alike with respect to rates of transportation; and yet appellee concedes that for discrimination in rates the lessee alone is liable. It is difficult to understand the logic that would exempt the lessor in the one case and make it liable in the other.

It is argued that, even though the effect of a lease from one railroad to another is to exempt the owning company from liability for discrimination in transportation facilities, the rule cannot be applied in the present case, because here the roads of lessor and lessee were not in fact connecting roads at the time the lease was executed, and the lease therefore was invalid, since the statute gives the right to lease only where the roads connect. In what has already been said, no reference is made to the fact of an earlier equity proceeding, in which this plaintiff sought and obtained a mandatory injunction against both the defendant company and the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company, as the former's lessee, requiring them and each of them to do the very thing for the nondoing of which the present action against lessor was brought, and which has since been done by the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company, pursuant to the decree against it, obtained at the instance of the plaintiff. The claim there made by the plaintiff was a distinct assertion of the validity of the lease which she here would assail. She obtained against the lessee the decree which compelled it to build the siding across the railroad's right of way to her land solely on the ground that it was lessee, and she reimbursed the lessee for the cost and expense of constructing the siding, as she was directed by the terms of the decree. She is now concluded by these facts from asserting the invalidity of the lease. "It is settled [law]," says Trunkey, J., in McQueen's Appeal, 104 Pa. 595, 49 Am. Rep. 592, "that 'a man who obtains or defeats a judgment by pleading or representing an act in one aspect will be precluded from giving it a different and inconsistent character in a subsequent suit upon the same subject.'" To the same effect will be found Campbell v. Stephens, 66 Pa. 314; Aronson v. Cleveland & P. R. Co. 70 Pa. 68. The general rule in such cases is thus stated in 16 Cyc. 799: "A claim made or position taken in a former action or judicial proceeding will estop the party to make an inconsistent claim or to take a conflicting position in a subsequent action or judicial proceeding, to the prejudice of the adverse party, where the parties are the same, and the same questions are involved." The plaintiff thus being estopped from questioning the validity of the lease, discussion on our part of the matter here sought to be raised is wholly unnecessary.

In support of the judgment, it is contended that appellant is estopped by the decree in the earlier equity proceeding from asserting its nonliability in the present action for damages for unfair discrimination, inasmuch as by that decree the defendant company was adjudged in default with respect to furnishing plaintiff with siding privileges. It is undoubtedly a general rule that, where, in an equity proceeding, the merits, or any facts material to the final determination of the controversy, have been considered and passed upon, such matters are as much res judicata as they would be by a judgment at law. Nevertheless a certain distinction between a decree in equity and a judgment at law remains; for, as said in Larkins v. Lindsay, 205 Pa. 534, 55 Atl. 184, in de- 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

termining what was or might have been involved in the decree, regard must be had to the reasons of the chancellor, as well as to his decree. In the equity proceeding, the Philadelphia, Harrisburg, & Pittsburgh Railroad Company, the lessor company, was made codefendant with the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company, the lessee. The facts material to the final determination in the case must be gained from an examination of the decree. It was as follows: "And now, 23d day of August, 1907, it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the defendant the Philadelphia, Harrisburg, & Pittsburgh R. R. Company, and the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company shall and do proceed, without further delay, forthwith to place in position and construct, at a convenient point opposite the adjoining land of the complainant, a switching or siding connection, and lay tracks therefrom across its right of way to the border of her land, in order that it may be connected with a siding to be constructed by said Margaret Moser, the complainant in the bill, and she is hereby authorized to connect her track with the said switching or siding connection. The cost price of the switching, frogs, necessary rails, and other material requisite, and the expense of putting them in place by the defendants, to be paid by the plaintiff." All that was required to support such decree was that plaintiff should have established, to the satisfaction of the chancellor, that she was the owner of a mill or manufactory in the vicinity of the railroad; that the connection she asked for was reasonably practicable; and that her request for the privilege had been refused. These were the only material facts, and all outside of them, no matter how specifically passed upon by the chancellor, were only incidentally cognizable, and as to these estoppel cannot be asserted. "The judgment of a court of concurrent jurisdiction directly upon the point is, as a plea, a bar, or, as evidence, conclusive between the same parties upon the same matter directly in question in another court. . . . But neither the judgment of a [court of] concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction is evidence of any matter which came collaterally in question, though within their jurisdiction, nor of any matter incidentally cognizable, nor of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment." This rule, derived from the Duchess of Kingston's Case, 20 How. St. Tr. 538, has been accepted and applied in this state without qualification. Hibshman v. Dulleban, 4 Watts, 183.

The particular finding by the chancellor in the equity proceeding that is here relied upon as an estoppel is the affirmation of the following request, submitted on part of complainant: "That frequent and persistent demands, covering a period of more than two years, were made by the complainant, and on her behalf, upon the defendants, for a switch connection or siding to be constructed on her 26-acre tract, adjoining the right of way of defendants, for use in her business," etc. Here we have a finding that for two years before the case was tried the complainant had been repeatedly and persistently demanding of this defendant a siding connection,—a matter of no consequence whatever in the issue then being tried, since all that was necessary to support the decree entered in the case was that the defendant, without respect to the time it occurred, had neglected or refused to accede to complainant's demand. If there was evidence to support such finding as this in that case, it is manifest that it was introduced, not for the purpose of establishing complainant's right to a siding, but for the purpose of recovering damages covering this period of two years during which complainant was denied the siding. But the court having declined to pass on the question of damages, the evidence was left without relevancy, except as establishing the fact that complainant, some time or other before filing her bill, had made a demand of this defendant. As to this latter fact, the decree is conclusive, since without it appearing the decree would hardly have been entered; but as to the time when the first demand was made, the finding is incidental, because not entering into the decree.

In the present action, two item of damage were claimed; the first being the excess in cost which plaintiff was obliged to pay for the transportation by wagons of the coal she required during the two years next preceding the construction of the siding, amounting to $168.68. No effort was made to show that any demand at any time had been made of this defendant for the construction of the siding, aside from the introduction of the findings of the court in the equity proceedings, saving that plaintiff's desire for a siding had been communicated to Mr. Wetzell, who, it appears, was the legal counsel of both railroads. If the finding did not conclude the defendant in this subsequent action, then it was no evidence of the fact sought to be established thereby, viz., that defendant company had neglected or refused a siding upon demand made before or during the period when this item of damage is alleged to have been sustained; and it was incumbent on the plaintiff to establish such fact by competent evidence. We have examined the evidence with care, and find nothing in it that would justify an inference that any request for a siding was ever made of this defendant. That the learned trial judge, in submitting to the jury this branch of the case, relied wholly upon the findings in the equity case, is apparent from his answer to the defendant's second point, which was: "That the evidence in the case fails to show that any application was ever made by the plaintiff or her agents to the defendant for the installation of a siding in connection with her land." The answer was: "In the light of the record of the bill in equity filed in No. 4, October term, 1906, and the findings of fact and conclusions of law, and the decree, the point is refused." This answer is the subject of the first assignment of error. The point should have been affirmed. This assignment, for the reasons stated, is sustained.

The other item of damage claimed was the increased cost of the siding that was finally constructed over and above what it could have been constructed for two years previous, when the first demand for it is alleged to have been made. It was in evidence that in 1906 the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company had submitted to the plaintiff an estimate of the cost of a proposed siding; that estimate being $400. It was further in evidence that for the siding constructed in 1908, the plaintiff paid to the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company $969.08. The claim was for the difference, and for this recovery was bad against the defendant. The decree, adjudging it the legal duty of this defendant to install a siding, was made August 23, 1907. True, this defendant made no attempt whatever to comply with that decree of the court, nor does the evidence disclose that any request was ever made of it to comply, or any complaint that it had not so complied; but, on the other hand, the evidence shows that negotiations looking to the construction of the siding were conducted wholly and exclusively with the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company, which company, in June, 1908, constructed and completed the siding. The cost of the siding—$969.08—was voluntarily paid by the complainant to the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company. There is not the slightest evidence that in the construction of this siding there was any community of effort or interests between the two companies. However conclusive this evidence might be against the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company, it is not apparent how it could affect this defendant. The offer of the former in 1906 to construct it for $400 was not in anyway binding on this defendant; nor was this defendant affected by what plaintiff paid the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company for the siding, especially in view of the claim now made, that it was paid under protest, reserving to the plaintiff the right to recover back excessive charges which the plaintiff claimed were made for various items. The whole transaction, from the original offer to construct for $400, down to the final payment of the $969.08, was res inter alios. Admitting the binding force of the decree requiring the defendant to construct the siding, there was no evidence as to when the defendant's liability before the decree was entered began, and there was no evidence from which defendant's liability for the increased cost of the siding could be derived. In any event, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to show that increased cost resulted after the time when defendant's liability to construct the siding arose. The evidence was wholly lacking in respect to when this liability began. As we have said, it could only have arisen upon demand made, and there was no evidence as to when that occurred.

The fifth point submitted by the defendant was as follows: "The defendant is not liable to the plaintiff in this action for all or any part of the cost of the installation of the siding in connection with her land by the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company." The refusal of this point is made the subject of the third assignment of error. This assignment, for the reasons stated, is also sustained. In view of what we have said, the other assignments of error do not call for present consideration.

Mestrezat, J., dissenting:

The defendant, the Philadelphia, Harrisburg, & Pittsburg Railroad Company, constructed and operated a railroad from Harrisburg to Shippensburg, passing through Cumberland county. In October, 1890, for the annual consideration of $200,000, it leased to the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company its railroad, together with its "lands, real estate, tracks, sidings, depots, freight stations, water stations, improvements rights of way, and other appurtenances," for 999 years, and "also agreed to lease to the said lessee . . . all railroads hereafter by it acquired." The lessee company has since operated the road.

Subsequent to the date of the lease, the plaintiff became the owner of certain lands adjoining the right of way of the defendant company in Upper Allen township, Cumberland county. On this land are rich deposits of limestone, with quarries opened for the purpose of shipping the stone to market; also kilns built for the purpose of manufacturing lime, which, prior to 1906, had been sold in large quantities for many years. In that year the plaintiff applied to the defendant company for a siding and switch connections between her quarries and its railroad, and the application was refused. Subsequently she filed a bill in equity against the lessor and lessee companies to compel the construction of the siding connection, and a decree in her favor was entered, directing the defendants to build the siding as prayed for in the bill. There was an averment in the bill that damages had been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the refusal of the defendants to perform the duties by law imposed upon them, and the plaintiff prayed for the assessment of damages under the act of June 4, 1883 (P. L. 72). The court, however, declined to pass upon the question.

The present action was brought against the lessor or owning company to recover damages for unreasonable discrimination in the matter of furnishing facilities for transportation under the act of 1883. The case was submitted to the jury, which returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff, and, judgment having been entered thereon, the defendant took this appeal. It was found by the jury that the plaintiff was unduly and unreasonably discriminated against by the refusal of siding privileges; and hence she was entitled to recover damages against the party who was responsible for such discrimination. A majority of the court reverses the judgment, upon the ground that the lessor or owning company is not liable to the plaintiff, because it had leased its road prior to the time the plaintiff was entitled to demand siding facilities. On every other question raised by the defendant, the majority inferentially holds with the plaintiff.

With deference to the majority, I think the position assumed is untenable. It is settled law in this country that one railroad corporation cannot, without statutory authority, divest itself of, or relieve itself from, any duty or liability imposed by its charter or the general laws of the state by leasing its road and appurtenances to another. York & M. Line R. Co. v. Winans, 17 How. 30, 15 L. ed. 27. The owning company cannot escape the performance of any duty or obligation imposed by its charter or the general laws of the state by a voluntary surrender of its road into the hands of lessees; and the operation of a road by the lessees does not change the relation of the original company to the public. Washington A. & G. R. Co. v. Brown, 17 Wall. 445, 21 L. ed. 675. Legislation authorizing the transfer of corporate franchises and property is strictly construed, and the courts have uniformly held that such transfers can only be made when permitted, expressly or by necessary implication, in the statute. A statute alleged to confer a power to lease will not be aided by construction. Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. ed. 950. If the state grants the right to lease, the lessor company remains liable for the discharge of its duties to the public, unless expressly relieved therefrom by a statute.

The lease involved in this case was made under the act of April 23, 1861 (P. L. 410; 4 Purdon, 3880), which authorizes a railroad company to enter into contracts for the "use or lease" of any other railroad and confers upon the lessee the authority "to run, use, and operate such road, not, it will be observed, to contract or build." Per Sharswood, J., in Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Bedford & B. R. Co. 81 Pa. 104, 112. It does not authorize a sale of the road; nor does it empower the lessor company to divest itself of the duties and obligations assumed under its charter. It does not expressly or by implication permit a railroad company to sell or lease its franchises; nor does a lease, made pursuant to the statute, annul the charter or end the corporate existence of the owning company. The company retains its corporate existence, and must perform the duties to the public required by its charter, except in so far as the statute can and does expressly authorize it to delegate the performance of those duties to the lessee. There was no authority vested in the defendant to lease its unexercised franchises of appropriation and construction; and hence, no matter how ample the terms of the demise, the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company, the lessee, took nothing more than the power "to run, use, and operate" the lessor's road, and to do such other acts as were necessary to the successful operation of the existing road. Lewis v. Germantown, N. & P. R. Co. 16 Phila. 608. It will be observed in the present case that it was the physical property, and not the franchises, that was leased. The lessor company does not contend that the right of eminent domain passed to the lessee; on the contrary, since the lease was executed, the lessor has continued to exercise its right to condemn property for additional tracks, as is disclosed in numerous cases in this court. In brief, it may be said that the lessor company, after the lease, still retained all of its charter powers, subject to the right of the lessee company to exercise such of those powers as, under the statute, could be and were transferred to the latter company for the operation of the road.

When the Philadelphia, Harrisburg, & Pittsburg Railroad Company, the lessor and defendant here, was chartered, it became subject to the Constitution and laws of the commonwealth, prohibiting unreasonable discrimination in furnishing facilities in transportation of freight in this state. It is contended, and so held by the majority of the court, that when the defendant company made the lease, it relieved itself from the performance of its duties to the public to the extent that it was entirely absolved from the duties imposed upon it by the Constitution and laws, which required it to furnish to all parties equal and reasonable transportation facilities. The lessee or operating company, and not the lessor company, should, on principle, be held liable for any injuries inflicted by the lessee, or for the failure of the performance of any duty resting upon it in operating the road. It cannot discriminate as to rates or in furnishing cars; nor can it successfully defend against its own negligence or against any other default of its own. The statute expressly confers on a railroad company the power to lease to another company to operate the road; and it necessarily follows that any default, negligence, or failure of duty in operating the road must be visited on the lessee. But, whatever may be the liability of the lessee company to the plaintiff for the unlawful discrimination in furnishing siding facilities, the lessor company is clearly in default by reason of its failure to furnish the sidings. The Constitution and laws of the state were written into and became a part of its charter, and they prohibit discrimination in furnishing transportation facilities to the plaintiff, or any other party entitled to them. To furnish such facilities is a continuing duty owed to the public; it is the same to-day as it was prior to the lease. It was a duty imposed on the lessor by acceptance of the charter, from the performance of which its lease could not and did not discharge it. As the authorities hold, the lessor company retains its corporate existence and its charter powers after the lease; and it necessarily follows that its duties to the public are continuing and must be performed.

The majority of the court hold that, without statutory authority, it can divest itself of its duties to the public, and, at the same time, retain and enforce the powers and privileges granted it by the state. It continues to exercise the power to condemn land adjacent to its right of way for additional tracks. It has, since the lease and by virtue of the authority conferred by its charter, taken the plaintiff's land to widen its road, and thereby increased the rentals paid it; yet this court holds that it cannot be compelled to perform the duty imposed upon it by the Constitution and laws of the commonwealth to give the plaintiff siding facilities. The owning company may condemn and appropriate the plaintiff's dwelling house to widen its road, and turn over the additional trackage to the lessee (Snyder v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 210 Pa. 500, 60 Atl. 151), and may construct sidings on the plaintiff's land to furnish facilities to others; but, under the ruling in this case, the plaintiff cannot compel it to furnish her transportation facilities for the products of her own farm and lime kilns, like those constructed by it for her neighbors. When the original appropriation for the right of way through this tract of land was made by the defendant company, the damages were diminished by reason of the opportunity for siding and other advantages special and peculiar to the land. It will be conceded that, prior to the lease, the defendant, under the facts found by the jury, would have been compelled to furnish siding facilities to the plaintiff as the owner of the premises. The extent to which the damages were diminished was part of the consideration paid for the siding privileges. Shall the defendant retain the consideration and refuse the siding? Nearly a century ago the highest judicial tribunal in this country declared, in the Dartmouth College Case, 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 629, and all the courts of this country, Federal and state, have since enforced the doctrine, that the charter of a corporation is a contract between the state and the incorporators, within the meaning of the constitutional limitation that a legislature can pass no law impairing the obligation of contracts. Adhering to this doctrine, this court has never permitted the people, through the legislature, to infringe in the least on the rights, privileges, powers, or franchises of a corporation. Can it be possible that the same doctrine of inviolability of contract, in the absence of preventive constitutional legislation, will not protect the other party to the contract,—the state,—and compel the corporation to keep its covenants and perform its constitutional and statutory duties to the public?

The covenant in the lease, that the lessee would operate the road and perform all the lessor's obligations to the public, is valid and binding inter partes; but it does not relieve the lessor from the performance of its duties to the public. Nugent v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 80 Me. 62, 6 Am. St. Rep. 151, 12 Atl. 797. Our statute does not and could not so provide, as legislation does in some jurisdictions; and hence the lessor could not thus divest itself of its charter obligations. It follows that in this action the defendant cannot set up as a defense that it had leased its road before the plaintiff was entitled to a siding,—the controlling reason assigned by the majority of the court for ruling the present case against the plaintiff.

There is another and conclusive reason why the vital and controlling question in this case must be resolved against the defendant company. The plaintiff filed a bill, January 16, 1907, against the defendant company and its lessee, averring inter alia, that on or about May 1, 1906, she applied to the defendants for the construction of a siding from their lines near her quarries and lime kilns, and for the necessary switching connections, so as to enable her to ship her products to market, and from that time to the filing of the bill had made frequent applications to the defendants' officers for a siding and switching connections, but that the defendant companies had refused to make them. It is further averred that the defendants are common carriers under the laws of the state, and as such are required to grant the plaintiff the same shipping facilities that they grant to other persons under like circumstances; that the defendant companies were unjustly and illegally discriminating against the plaintiff, and thereby causing her to suffer great damage and loss in her property and business, and praying for a decree that the defendant companies should proceed to construct a siding and switching connections and give the plaintiff the same facilities for shipping and transporting her product to market that were furnished to other shippers and owners of lime and stone on the defendants' lines. The defendants filed an answer, in which, inter alia, they admit that an application had been made by the plaintiff for switching connections and the construction of a siding along their railroad, and that the same "was refused wholly because, upon a careful investigation of the situation and business of the complainant, it was found inexpedient and unnecessary for the public service, and would simply be a private convenience for the complainant alone." The answer admits that the defendants are common carriers, but denies the illegal discrimination.

Testimony was taken, and the case was disposed of on it and the bill and answer. The chancellor found, under the issue thus made by the pleadings, that, after preliminary negotiations by correspondence with the defendants' officers, the plaintiff, on May 10, 1906, made a formal request for the siding, and offered to pay the entire expense of the installation, and comply with any reasonable regulation of the company; that the defendants' general superintendent unconditionally refused to grant the plaintiff a siding on June 8, 1906, and thereafter continued to decline to furnish such transportation facilities; that sidings under like conditions and circumstances were furnished to other owners of land contiguous to defendants' railroad; that the plaintiff, upon compliance with the regulations of the defendant companies as to the payment of the cost of construction, has, as an adjoining landowner, the right to a private switch connection with the defendants' railroad; and "that the defendant companies, in furnishing siding facilities to competitors of the complainant, and refusing such facilities to plaintiff, under conditions and circumstances similar in all essential points, have been guilty of an illegal discrimination, in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of Pennsylvania and of the act of June 4, 1883." Pursuant to these findings, the chancellor, on August 23, 1907, entered a decree that the defendant companies "shall and do proceed, without further delay, forthwith to place in position and construct, at a convenient point opposite the adjoining land of the complainant, a switching or siding connection, and lay tracks therefrom across its right of way to the border of her land, . . . the cost . . . to be paid by the plaintiff." The chancellor, for reasons stated, refused to award damages, but entered, as part of the decree, that "this refusal, however, is without prejudice to her right to proceed to recover the same in another action." This reservation from the operation of the decree permitted the plaintiff to bring a subsequent action for damages. 23 Cyc. of Law and Procedure, 1145. No appeal was taken from the decree, and the siding and switching connections were furnished in pursuance of it.

The present action was brought July 8, 1908, to recover damages, as averred in the statement, resulting from the illegal discrimination against the plaintiff by the defendant company which was found and decreed to exist in the equity proceeding. With the exception of the additional averment of the equity proceeding in the statement in the present action, the latter and the bill in equity aver substantially the same facts. On the trial of the cause, the record in the equity proceeding was put in evidence, and the plaintiff proved by proper evidence, aliunde the equity record, the damages which she alleged in her statement were caused by the illegal discrimination by the defendant companies. She did not rely upon the finding of the chancellor as to the items or amount of damages which she sustained, but proved them on the trial of this case. She was not required to prove again, what was found by the chancellor, that a demand for a siding had been made, or when it had been made, nor that she had been illegally discriminated against by the defendant company. Those were facts averred in the bill, and were material and indispensably necessary, under the statute, to support the decree entered in the equity proceeding. The chancellor distinctly found in the equity proceeding that a demand for the siding and switching connections was made on May 10, 1906, and was unconditionally refused on June 8, 1906. These findings were a prerequisite to an intelligent and proper decree requiring the defendant company to furnish the siding facilities. Without a demand, which necessarily implies the date thereof, and without a definite refusal to comply therewith, the decree would have been lacking in material facts to support it. The liability of the defendant for damages began immediately after June 8, 1906, the date of the unconditional refusal to comply with the plaintiff's demand. It did not and could not arise before. As correctly said by the learned trial judge in his opinion in this case: "The issues [in the equity case] were fully and fairly made up whether there had been an unlawful discrimination by the defendants, the Philadelphia, Harrisburg, & Pittsburg Railroad Company and the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company, against the plaintiff, and also whether she was entitled, under the law, to have them establish a siding and switching connections. Both of these questions were resolved in her favor by a decision rendered on August 23, 1907. No appeal was taken from the findings and decree of the court, and a siding and connections were installed in May, 1908, and the charges for the same paid on July 3d following."

The plaintiff proved on the trial of this case, to the very cent, the damages which resulted to her from the illegal discrimination which the chancellor found to exist. The decree, as will be observed, was entered against both companies; and hence both and each were liable for the tort resulting in the plaintiff's injuries. If, in addition to finding the illegal discrimination, the learned chancellor had awarded damages against the defendant companies, it would not be pretended that the decree could not have been enforced against the property of either of them. Both of the defendants were found to have been guilty of the tort which caused the plaintiff's injuries. The chancellor therefore necessarily found that each of the defendants had contributed to the plaintiff's injuries by illegal discrimination. Had he found no culpability in one of them, the decree would necessarily have not gone against the innocent defendant. The material facts found in the equity case were therefore conclusive in a subsequent action against both or either of the defendants, for torts are joint and several; one may be answerable for the wrong done by both tortfeasors,—it cannot be apportioned. Philadelphia v. Collins, 68 Pa. 106.

If there is anything settled in the law of this state, it is that a judgment, sentence, or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive, not only as to the judgment or decree, but of every fact directly or necessarily adjudicated, or which was necessarily involved in or was material to the adjudication. That principle is settled by a beadroll of cases decided by this court. The rule applies as well to decrees in equity as to judgments at law. Westcott v. Edmunds, 68 Pa. 34; Columbia Nat. Bank v. Dunn, 207 Pa. 548, 56 Atl. 1087; Klick v. Gernert, 220 Pa. 503, 69 Atl. 1034. In the equity suit, the right to the siding and switching connections, the discrimination in not furnishing them, the date of the discrimination, and every other fact material to the adjudication, were directly involved, and were found against the defendants. The present action was brought to recover damages for the illegal discrimination, and the equity proceeding is set up in the plaintiff's statement, and the record was put in evidence on the trial of the cause. That decree remains unimpeached, and is therefore conclusive as to all facts material to support it. The facts thus found by the chancellor are therefore conclusively evidential that the plaintiff was denied a siding and switching connections with the defendant companies' railroad after a specific demand in May, 1906, and a refusal in June, 1906, and that the defendants, in furnishing siding facilities to competitors of the plaintiff, and refusing such facilities to her, under conditions and circumstances similar in all essential points, were guilty of illegal discrimination, in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of Pennsylvania, and of the act of June 4, 1883.

While the plaintiff may, under the law, rely upon the finding by the chancellor that a demand was made by her upon the defendant company to install the siding, yet she is not compelled to do so, as there is positive evidence by an official of the operating company, given on the trial of the present action, that a demand was made, and when it was made. A reading of the testimony discloses that, both upon the examination in chief and cross-examination of the witnesses, with one exception, the parties treated the demand and date thereof by the plaintiff as an established fact.

Mr. Stackhouse, superintendent of the operating company, was called as a witness by the defendant, and while on the stand testified as follows:

Mr. Sadler: Q. At the time demand was originally made by Miss Moser for the installation of the siding, your double tracking had not begun around Bowman'sdale, had it? . . .

A. Her application was made for a siding before my time. I have her first application on file here. It was before my time; but shortly after I came there she communicated with me concerning this siding, as well as Mr. McKeehan. I have a number of those letters here.

Mr. Wetzel: Q. When was the first application—have you the first letter?

A. May 13, 1905. I guess it is 1904. I am not certain whether it is 1904 or 1905.

It also appears in the testimony offered in this case that the siding was constructed in pursuance of the compulsory proceeding in equity resulting in the decree compelling its installation. It is contended, however, that in the ruling which is the subject of the first assignment of error the learned judge relied for this fact upon the findings in the equity case. Concede that he did, the testimony above quoted, given subsequently to his ruling, cured any error which might have arisen upon his relying upon the equity proceeding. It will be observed that the last answer in the testimony quoted was given in response to a question by appellant's counsel. The appellant company, therefore, is not in a position to raise the question that the plaintiff failed to show in the present action that a demand was made upon it for the siding.

The reversal of the judgment of the court below on the ground of the nonliability of the lessor company by reason of the prior lease is, I submit, sustained neither by reason nor precedent, and establishes a principle fraught with the gravest consequences to the property owners of the state. I would affirm the judgment.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

HARRY W. STANDIDGE

v.

CHICAGO RAILWAYS COMPANY, Appt.

(254 Ill. 524, 98 N. E. 963.)

Courts — jurisdiction to enforce attorneys' lien.

1. Courts of law as well as of equity have jurisdiction to enforce attorneys' liens, under a statute providing that any court of competent jurisdiction shall, on petition, adjudicate the rights of the parties and enforce the lien.

Jury — right — enforcement of attorneys' lien.

2. The constitutional right to trial by jury does not extend to a proceeding to enforce an attorneys' lien.

Note. — Constitutionality of statutes providing for attorneys' liens.

There have been but few cases prior to STANDIDGE v. CHICAGO R. CO., wherein the question has been raised as to the constitutionality of statutes providing for attorneys' liens, and so far as similar objections may have been urged against the constitutionality of such acts the cases are in accord.

In O'Connor v. St. Louis Transit Co. 198 Mo. 622, 115 Am. St. Rep. 495, 97 S. W. 150, 8 Ann. Cas. 703, an action to recover on a percentage contract for services rendered in a negligence action, an act providing for an attorneys' lien on judgments was attacked as unconstitutional, on the ground, first, that it was a special law; second, that it deprived one of his rights without due process of law; third, that it was restrictive of the right to contract. In holding these contentions untenable, and declaring that the act is constitutional, and that the lien attached to a compromise agreement entered into between the plaintiff and defendant in the negligence action, the court said: "It is clearly not class legislation. . . . This act undertakes to cover a certain class of persons engaged in a particular profession. It does not undertake to select any particular person in that class, but applies to all alike who fall within the class of attorneys at law. . . . It is now no longer an open question in the courts of this state, that legislation applicable to a particular class is not violative of the constitutional provision which prohibits the enactment of special laws. That lawyers in this state belong to a particular class we think there can be no dispute, and we can see no reason, even though they be only lawyers, why legislation which deals in a general way with the affairs of that class should be held unconstitutional. We have legislation in this state respecting other classes of persons, such as fellow servants, mechanics, landlords, bankers, insurance laws, and other legislation which have reference to only one line of trade or class" 10 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Procedure — uniformity — enforcement of attorneys' lien.

3. A statute permitting attorneys' liens to be enforced in any court of competent jurisdiction, by petition filed in the cause of the client wherein the employment is made, does not violate a constitutional requirement of uniform procedure.

Attorney — lien — settlement of claim — money recovered.

4. Money paid to a litigant in settlement of a claim is recovered, within the meaning of a statute giving an attorneys' lien.

Same — special legislation — constitutionality.

5. A statute conferring attorneys' liens is not unconstitutional special legislation because it applies only to attorneys at law, since those who follow that profession form a class constituting a proper basis for legislation.

of persons, yet wherever these laws have been in judgment before the courts of this state, they have been held constitutional and valid. . . . While the business of these classes may be essentially different, we are unable to assign any legal valid reason why a distinction should be made against the legal profession."

Nor were they able to give assent to the insistence that this act restricts or destroys the defendant's right to contract. "The provisions of this act simply create a lien upon the cause of action in favor of the attorney at law, and require of the defendant, after due notice, which creates such lien, in dealing with the party as to such cause of action, as such lien shall be respected. . . . It does not deprive him of the right to make a settlement, but in making such settlement it simply requires that he shall take into consideration the fact that the attorney at law has a lien upon the cause of action, and if such lien is ignored he will be required to account to him in an action at law for the amount of such lien."

The act was also vigorously assailed on the ground that it tended to lead to the commission of unprofessional acts on the part of attorneys, and it was said that, though this may be true in some instances, the profession of law, when practised upon a high plane, is an honorable one, and an act presumably enacted for the benefit of honorable practising lawyers should not be declared invalid for the reason that instances may arise, by reason of the law, which enable some of the less reputable attorneys to do acts which are not commendable along professional lines.

And in Taylor v. St. Louis Transit Co. 198 Mo. 715, 97 S. W. 155, where the same arguments were urged against the constitutionality of the same act, the court followed O'Connor v. St. Louis Transit Co. supra, in upholding the constitutionality of the act.

And also in Taylor v. St. Louis Merchants' Bridge Terminal R. Co. 207 Mo. 495, 105 S. W. 740, the same act was de-

Same — property right — interference — validity.

6. A statute giving attorneys' liens on money recovered by their clients is not unconstitutional as depriving their adversaries of a property right to buy their peace by making contracts of settlement.

(June 21, 1912.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County in plaintiff's favor in a proceeding to enforce an attorneys' lien. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John R. Guilleams, with Messrs. John W. Walsh and Frank L. Kriete, for appellant:

At the time of the enactment of the attorneys' lien law of 1909, an attorney had no lien for his fees, and his client had the right to dismiss his suit and settle his case, and the defendant had the right to buy his peace.

Henchey v. Chicago, 41 Ill. 136; Cameron v. Boeger, 102 Ill. App. 649; North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Ackley, 171 Ill. 100, 44 L.R.A. 177, 49 N. E. 222.

A court of law has no jurisdiction to enforce an attorneys' lien; it belongs exclusively to a court of chancery.

1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 187; 25 Cyc. 681, 682; Cairo & V. R. Co. v. Fackney, 78 Ill. 116; National Bank v. Petterson, 200 Ill. 215, 65 N. E. 687; West Chicago Park v. Western Granite Co. 200 Ill. 527, 66 N. E.

37; Gilchrist v. Helena H. S. & Smelter R. Co. 58 Fed. 708; Turnes v. Brenckle, 249 Ill. 394, 94 N. E. 495.

There is no authority of law for an attorney filing a petition to enforce his lien for fees in his client's cause, and if the attorneys' lien law of 1909 be construed to authorize the filing of such a petition, it is unconstitutional.

Clowry v. Holmes, 238 Ill. 577, 87 N. E. 303; David v. Commercial Mut. Acci. Co. 243 Ill. 43, 90 N. E. 286; People v. Hibernian Bkg. Asso. 245 Ill. 522, 92 N. E. 305; People ex rel. Ely v. Rumsey, 64 Ill. 44.

Even if the attorneys' lien law of 1909 is constitutional, there can be no lien in this case, because there was no money or property recovered in the sense in which the word "recovered" is used in the attorneys' lien law.

Lapham v. Almy, 13 Allen, 301; Atchison v. Owensboro, 114 Ky. 706, 71 S. W. 864; North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Ackley, 171 Ill. 100, 44 L.R.A. 177, 49 N. E. 222.

The attorneys' lien law of 1909 is unconstitutional and void.

Board of Education v. Blodgett, 155 Ill. 441, 31 L.R.A. 70, 46 Am. St. Rep. 348, 40 N. E. 1025; Fish v. Farwell, 160 Ill. 236, 43 N. E. 367; Frorer v. People, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L.R.A. 492, 31 N. E. 395; Ramsey v. People, 142 Ill. 380, 17 L.R.A. 853, 32 N. E. 364; Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 22 L.R.A. 340, 37 Am. St. Rep. 206, clared constitutional on authority of Taylor v. St. Louis Transit Co. and O'Connor v. St. Louis Transit Co. supra.

And again in Wait v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 204 Mo. 491, 103 S. W. 60, it was said that, since the decisions in O'Connor v. St. Louis Transit Co. and Taylor v. St. Louis Transit Co. supra, it may be considered as settled that the attorneys' lien act of 1901 is constitutional.

In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Wells, 104 Tenn. 706, 59 S. W. 1041, an action to recover for services rendered in a negligence action, an act giving attorneys of record in actions brought in courts of record, a lien for fees upon a right of action from the date of the institution of the suit, or of subsequent employment of attorney with notice of that fact, was declared constitutional and valid, and it was held that the lien attached to a compromise agreement entered into between the parties to a negligence action. The grounds upon which the constitutionality of the act was attacked were that it created a new right without prescribing a remedy; that it declared a lien on a right of action after suit commenced, and unduly deprived plaintiff of control of his suit, and made all defendants in suits brought in courts of record liable for the fees of plaintiff's attorneys. The court said: "We are unable to discover that any of the objections urged against the act make it unconstitutional. . . . It is true as suggested that the present act does not prescribe any method for the enforcement of the lien declared; yet that omission does not render the act unconstitutional, since there is no provision in the organic law requiring that acts granting new rights shall likewise provide new remedies. That statute would undoubtedly have been more complete within itself, and more simple in its application, if that omission had been supplied; nevertheless, it was manifestly within the legislative power to declare the lien without more, and leave the enforcement of it to the general law in reference to liens, as was in fact done. Nor was it beyond the power of the legislature to declare a lien on a 'right of action' after suit commenced. It may be conceded that a right of action is 'an intangible, incorporeal something,' but that concession does not justify the insistence that the act is therefore violative of the Constitution. That instrument does not limit legislation to matters tangible and corporeal." And in answer to the other objections urged, it was said that "since the passage of this act, as before, plaintiff may prosecute or compromise or dismiss his suit at will; and the defendant is liable only for such sum as may be adjudged or stipulated in the plaintiff's favor." 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Vickers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

John F. Cleary commenced an action at law in the superior court of Cook county against the receivers of the Chicago Railways Company, to recover compensation for a personal injury alleged to have been sustained by him through the negligence of the receivers of said Chicago Railways Company. The defendants appeared and pleaded to the declaration. The appellee, Harry W. Standidge, was the attorney for Cleary in that cause. Pending the litigation the receivers of the Chicago Railways Company were discharged, and the Chicago Railways Company appeared in said cause, and became obligated to pay anything that the plaintiff in said cause was entitled to recover. After Standidge was employed, and before any adjustment was made of Cleary's claim, he served upon the receivers a written notice claiming a lien for one third of any amount of money that might be collected or paid on settlement of Cleary's claim, in accordance with the proviso of § 1 of the attorneys' lien law, enacted in 1909. Laws of 1909, p. 97. After the service of said notice, and after appellee had been representing Cleary for about one year in the prosecution of said claim, a settlement was made on behalf of the Chicago Railways Company with Cleary, and he was paid $900 and signed a stipulation in pursuance of which his case against the appellant was dismissed without costs. The order of dismissal was entered on August 21, 1911. Two days later, on August 23d, appellee, Standidge, filed a petition entitled "In the Cause of Cleary v. Chicago R. Co." alleging his contract with Cleary, notice served of his claim of lien, alleging that said claim had been settled with his client without his knowledge or consent, and claiming a lien for his fees under his contract, in accordance with the attorneys' lien law of 1909. On August 30th appellant appeared and filed its answer to appellee's petition, which said answer was joined in by the receivers of the Chicago Railways Company. The answer admitted that appellee had begun and filed suit as the attorney for Cleary, but denied that he had any contract to commence and prosecute said cause. The answer admitted the service of notice and the settlement with Cleary and payment to him of $900, but denied that appellee is entitled to any lien, as against appellant, for any sum of money, because, as alleged in said answer, the attorneys' lien law is unconstitutional and void, as being repugnant to § 2 of article 2, and § 22 of article 4, of the Constitution of Illinois. The record shows that, after the petition was amended, the cause came on to be heard upon evidence before the court, which resulted in a finding in favor of appellee and against appellant, and the rendition of a judgment for $300, which appellant was ordered to pay, and in default of such payment an execution was ordered to issue. It is to obtain a review of this judgment that the present appeal is prosecuted.

Appellant relies upon the following points as grounds for a reversal of the judgment below: First, that a court of law has no jurisdiction to enforce an attorneys' lien, such lien being enforceable only in a court of equity; second, such lien, under the act of 1909, cannot be enforced by petition in the client's cause; third, no money or property was "recovered" in this cause, in the sense in which that word is used in the attorneys' lien law; fourth, the attorneys' lien law of 1909 is unconstitutional and void; fifth, the finding that appellee was employed as the attorney of Cleary is not established by a preponderance of the evidence.

It will be observed that the first four assignments of error above enumerated raise questions of law. The fifth assignment raises a question of fact, which may be disposed of without discussion, since a consideration of the evidence sustains appellee's averment that he was employed under a contract by which he was to receive one third of whatever amount was collected on said claim. The four legal questions will be considered in the order in which they are above stated.

First. Appellant's first contention is that, even if the attorney's lien law be valid, the lien thereby created can only be enforced in a court of equity. Appellant's contention in support of this assignment of error is that the enforcement of liens ordinarily belongs to the jurisdiction of courts of equity; and cases are cited holding that, where a statute creates a lien and makes no provision as to how it may be enforced, courts of equity will take jurisdiction to enforce such liens. The case of Cairo & V. R. Co. v. Fackney, 78 Ill. 116, is relied on by the appellant in support of its position on this point. That was an action of assumpsit brought by the plaintiff against the railroad company upon a claim that the plaintiff had for money which he had advanced to various employees of the company, and others who had furnished supplies and material in the construction of the railroad. Under the statute then in force (Rev. Stat. 1874, ¶ 51, p. 671), all persons who furnished labor or material in the construction or maintenance of a railroad were given a lien upon the property of the railroad corporation superior to all other liens. The court, in rendering judgment on the action at law, found and adjudged that the plaintiff was entitled to a lien for the amount found due him upon all of the property of the railroad company. Upon the appeal of the railroad company, this court held that, while the open accounts of laborers and others against the railroad company might be assigned in equity, they were not assignable at law, and in no event could they be so assigned as to transfer the statutory lien to the assignee. Having thus disposed of the case by holding that Fackney had no lien whatever, it was further said that, if such lien existed, it could only be enforced in a court of equity.

Appellant also cites National Bank v. Petterson, 200 Ill. 215, 65 N. E. 687, and West Chicago Park Comrs. v. Western Granite Co. 200 Ill. 527, 66 N. E. 37. Both of these cases arose under § 24 of the mechanics' lien law. That section of the statute creates a lien upon "money, bonds, or warrants due or to become due" a contractor for a public improvement, in favor of any person who may have furnished any material, apparatus, fixtures, machinery, or labor to such contractor for such improvement, and provides for notice of the claim to be given to the officials of the municipality whose duty it is to pay the contractor. The statute also provides that it shall be the duty of the officials, when so notified, to withhold a sufficient amount of money to pay such claim, and also provides that any officer violating the duty imposed upon him shall be liable in an action on his official bond, in favor of the person having such claim, for any damages resulting from a failure to withhold a sufficient amount of funds to pay such claim. The contention there was that the statute making the officer liable on his official bond, for the amount of damages sustained by a person furnishing material or labor to the contractor, was an exclusion of the right to file a bill in equity to enforce the lien. This contention was not sustained, and it was held that a court of equity had jurisdiction to enforce the lien against the municipality, notwithstanding the remedy against the officers personally upon their official bonds. It was held in the Petterson Case that the remedy by suit upon the bond by the officer was not an enforcement of the lien, and did not in any way affect the right of the claimant to maintain his bill in equity against the municipality or the person into whose hands the funds, subject to such lien, had been placed.

None of the above cases are in point here. They all recognize the power of the legislature to provide other methods of enforcing a lien than by a resort to a court of equity. The attorneys' lien law contains the following provision: "On petition filed by such attorneys or their clients, any court of competent jurisdiction shall, on not less than five days' notice to the adverse party, adjudicate the rights of the parties and enforce such lien in term time or vacation." Without this language in the act, undoubtedly a court of equity would be the only court that would have jurisdiction to enforce such liens. The legislature must be presumed to have used the language above quoted for some purpose. If appellant's position is sustained, and a court of equity is the only court that has jurisdiction to enforce the lien, then the clause above quoted has no effect. The clause above quoted was manifestly used by the legislature to confer jurisdiction to enforce such lien upon courts that could not exercise it without such provision. The provision for enforcing the lien by petition and on five days' notice strengthens the conclusion that the legislature intended this jurisdiction should be exercised by law courts as well as courts of equity. The bill in chancery and the declaration at law are usually the pleadings by which those respective jurisdictions are invoked, while a "petition" is common to both courts.

Appellant further contends that to so construe the statute as to authorize a court of law to enforce the lien by petition would deprive the defendant of the right of trial by jury, and the case of Turnes v. Brankle, 249 Ill. 394, 94 N. E. 495, is relied on in support of this branch of its argument. In the case cited this court held that a provision of the mechanics' lien law authorizing a court of chancery to enter judgment for the amount of the complainant's claim in case it was found that no lien existed was unconstitutional, for the reason that it deprived the defendant of the right to a trial by jury. In that case the statute purported to confer jurisdiction upon a court of chancery in a matter that was purely legal, and authorized the court to adjudge the same without the intervention of a jury, or, at all events, with the aid of a jury whose verdict would be merely advisory. The distinction between a verdict of a jury in a law court and one in chancery was there pointed out, and it was held that a defendant was entitled to a jury to determine the issues that might arise in regard to a claim after it had been ascertained that no lien existed, and to a verdict of a jury that was binding upon the court, and not merely advisory, as a verdict in chancery is held to be. There is nothing in that case that has any application to the facts in the case at bar. There the complaint was that the statute transferred a purely legal matter, in which the defendant had a right to a jury trial, to the chancery court, where the right to a trial by jury did not exist except in the discretion of the court. Here the complaint is that a purely equitable matter, in which the defendant would have no right to a jury trial, is transferred to a law court, where the right to a trial by jury exists. The constitutional provision that "the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate" means that the right to a jury trial shall continue in all cases where such right existed at common law at the time the Constitution was adopted, but that constitutional provision has never been held to prohibit the legislature from creating new rights unknown to the common law, and provide for their determination without a jury. Ibid. Appellant concedes that the attorneys' lien law creates new rights which have heretofore not been recognized in this state. This being conceded, it is clearly within the power of the legislature to provide for the enforcement of such rights without a jury trial. This same objection was made to a similar statute of the state of New York, and was there determined in accordance with the views above expressed. Ackerman v. Ackerman, 14 Abb. Pr. 229; Re King, 168 N. Y. 53, 60 N. E. 1054. Appellant's first assignment of error cannot be sustained.

Second. Appellant next contends that an attorneys' lien cannot be enforced by petition in the cause of the client wherein the employment is made. Appellant's contention is that, if said act be so construed as to permit the filing of an intervening petition in the client's cause, it renders the act unconstitutional, in that it destroys the uniformity required in the practice of our courts of the same class or grade. We fail to see any force in this contention. The statute is not limited to any particular court or class of courts, but the petition may be filed, under the statute, in "any court of competent jurisdiction." This would include any court of record, either of law or chancery, and is not, therefore, limited to any particular court or class of cases; hence it cannot be said to violate the uniform procedure required by our Constitution.

Third. Appellant contends that the judgment in this case should be reversed because there was no money "recovered" in the cause, in the sense in which that word is used in the attorneys' lien law. Appellant insists that the word "recover," where the same is found in the statute under consideration, must be limited in meaning to money recovered as the result of a formal judgment or decree of a court. The word "recover" is often used in the sense of "received" or "come into possession of." It is so used in § 2 of our statute on injuries (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1909, chap. 70), where it is provided that "the amount recovered in every such action shall be for the exclusive benefit of the widow and next of kin of such deceased person, and shall be distributed," etc. No one would doubt that money received by way of compromise or settlement would be subject to distribution in the same manner and to the same persons as it would if it were collected as the result of a judgment; and the word is also used in the same sense in § 9 of the dramshop act (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1909, chap. 43). The language of the act under consideration clearly indicates that the word "recover" is here used in the sense of receive. The language is, "such lien shall attach to any verdict, judgment, or decree entered, and to any money or property which may be recovered, on account of such suits, claims, demands, or causes of action, from and after the time of service of the aforesaid notice." If the lien only attached when there had been a judgment or a decree entered, the latter portion of the said sentence, "and to any money or property which may be recovered," etc., would be wholly unnecessary. Aside from this, if the statute were so construed as to only apply when a judgment was rendered, it would fall far short of accomplishing the purpose which the legislature manifestly had in view in the enactment of this statute. Clearly it was the intention of the legislature to give attorneys a lien from and after the service of notice on the defendant, which would protect them against any settlements that might thereafter be made, regardless of whether the suit had been commenced, was pending, or had been finally determined by the rendition of a judgment. The money paid by appellant to appellee's client in settlement of this claim was money "recovered," within the meaning of the statute.

Fourth. Appellant's final contention is that the statute under consideration is unconstitutional. Two constitutional objections are urged against the act. It is first said the act is special legislation, in that it only applies to attorneys at law. But little need be said in answer to this contention. Those who follow the legal profession constitute a class, and laws may be passed applicable only to members of a class, where the classification rests upon some disability, attribute, or classification 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) marking them as proper objects for the operation of such special legislation, in any case wherein such local or special legislation is not expressly forbidden by the Constitution. Gillespie v. People, 188 Ill. 176, 52 L.R.A. 283, 80 Am. St. Rep. 176, 58 N. E. 1007; Starne v. People, 222 Ill. 189, 113 Am. St. Rep. 389, 78 N. E. 61; Charles J. Off & Co. v. Morehead, 235 Ill. 40, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 167, 126 Am. St. Rep. 184, 85 N. E. 264, 14 Ann. Cas. 434; People v. Wilcox, 237 Ill. 421, 86 N. E. 672. Laws applicable only to persons following a particular profession or occupation requiring skill and special training have never been supposed to be open to the constitutional objection now urged against this act. Laws applicable only to physicians, architects, pharmacists, bankers, inn or tavern keepers, and other classes, have been enacted and are now in force in this state, and we are not aware that their constitutionality has been seriously questioned, especially since the decision of this court in Meadowcroft v. People, 163 Ill. 56, 35 L.R.A. 176, 54 Am. St. Rep. 447, 45 N. E. 991, where it was held that a criminal statute applicable only to bankers was not unconstitutional because applicable only to a particular class of persons.

Appellant also assails the statute under consideration on the ground that it deprives persons against whom suits are brought or claims held by attorneys for collection, of their constitutional and property right to buy their peace by making contracts of settlement. This argument proceeds upon a false assumption. The statute does not affect the right of the defendants in suits, or persons against whom claims or demands are held for collection, from settling the same, but it requires, after notice, that in making such settlement they shall take into account the attorney's claim for his fees. A settlement may be made with a claimant, under this statute, to the same extent and with like effect as it could have been made before the statute was enacted, the only difference being that under the statute a party, in settling with an attorney's client, must take into account his liability to the attorney for whatever amount of fees would accrue under his contract at the time of the settlement. This same contention was made in the case of Fischer-Hansen v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 173 N. Y. 492, 66 N. E. 305, and in the case of O'Connor v. St. Louis Transit Co. 198 Mo. 641, 115 Am. St. Rep. 495, 97 S. W. 150, 8 Ann. Cas. 703; and in both cases it was held that the act was not open to the objection urged against it. The supreme court of Missouri, in disposing of this objection in the case above cited, uses the following language: "It is insisted by appellant that this act restricts or destroys the defendant's right to contract. We are unable to give our assent to this insistence. The provisions of this act simply create a lien upon the cause of action in favor of the attorney at law, and require of the defendant, after due notice, which creates such lien, in dealing with the party as to such cause of action, that such lien shall be respected. If we are dealing with the owner of a horse, and have notice that there is a valid subsisting lien upon the horse, we would not contend for a moment that such lien could be ignored. So it is in respect to other property. In dealing with the owner of it, if we have notice of the existence of a lien, such lien cannot be ignored. Is there any difference if a defendant has notice of the existence of a lien of an attorney upon a cause of action, and the instances above cited? We think not. This law does not deprive a defendant of any of his rights. When the lien is created, in dealing with the plaintiff in respect to such cause of action he must act accordingly. It does not deprive him of the right to make a settlement, but in making such settlement it simply requires that he shall take into consideration the fact that the attorney at law has a lien upon the cause of action, and, if such lien is ignored, he will be required to account to him in an action at law for the amount of such lien. This act is vigorously assailed by learned counsel for appellant on the ground that it tends to lead to the commission of unprofessional acts on the part of attorneys. This may be true in some instances, but the profession of law, when practised upon a high plane, is an honorable one, and by no means should an act of the general assembly, presumably enacted for the benefit of the honorable practising lawyers of the state, be declared invalid for the reason that instances may arise, by reason of the law, which enable some of the less reputable attorneys to do acts which are not commendable along professional lines. In our opinion this law is constitutional and valid."

It follows from what has been said that the statute under consideration is not open to any of the objections urged against it, and that none of the errors assigned by appellant can be sustained.

The judgment of the Superior Court of Cook County is affirmed.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF LOUISIANA

v.

EDWARD BREFFEIHL, Appt.

(130 La. 904, 58 So. 763.)

Voter — preparation of ballot — information as to politics of candidate.

Requesting assistance to determine which names on a primary election ballot are politically in accord with the voter does not subject one to the penalty provided for any voter who shall make a false statement as to his inability to mark his ballot, where the statute provides that the voter shall be at liberty, if he is unable to prepare his own ballot, to request assistance.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Criminal District Court for the Parish of Orleans convicting him of crime. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henriques & Otero, J. O. Henriques, C. C. Luzenberg, Adams & Generelly, and Charles Byrne for appellant.

Mr. Walter Guion, Attorney General, for the State.

Note. — Assisting voter.

Right to assistance.

Persons who are qualified by law to vote, but because of some disability are unable to do so without assistance, are entitled to such assistance, subject, of course, to provisions and restrictions safeguarding the ballot.

Thus in Detroit v. Rush, 82 Mich. 532, 10 L.R.A. 171, 46 N. W. 951, it is held that if the effect of the election law was to deprive those who cannot read, the blind, and cripples who cannot walk, of the opportunity of voting, it would be void, as they are given this right by the Constitution; but that mere failure to provide for assistance to such voters does not render the statute unconstitutional, as, in the absence of express prohibition against assisting such persons, they are entitled to such assistance as is necessary to enable them to vote.

In Pearson v. Brunswick County, 91 Va. 322, 21 S. E. 483, it is held that a statute which provides for election officers who "may" assist disabled voters is mandatory, and such officers are required to render assistance to those entitled to it.

And in Rogers v. Jacob, 88 Ky. 502, 11 S. W. 513, a provision for secrecy of the ballot is held to be nugatory in so far as it operates to deprive illiterate voters of the right to vote.

As affected by requirement of secrecy of the ballot.

As to the effect of provisions for assist-

Provosty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A few days before the day fixed for the recent Democratic primary election, question arose as to whether a voter who could read his ballot, and was not physically unable to mark it, had the right to have a person go into the polling booth with him to aid him in the preparation of his ballot. An opinion which had been given by the attorney general to the chairman of the Democratic state central committee had been understood to be in affirmance of such right, and the district attorney for the parish of Orleans had given expression to a contrary opinion, and the governor had considered the point to be of sufficient public importance for him to issue a proclamation indorsing what he understood to be the view of the attorney general. The attorney general had then announced that his said opinion had been misunderstood; and that he, on the contrary, concurred in the view taken by the district attorney for the parish of Orleans.

In voting at said election, the accused in the present case, though able to read, and not afflicted with any physical disability, called for assistance in the preparation of his ballot; and an information was filed against him for the violation of the primary election law (act 49 of 1906).

The information alleges that he "did falsely state that he was unable to mark and prepare his ballot."

He demurred to the information, and ance of disabled voters by certain election officers, on the right of the voter to secrecy, the court in Pearson v. Brunswick County, supra, says: "The secrecy of the ballot is a right which inheres in the voter and of which he cannot, against his will, be lawfully deprived. It must be, however, in some degree subordinate to the right to vote by ballot, of which it is but a part; and the main object, which is the right to vote, must not be defeated by a too rigid observance of the incidental right, which is that of secrecy. A blind man, or a man unable to read, must, in the nature of things, so far compromise the secrecy of his ballot as to invoke and obtain the aid of others in the preparation of his ballot; but as it would be a violation of confidence, were he to seek of a friend assistance on such an occasion, for that friend to betray the secret and disclose the vote, so it is a violation not only of confidence, but of official duty, for the constable to lift the veil of the secrecy which should be impenetrable, and violate the confidence which the law requires the voter to repose in him."

Provisions for secrecy of the ballot are incidental to the right to vote, and should not be construed so as to prevent illiterate or disabled persons from voting. People ex rel. Klein v. McDonald, 52 N. Y. Supp. 898.

And as it is the privilege of each voter to decline to make known for whom he voted, it is error for the court to permit those assisting voters to testify as to how they voted. Gill v. Shurtleff, 183 Ill. 440, 56 N. E. 164.

What necessary to entitle voter to assistance.

—oath or declaration of disability.

Generally, provision is made for an oath or declaration by the voter as to his disability, and, as a rule, such provisions are held to be mandatory. Huston v. Anderson, 145 Cal. 320, 78 Pac. 626; Patrick v. Runyon, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1914, 50 S. W. 538; 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Preston v. Price, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 588, 85 S. W. 1183; Browning v. Lovett, 139 Ky. 480, 94 S. W. 661; Cole v. Nunnelle, 140 Ky. 138, 130 S. W. 972; Hill v. Mottley, 142 Ky. 385, 134 S. W. 469, modified in other respects in 143 Ky. 158, 136 S. W. 134; Atty. Gen. ex rel. Reynolds v. May, 99 Mich. 538, 25 L.R.A. 325; 58 N. W. 483; Hickson v. Abbott, 25 Lower Can. Jur. 290.

Thus in Major v. Barker, 99 Ky. 305, 35 S. W. 543, it is held that provision for the voter declaring on oath his disability is mandatory, and cannot be supplied by the appearance of the voter or personal knowledge of the inspectors, and ballots voted without such oath should not be counted.

And in Gill v. Shurtleff, supra, it is held that provision for oath as to disability is mandatory even though the voter is blind.

But in Re Ellis, 21 Ont. L. Rep. 74, appeal dismissed in 23 Ont. L. Rep. 427, it was held that as to a blind voter no declaration of disability was necessary.

In Hope v. Flentge, 140 Mo. 390, 47 L.R.A. 806, 41 S. W. 1002, it is held that the statutory requirement for an oath as to the voter's disability is not mandatory, and a mere failure of the officers to administer it will not, in the absence of fraud or imposition, invalidate the ballots cast without it. And this case is followed on similar facts by Morgan v. Brase, 140 Mo. 415, 41 S. W. 1101; Howard v. Caldwell, 140 Mo. 416, 41 S. W. 1101; Drum v. Ude, 140 Mo. 417, 41 S. W. 1100; Frissell v. Cotner, 140 Mo. 418, 41 S. W. 1101.

And in Patton v. Watkins, 131 Ala. 387, 90 Am. St. Rep. 43, 31 So. 93, the court says that it is the fact of disability, rather than the sworn declaration, that merits the assistance for which the law provides, the oath being required only as evidence of the fact, and its omission, while an irregularity, does not render the vote invalid.

But although the oath is mandatory, it need not be formal and exact, so that where a voter, after stating to the officials his disabilities, was required to raise his right hand, and the judge said, "You swear now to this: that what you have told me is true,"—it was sufficient. State ex rel. Bra- also moved to quash it, on the ground that there was no law which made it a crime for a voter at a primary election to call for assistance in the preparation of his ballot, who, though able to read and not physically disabled, yet from some other cause was unable to prepare his ballot.

On the trial it developed that the accused had made no statement at all, but had simply asked one of the watchers to assist him in preparing his ballot, and that the assistance had consisted in the giving of information with regard to which ones of the candidates on the ticket were in sympathy with his own factional affiliation, and that so far as the physical act of marking his ballot was concerned he had done that himself.

This being the condition of the evidence, his counsel moved the judge, who was trying the case without a jury, to discharge him, for the reason that, in the first place, he had not made any statement at all; and, in the second place, if he had made any, it had not been of inability to mark his ballot, but of inability to prepare his ballot, in the sense of whom to vote for, and that no statute makes the latter statement criminal.

The learned trial judge denied these motions, for reasons which in no wise dispute the facts above stated, but involve simply and purely the proper interpretation of the said act 49 of 1906,—the primary election law.

The principal purposes for which the con-

—what constitutes disability and who is judge of it.

In Re Election Instructions, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 1, the court, in response to a request from election officers as to what constituted disability which would entitle a voter to be assisted, answered as follows: "Under this law it includes physical, mental, and educational incapacity, but not complete mental incapacity, such as insanity; as, one who is blind or cannot see so as to read the ballot; who is paralyzed or has lost his hands. The disability to see the ballot may, in some instances, be supplied by artificial means; but if the voter have no glasses, or cannot be supplied with suitable ones conveniently, he cannot be turned away from the polls without an assistant, because of the want of such artificial aid, any more justly than can the man without feet to walk to the booth be refused the aid of carriers, because he has not provided himself with artificial limbs; for, in each case, the disability is an actual one. . . . Again, one who cannot read, or cannot read understandingly, the English language (in which the ballot is required to be printed), is disabled and entitled to the assistance of another voter, just as much as if he should be stone blind. There are many other instances of disability, which, not now occurring to us, we do not give. But one who voluntarily disables himself, without just warrant, and not through any laudable or dutiful effort of the body or mental faculties, is not entitled to the benefit of the provisions; as, where one gets drunk. Drunkenness is no excuse for crime, neither does it constitute a disability under this law. We do not include in the definition the voter who, purposely, or who, through want of time, inattention, or other apparently good reason, has not informed himself of the manner of voting under the act." Whether the voter has shown such disability as entitled him to assistance is for the election board to determine, the court 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

saying: "If his alleged disability is a palpable mistake, fraud, or subterfuge, and is so found by the board, they, as in any other case affecting the right to vote, in the exercise of their judicial discretion, may deny his request."

In Re Instructions to Election Officers, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 275, a different court, in response to a request for instructions as to what constituted such a disability, said that "a voter's disability may result from ignorance of the law, inability to read or write, defective vision, palsy, excessive nervousness producing abnormal self-distrust, or other causes." But the court further said that the voter himself is the sole judge of his own disability, and his declaration of disability entitles him to assistance.

The conflict in the two preceding cases as to who is to judge as to whether a voter is entitled to assistance is discussed in Re Contested Election, 3 Lack. Leg. News, 74, in which the court says: "We cannot agree to the construction of the law already alluded to, that the voter is the sole judge of this, and that he has merely to declare that he needs assistance, and it must, without more, be accorded him. If this be the case, what, then, is the use of his having to ask? In our judgment the declaration of disability and the request for the allowance of assistance is no such idle ceremony as this would make it. If the permission of the judge of election has first to be obtained, it is certainly within his discretion to grant or withhold it, and to do this understandingly the grounds of the disability must be made known to him. When this has been done it becomes his duty to decide whether a real disability exists, and, if it does not, to refuse the assistance asked for." And the court further indicated some of the disabilities which will entitle the voter to assistance, as follows: "If the voter is blind, or palsied, or cannot read, or cannot read the English language, either of these would be good grounds for assistance. What others might be, we cannot now undertake to decide. But ignorance of how to mark the ballot, we do not hesi-stitutional convention that formed the Constitution of 1898 was called were to provide for the reorganization of the electorate of the state, and to provide the means of securing honesty and fairness in the elections. As to the former, the object being to eliminate the undesirable, ignorant colored voter without at the same time eliminating the unlettered, but none the less desirable, white voter. This was accomplished by excluding from the suffrage all unregistered voters, and by allowing none to register who could not qualify either under the so-called grandfather clause of the Constitution, or under the clause providing for educational and property qualifications. Honesty and fairness in elections was secured by the adoption of the so-called Australian ballot system, by which the voter is required to prepare his ballot in secrecy; and the legislature was directed to make provision for that manner of voting. It being fully realized, however, that under this new régime the situation, for a time at least, would be that nomination by the Democratic party would be equivalent to election, and that therefore the primary election held for the nomination of the candidates would be the real election, and the election under the general election would be practically nothing more than a mere formal confirmation of the result of the primary election, it was deemed necessary to regulate also the primary elections. But here an insurmountable difficulty presented itself in connection with the secrecy of the ballot. How could voters prepare their ballots in secret when they could not read and write? This difficulty had been met in so far as the general election was concerned by requiring the political parties to adopt party emblems to be printed on the ticket opposite the names of the nominees of the party, to indicate to the unlettered voter who were the nominees of his party, and enable him to vote by simply stamping this emblem. The Democrat would stamp the rooster, and the Republican the elephant. But this device would be of no avail for party nominations, because the several candidates would have to be voted for and might be very numerous, and, unless the voter could read the names on his ticket, he could not possibly prepare it. Not knowing how to get over this difficulty, the constitutional convention had to tate to say is not; let a voter in such a case get his instructions from someone without; he has no business to receive it in the voting compartment."

The fact that a voter is obliged to wear glasses, and has left them at home, is held to be insufficient to entitle him to assistance in State ex rel. Braley v. Gay, supra.

And in Preston v. Price, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 588, 85 S. W. 1183, under a statute providing for assistance to a voter who is so disabled as to be unable to mark his ballot and shall so declare on oath, what constitutes such disability is for the election judges to decide, and when they decide such disability exists the ballot must be counted, though they err in their judgment.

Effect of illegal or irregular assistance.

Cases involving the validity of ballots prepared with the assistance of unauthorized persons are collected in a note to Board v. Dill, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1170.

The effect of rendering assistance to voters in an illegal or irregular manner is by some courts held to invalidate the ballot.

Thus in Cole v. Nunnelley, 140 Ky. 138, 130 S. W. 972, the court says it is not contemplated that voters shall be permitted to vote at any other than the regular voting place, and ballots taken by an election officer outside of the polling place to disabled and infirm voters, who then marked them and returned them to the officer, are invalid.

Disregard of provisions for oath of disability and for secrecy is held to be ground for rejecting the ballots in Banks v. Sergeant, 104 Ky. 843, 48 S. W. 149, and Napier v. Cornett, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 576, 68 S. W. 1076.

In Patterson v. Hanley, 136 Cal. 265, 68 Pac. 821, modified on rehearing in 68 Pac. 975, ballots cast by assisted voters, who had not declared under oath when registered that they were unable to mark their ballots, and were assisted by officers who were not sworn and otherwise failed to comply with the statute, were rejected.

In Combs v. Combs, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 161, 97 S. W. 1127, rehearing denied in 30 Ky. L. Rep. 1005, 99 S. W. 1150, it was held that disregard of provisions for secrecy made the votes illegal.

Under a statute providing that the officer assisting a voter shall mark the ballot as directed by the voter, without suggestion or interference, the substitution of his own for the voter's choice is a flagrant violation of an official trust, and vitiates the ballot. Patton v. Watkins, 131 Ala. 387, 90 Am. St. Rep. 43, 31 So. 93.

However, some courts hold that such irregularities do not invalidate the ballots, in the absence of some showing of fraud or imposition.

Thus in Freeman v. Lazarus, 61 Ark. 247, 32 S. W. 680, where the judges disregard the statute by permitting one judge only to assist the voters when the statute required that the ballots be prepared by two judges in the presence of each other and the voter, and by marking the ballots opposite to voter's directions, the result of the election was declared by the court to content itself with a general direction to the legislature to adopt the best means possible to secure fairness in primary elections. This it did by article 215, providing that "the legislature shall enact laws to secure fairness in party primary elections, conventions, or other methods of naming party candidates."

The legislature promptly, at its first session after the adoption of the Constitution of 1898, carried out the constitutional behest to "provide some plan by which voters may prepare their ballots in secrecy at the polls," by passing act 152, page 286, of that year, known as the "general election law." This law enables the uneducated voter to prepare his ballot by simply stamping the party emblem.

Nothing was done in the matter of a primary election law until the session of 1904, when a joint primary election committee was appointed by the house and senate for the purpose of drafting a primary election law. The report of this committee was presented at the session of 1906, and is embodied in act 49, p. 66, of that year.

This act was copied verbatim from the general election law (act 152 of 1898) in most of its provisions; but on the crucial point of the preparation of the ballot in secrecy it had to and did make a wide departure from it. For comparison of the two provisions we give them side by side.

General Election Law

"Sec. 76. Be it further enacted, etc., . . . Any voter who declares to the presiding commissioner that by blindness or other physical disability he is unable to mark his ballot shall, upon request, receive the assistance of two of the commissioners, who shall be of different political parties or factions, represented among the commissioners, in the marking thereof, and neither the voter nor the said commissioners shall thereafter give any information regarding the same. The commissioner shall require such declaration of disability to be made by

Primary Election Law

"Sec. 24. Be it further enacted, etc., . . . The voter shall be at liberty, if he is unable to prepare his own ballot, to call upon one of the commissioners or watchers or clerks of election to assist him."

be in accordance with the vote as the evidence showed it would have been but for the misconduct of the election judges.

But where the ballots were prepared without fraud and as the voter desired, although not always as the statute directed for the maintenance of secrecy, they were held by the same court to be valid on the ground that secrecy was a personal privilege, which could be waived; there being no proof of the voters being restrained from a free exercise of their privilege. Schuman v. Sanderson, 73 Ark. 187, 83 S. W. 940.

In Montgomery v. Oldham, 143 Ind. 34, 42 N. E. 474, under a statute providing for assistance to a voter who declares his inability to read, it was held that a vote by a person who in fact could not read and write intelligently, and was assisted, should be counted though he stated he could read, when interrogated by an election official.

The fact that judges went into the booths to assist voters in preparing their ballots, although the statute prohibited such action and required that the judges prepare the ballots of such voters as directed by them, without leaving their respective positions, was held not to invalidate such ballots, in the absence of any showing that such misconduct was in furtherance of a design to unduly influence the electors, or that they were in fact imposed upon, there being no provision that such action on the part of the judges should avoid the election or render ballots so prepared illegal and void. Hope v. Flentge, 140 Mo. 390, 47 L.R.A. 806, 41 S. W. 1002; Morgan v. Brase, 140 Mo. 415, 41 S. W. 1101; Howard v. Caldwell, 140 Mo. 416, 41 S. W. 1101; Drum v. Ude, 140 Mo. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

417, 41 S. W. 1100; Frissell v. Cotner, 140 Mo. 418, 41 S. W. 1101.

In Hanscom v. State, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 638, 31 S. W. 547, it is held that where a statute provides for assistance to the voter by two judges, but does not provide that rendering assistance in any other way shall invalidate the ballot, the fact that a voter was assisted by one judge only will not render the ballot void, in the absence of a showing of fraud.

And in Re Ellis, 21 Ont. L. Rep. 74, appeal dismissed in 23 Ont. L. Rep. 427; Re Schumacher, 21 Ont. L. Rep. 522, and Re Prangley, 21 Ont. L. Rep. 54, where it appeared that election officers disregarded statutory provisions in assisting voters, by failing to require declarations of disability, and by marking the ballots without the presence of agents for and against the proposition being voted upon, and by failing to make the proper entries in the poll book, the court held ballots which were so marked in good faith and in accord with the wish of the voter to be valid, but disallowed a ballot marked by the officer to suit himself without the voter giving any direction.

Under a statute providing that the duties of assisting voters shall be discharged by the clerk alone, an occasional or accidental performance of them by a judge or sheriff of election will not render such officer liable to prosecution as wilfully performing his duty in such a way as to hinder the objects of the election law. Com. v. Kaufman, 126 Ky. 624, 104 S. W. 740.

the voter under oath to him, and he is hereby qualified to administer same."

It will be noted that the one statute requires an express declaration of inability to prepare the ballot to be made, and to be made under oath, and that no other cause of inability is recognized than the physical disability to mark the ballot; whereas, the requirement that an express declaration be made of inability to prepare the ballot is omitted from the other statute, and the inability to prepare the ballot is not restricted to physical disability, but is extended to disability from any cause, the language being general, to wit, "if he is unable to prepare his ballot;" i. e., from any cause.

The general election law had restricted the inability to physical inability to "mark" the ballot, because nothing but physical disability could prevent a voter from recognizing the party emblem on the ticket and stamping it. But, when it came to selecting from a long list of names appearing on the ticket, the situation was entirely different. Hence, instead of restricting the inability to physical inability to "mark" the ballot, the committee extended it to inability from any cause.

The voter, being thus left at liberty to call for assistance whenever he finds himself unable from any cause to prepare his ballot, cannot be convicted of crime if, finding himself unable to determine who in the list of candidates for the several offices are the candidates favored by the political party with which he is in sympathy, he calls for assistance.

The contention of the prosecution is that it is not possible for a voter who can read, and who is not physically disabled, to be unable to prepare his ballot, and that therefore any voter who can read, and is not physically disabled, who calls for assistance, violates the provision of the primary election law, § 24, which denounces a penalty for "any voter who shall make a false statement as to his inability to mark his ballot."

This contention might be well founded if the statute restricted the inability to physical disability and the inability to read the ballot; but it does not. It extends it to inability from any cause. If interpreted as here contended, the statute would be made to say something which it does not expressly say, and does not even by necessary implication say. Conduct would be made a crime which the statute does not expressly, or even by necessary implication, make a crime.

To enlarge in this way a criminal statute would be to go counter to what is universally recognized to be the cardinal rule of interpretation for criminal statutes, namely, that they must be construed strictly. In the language of Chief Justice Marshall in United States v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. 95, 5 L. ed. 42, quoted approvingly by this court in State v. Fontenot, 112 La. 642, 36 So. 635: "It would be dangerous indeed to carry the principle that a case which is within the reason or mischief of the statute is within its provisions, so far as to punish a crime not enumerated in the statute, because it is of equal atrocity or of kindred character with those which are enumerated."

On the same subject other courts and judges have expressed themselves, as follows: "There can be no constructive offenses, and before a man can be punished, his case must be plainly and unmistakably within the statute." United States v. Lacher, 134 U. S. 624, 33 L. ed. 1080, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625; United States v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. 76, 5 L. ed. 37; Re McDonough (D. C.) 49 Fed. 360. "Criminal statutes are inelastic, and cannot be made to embrace cases plainly without the letter, though within the reason and policy, of the law." State v. Lovell, 23 Iowa, 304. "Doubts as to the interpretation of a statute must be resolved in favor of the accused." State v. Bryant, 90 Mo. 534, 2 S. W. 836; People v. Reilly, 50 Mich. 384, 45 Am. Rep. 47, 15 N. W. 520; State v. Leo, 108 La. 496, 508, 32 So. 447, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 272; State v. Finch, 37 Minn. 433, 34 N. W. 904.

In State v. Peters, 37 La. Ann. 730, this court said: "Criminal statutes cannot be extended to cases not included within the clear import of their language."

In State v. King, 12 La. Ann. 594, Justice Cole, as the organ of the court, said: "Nothing would be more dangerous to the liberties of the people than that courts should consider as the law, not statutes in actual existence, but the motives of the legislature. If such was the rule, there would then be no certainty in the administration of justice; different courts would vary as to the motives of the sovereign power; in one part of the state particular actions would be viewed and punished as crimes, and in other parts they would be justified. Judicial tribunals derive their power of condemnation from the legislature, and have no more right to condemn without authorization of law than any private individual. Personal rights would never be secure if courts were guided by a desire to punish and prevent crimes without regard to the law and the legal power." 12 La. Ann. at page 595: "We regret to be obliged to set the prisoner at liberty, but it is far wiser and safer for society and the rights of the citizen to allow him to be liberated than to violate a great principle in the interpretation of statutes which has had the sanction of the most learned and enlightened members of the judiciary."

In Simms v. Bean, 10 La. Ann. 346, Chief Justice Slidell said: "The law is not prone to . . . extend punishments and penalties; and this statute, highly severe in the consequences it inflicts, and penal in its character, should receive a strict judicial construction; that is to say, it should not be extended to derelictions of duty and not specially and clearly described and comprehended in it."

In State v. Leo, 108 La. 496-508, 32 So. 447, 451, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 272, Chief Justice Nicholls, as the organ of the court, interpreting § 833 of the Revised Statutes, said: "The object of the general assembly in enacting § 833 is very evident, but it does not suffice in a statute (particularly in a criminal statute) that its purpose should be manifest. To be effective, the purpose must find expression in the language of the law itself, as required by legal rules. We have held permissible sometimes to restrain the generality of the terms of a law so as to exclude from its operations exceptional cases, but we are not authorized to eke out or enlarge the terms of a limited law so as to place thereunder cases which evidently should have been included therein to fully effectuate their object, by which, by inadvertence or other causes, were omitted."

In Shaw v. Clark, 49 Mich. 384, 43 Am. Rep. 474, 13 N. W. 786, it was held that an act not expressly prohibited by the statute cannot be reached by the statute merely because it resembles the offenses provided against, or may be equally and in the same way demoralizing or injurious.

In England the same rule of construction of penal statutes prevails: "We must not extend a penal law to other cases than those intended by the legislature, even though we think they come within the mischief intended to be remedied." Lord Kenyon in Jenkinson v. Thomas, 4 T. R. 665, 666. "We are called upon to construe a penal enactment. Those who contend that the penalty may be inflicted must show that the words of the act distinctly enact that it shall be incurred under the present circumstances. They must fail, if the words are merely equally capable of a construction that would, and one that would not, inflict the penalty." Dickenson v. Fletcher (1873) L. R. 9 C. P. 1, at page 7; Brett, J. "In construing a 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) statute like the present by which a penalty is imposed, we must look strictly at the language in order to see whether the person against whom the penalty is sought to be enforced has committed an offense within the section." Graff v. Evans (1832) L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 373, Field, J. "But then comes the question whether the plaintiffs are also entitled to recover penalties under § 6 [25 & 26 Vict. chap. 68]. We must be very careful in construing that section, because it imposes a penalty. If there is a reasonable interpretation which will avoid the penalty in any particular case, we must adopt that construction. If there are two reasonable constructions, we must give the more lenient one. That is the settled rule for the construction of penal sections." Tuck v. Priester (1837) L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 629, at page 638, Lord Esher, M. R. "The well-settled rule that the court will not hold that a penalty has been incurred unless the language of the clause which is said to impose it is so clear that the case must necessarily be within it." Id. at page 645, Lindley, L. J. "It is a sound rule of construction that, when any penalty or disability is imposed by statute on any of her Majesty's subjects, the court before which any charge is preferred must be able to see clearly what the conduct is which will render a person liable to the penalty so imposed." Crane v. Lawrence (1890) L. R. 25 Q. B. Div. 152, at page 154, Mag. Cas. Cave, J. "I have certainly always understood the rule to be that, where there is an enactment which may entail penal consequences, you ought not to do violence to its language in order to bring people within it, but ought rather to take care that no one is brought within it who is not brought within it in express language." London County Council v. Aylesbury Dairy Co. [1898] 1 Q. B. 106, at page 109 Wright, J.

The act of the accused in this case could be brought within this criminal statute only by construction; and, as the foregoing excerpts indicate, conduct not expressly or unmistakably made criminal by statute cannot be made so by construction. Nothing is a crime which is not clearly and unmistakably made a crime.

In the present case the very fact itself of the division of opinion on the point would indicate sufficiently that the matter was very far from being clear or unmistakable.

Judgment set aside, and the accused ordered released without day.

Land J.:

I concur in the decree on the ground that the statement of facts shows that the accused did not make a false statement as to his inability to mark and prepare his ballot. This is the only charge against the accused. Whatever construction may be placed on the phrase, "unable to prepare his own ballot," act 240 of 1910 does not penalize the request for, or the receiving of, assistance by the voter, but only false statements as to the voter's "inability to mark his ballot." The statute does not define the particular grounds of inability which entitle a voter to receive assistance, and in this respect should be clarified by amendment. It is fortunate that the general assembly will soon have an opportunity to express its will on the subject-matter of the assistance of voters in primary elections.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Chatham County to review a decree construing the will of Mary Tupper, deceased, and holding a devise therein to have been adeemed. Affirmed.

Statement by FISH, Ch. J.:

Miss Mary Tupper executed her will in September, 1905. She was then in possession of a certain improved lot in the city of Savannah. She owned in her own right an undivided half interest in the lot and improvements, and held the other undivided half interest as executrix under the will of her sister, Cornelia T. Lang, the mother of Mary T. Lang. The will of Cornelia T. Lang was executed in 1884, and in the second item thereof the undivided half interest belonging to Cornelia T. was devised to her daughter, Mary T. Lang; such devisee to hold and enjoy all of the profits as long as she might remain unmarried, with the provision that upon her marriage this undivided half interest belonging to Cornelia T. should be divided equally between her four children, including Mary

T., and that, in the event Mary T. should never marry, she should have the power to dispose, by deed or will, of one undivided fourth of this half interest, receiving, however, the rents and profits from the interest so long as she remained single. By the eleventh item of the will of Mary Tupper, she devised to Mary T. Lang, "all my interest, to wit, an undivided one-half interest, in that lot on Bay street, Savannah, Georgia, known as lot No. 4 Jekyl Tything, Derby ward," this being the same lot and the improvements in which Miss Tupper owned an undivided half interest, the other undivided half interest belonging to the estate of her sister, Cornelia T. Lang; and of this Miss Tupper had possession individually and as executrix of Cornelia T.

By the twelfth item of her will, Miss Tupper made Mary T. Lang, Helen T. Vaughn, Clara B. Vaughn, Isabelle V. Smith, and Cornelia C. Vaughn her residuary legatees. On May 18, 1906, Miss Tuppe individually and as executrix of the will of her sister, Cornelia T. Lang, and by virtue of a power of sale in the will of Cornelia T., sold the western half of this lot to the Hibernia Bank for $5,000. On the 12th day of the same month she invested $2,400 of the proceeds of such sale in stock of the Georgia State Building & Loan Association, and took a certificate for it, No. 1,428, in her individual name, and at the same time invested a like amount of such proceeds in stock of the same association, and took a certificate, No. 1,429, in her name as executrix of the will of Cornelia T. Lang. The balance of the proceeds of the sale she put in "the 5 per cent stock of said loan association," and took two pass books of deposits for the same, one of the books in the name of herself individually for half of such balance, and the other in her name as executrix of the will of Cornelia T. Lang for the other half of the balance of the proceeds of the sale. Miss Tupper died June 12, 1910, not having withdrawn either of such deposits, and having made no change in her will.

Under a bill for interpleader, filed by the executor of the will of Miss Tupper, the question was presented whether the sale and conveyance by Miss Tupper to the bank of her undivided half interest in the city lot and the improvements thereon,—she not afterwards becoming possessed of the same,—and the investment by her of the half interest she owned individually in the proceeds of the sale in corporate stock, was an ademption of the devise of her interest in such property to Mary T. Lang. The residuary legatees under the will of Miss Tupper contended that the specific devise to Mary T. was adeemed pro tanto by the sale and reinvestment, and that therefore the corporate stock purchased by Miss Tupper with the proceeds of the sale belonging to her individually, the certificate for which was issued in her name individually, went to them under the residuary clause of her will. The contention of Mary T. Lang was that the specific

But a direction to solicitors to sell stock which had been specifically bequeathed, for the purpose of reimbursing themselves for a sum drawn upon them by the testator, was held in Harrison v. Asher, 2 DeG. & S. 436, 17 L. J. Ch. N. S. 452, 12 Jur. 833, not to adeem the legacy where the solicitors did not dispose of the stock until after the testator's death.

In a few early cases, in case of debts, etc., being bequeathed, a distinction was drawn between voluntary and compulsory payments, it being held that voluntary payment was not a circumstance from which to infer an intention to adeem, but that such an intention might be presumed, unless otherwise accounted for, when the testator himself called in the money. See Stout v. Hart, 7 N. J. L. 414; Lawson v. Stitch, 1 Atk. 507 (dictum); Partridge v. Partridge, Cas. t. Talb. 226, 9 Mod. 269; Orme v. Smith, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 302, 2 Vern. 681; Crookat v. Crookat, 2 P. Wms. 164; and Drinkwater v. Falconer, 2 Ves. Sr. 623. And in the early case of Ford v. Fleming, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 302, 2 P. Wms. 469, 2 Strange, 823, Lord Chancellor King went so far as to hold that the fact that the testator sued for a claim which had been specifically bequeathed, and recovered it, did not adeem the legacy, the ground being that the suit might have been brought merely because the testator thought the debt was in danger. But these distinctions no longer prevail, they being repudiated as unsound and fallacious by the modern decisions, the question resolving itself into one of identity rather than intention. See Wyckoff v. Perrine, 37 N. J. Fq. 118; Abernethy v. Catlin, 2 Dem. 341; Ashburner v. Macguire, 2 Bro. Ch. 108, 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 18, holding that a legacy of a debt is not adeemed by receiving dividends in bankruptcy; Stanley v. Potter, 2 Cox, Ch. Cas. 180, 2 Revised Rep. 26, and devise to her was not adeemed. By consent the case was tried by Judge Walter G. Charlton without a jury. Evidence was submitted on behalf of Miss Lang, to the effect that Miss Tupper, in January, 1905, consulted her counsel as to the advisability of selling the city lot and reinvestment of the proceeds of the sale. She was advised, as the buildings on it were in a dilapidated condition and practically untenable, and bringing in little or no income, that it would be best to sell and reinvest the proceeds in stock of the Georgia State Building & Loan Association; and her counsel soon thereafter, at her instance, wrote a letter to Mary T. Lang informing her that Miss Tupper was of the opinion that it was best to sell the property in question and to reinvest the proceeds in other property. After the sale the same counsel advised Miss Tupper to invest the proceeds of the sale as she did invest it. It was shown that Mary T. Lang was the niece of Miss Tupper, and that the residuary legatees were close friends of hers, with whom she lived for a number of years prior to her death, and with whom she was living when she died. Other facts appearing upon the trial are set forth in the opinion rendered by Judge Charlton, as follows:

"This proceeding, which is substantially a bill of interpleader, is brought by the executor of the will of Mary Tupper to determine whether a designated sum of money

Dyer, 5 Ves. Jr. 656, it was held that a devise is not revoked by a mortgage in fee to the devisee. But in McTaggart v. Thompson, 14 Pa. 149, it was said that a mortgage executed by the testator to the devisee on the devised property operated as a revocation pro tanto. See contra, Harkins v. Bayley, Prec. in Ch. 514, wherein it was said that the rule as 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

announced in McTaggart v. Thompson applied only where the mortgage was to a stranger, and that in case of a mortgage to the devisee it operated as an ademption in toto.

In California it is provided by statute (Civil Code, § 1304) that an instrument altering the testator's interest in a thing disposed of by will, if inconsistent with the testamentary disposition, shall operate as a revocation of the devise. Re Benner, 155 Cal. 153, 99 Pac. 715, holding that a devise was revoked by the sale of the subject thereof.

And a legacy of freedom from slavery upon the death of the testator is revoked by a sale of the slave by the testator, especially where the manumission was not rendered effectual by delivery of a certificate or writing to the slave or to some person for his benefit. Re Nan Mickel, 14 Johns. 324.

But it has been held that a devise of a specific tract of land is not adeemed in toto by a subsequent lease, the reversion continuing in the lessor subject to the conditions contained in the lease, as such a lease changes only the tenure of the estate. Brady v. Brady, 78 Md. 461, 28 Atl. 515, involving a lease renewable forever; Hodgkinson v. Wood, Cro. Car. 23, involving a lease for a term of years.

A valid contract for the sale of lands specifically devised is a revocation of the devise in equity. Walton v. Walton, 7 Johns. Ch. 258, 11 Am. Dec. 456; Donohoo v. Lea, 1 Swan, 119, 55 Am. Dec. 725; Watts v. Watts, L. R. 17 Eq. 217, 22 Week. Rep. 105. And this is true although the sale is rescinded by the mutual consent of the parties, so that the testator is restored to his former title and dies seised of the same estate. Walton v. Walton, supra; Herrington v. Budd, 5 Denio, 321.

But a mere option to purchase which was not exercised during the testator's lifetime was held not to work an ademption, in Emuss v. Smith, 2 DeG. & S. 722, and in and certain shares of stock shall go under the eleventh item of the will as a specific legacy, or under the twelfth item be turned over to the residuary legatees. The property specifically devised in the eleventh item was sold by the testatrix subsequently to the making of the will. She and her deceased sister had owned the property in common, and she was the executrix of her sister's will. She sold the property in both capacities, took the purchase money check, and, without cashing it, indorsed it over to the Georgia State Building & Loan Association, in payment of stock in that concern; the balance after payment for such being deposited to her credit on the books of the company. The devisee under the eleventh item is a niece of the testatrix, not in good health, and living west. The residuary legatees are the children of an adopted daughter of the testatrix, with whom the latter lived until the adopted daughter died, since which event she continued to live with the residuary legatees. During the lifetime of the daughter, she paid nominal board; since her death she paid none. In her will all of the interpleaders are remembered. The interesting contention arising is whether or not the sale of the interests in the realty to have passed under the eleventh item adeemed the devise? The residuary legatees urge that the common law prevails in Georgia, and that the language of the Code of 1895 (§§ 3332, 3333) is to be construed with reference to it. The specific dev-

Re Pyle [1895] 1 Ch. 724, 64 L. J. Ch. N. S. 477, 13 Reports, 396, 72 L. T. N. S. 327, 43 Week. Rep. 420.

So, a mere offer by an agent to sell the subject-matter of a specific legacy made before, but accepted after, the testator's death, was held not to operate as an ademption, in Re Pearce, 8 Reports, 805, as set out in 15 Mews, Eng. Case Law Dig. 1577.

And a contract for the sale of property specifically devised, together with delivery of a deed in escrow, upon the condition that it be delivered to the vendee upon the payment of the cash balance required by the contract, has been held not to revoke the legacy where such payment and delivery of the deed do not take place until a few hours after the testator's death, the ground being that the legatee held the legal title during the interval between the death and the delivery of the deed, and, being subject to the infirmity of the agreement, was entitled to any advantage arising therefrom, and therefore to the consideration paid for the land. Van Tassel v. Burger, 119 App. Div. 509, 104 N. Y. Supp. 273.

But in Weeding v. Weeding, 1 Johns. & H. 424, 4 L. T. N. S. 616, 9 Week. Rep. 431, it was held that a valid contract entered into after the execution of the will, giving an option of purchase, adeemed a devise of the property, although the option was not exercised until after the testator's death.

But an unenforceable contract of sale does not revoke a specific devise of the property. Crowe v. Menton, Ir. L. R. 28 Eq. 519.

And an attempt to convey the property specifically devised, which fails, leaving the specific property in the testator, does not adeem the legacy or devise, as the property may still be delivered over to the legatee in specie. Whitlock v. Vaun, 38 Ga. 562, holding that an attempted sale of property specifically devised, which failed because the purchaser failed to pay for it, did not adeem the devise.

In New York, under 2 Rev. Stat. 64, § 45, a contract to sell property specifically bequeathed does not revoke the devise when the sale is not consummated during the testator's lifetime.

Van Tassel v. Burger, supra.

—hypothecating as security.

The mere hypothecating of stock to secure a debt does not adeem a specific legacy of such stock, where the stock is not sold to pay the debt secured until after the testator's death. Re Young, 32 Pittsb. L. J. 403, as set out in 49 Century Dig. col. 3018.

And in Knight v. Davis, 3 Myl. & K. 358, 3 L. J. Ch. N. S. 81, it was held that the pledging of a specific legacy does not work an ademption thereof, and that the legatee is entitled to have his legacy redeemed or exonerated by the executor.

Where the sale of lands specifically devised is made by the testator's son without the assent or knowledge of the father, such a sale does not adeem the specific devise. Beal v. Crafton, 5 Ga. 301. And the same is true of an unauthorized investment by the testator's agent of the specific sum bequeathed. Basan v. Brandon, 8 Sim. 171. And the wrongful sale by a third person of property specifically bequeathed does not adeem the legacy. Domville v. Taylor, 32 Beav. 604, 8 L. T. N. S. 624, 2 New Reports, 258, 11 Week. Rep. 796.

—effect of subsequent acquisition or reversion.

Where the property specifically bequeathed or devised is alienated, but is subsequently again acquired by the testator, and remains in his possession at his death, the legacy or devise is held operative, in Woolery v. Woolery, 48 Ind. 523, and in Brown v. Brown, 16 Barb. 569.

And it is held that the sale of property specifically bequeathed does not revoke the legacy where there was a simulated transfer acknowledged by the vendee, the property returning to the testator and being in esse at his death. Re Blakemore, 43 La. Ann. 845, 9 So. 496. But in Walton v. Walton, 7 Johns. Ch. 258, 11 Am. Dec. 456, a contrary conclusion was reached, it being held isee claims that in Georgia the rule of intention as taken from the civil law prevails, and the devise has not been adeemed, but merely transferred or substituted, and the fair and conclusive deduction is that the intention of the testatrix was not to adeem the devise, but, by practically segregating the purchase money, investing the major portion, and even preserving the fractional residue in bank, to preserve the devise in substance. This, it is urged, is also shown by the fact that, having been tenant in common of the realty with the mother of the specific devisee, the testatrix, as executrix, invested the proceeds belonging to that estate in identically the same manner.

"We may eliminate from the discussion the relations between the testatrix and the contending parties. She was apparently on affectionate terms with all of them. In doing this, it seems to me that the question of intention is also practically eliminated. The suggestion is strong that the course pursued by the testatrix in immediately investing the proceeds and depositing the fractional sum would indicate an intention to keep the thing itself distinct, however changed its general aspect. The difficulty about such a conclusion arises from the uncertainty of a deduced intention, as distinguished from intention expressed. This may have been the intention of the testatrix, or it may not. There is no presumption arising from the conduct of the testatrix. She may have that where a testator lawfully and validly conveys the estate devised, the devise is revoked, even though he take it back again by the same instrument, and dies seised of the same estate. And see Herrington v. Budd, 5 Denio, 321.

A gift or conveyance to the legatee by the testator during his lifetime, of a thing specifically bequeathed or devised to him, will adeem the legacy. Gilmer v. Gilmer, 42 Ala. 9, holding that a gift to the legatee of certain notes, of one of such notes, adeemed the legacy to that extent; Reed v. Copeland, 50 Conn. 473, 47 Am. Rep. 663; Worrill v. Gill, 46 Ga. 482, holding that a gift to the legatee of property specifically devised to him adeemed the devise, notwithstanding a life estate was reserved in the testator; Davis v. Close, 104 Iowa, 261, 73 N. W. 600, to the same effect as Gilmer's Case, supra; Rice v. Rice, — Iowa, —, 119 N. W. 714, holding that a specific devise of lands was adeemed by gift thereof to the legatee; Rice v. Rice, 147 Iowa, 1, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 917, 125 N. W. 826, same as next preceding case; Kean's Will, 9 Dana, 25, holding that a deed to the devisee during life of testator revoked a specific devise, whether so intended or not; Floyd v. Floyd, 7 B. Mon. 290, holding that a gift to the legatee of slaves which had been specifically bequeathed him adeemed the bequest; Gregory v. Lansing, 115 Minn. 73, 131 N. W. 1010, same as Rice v. Rice, supra; Marshall v. Hartzfelt, 98 Mo. App. 178, 71 S. W. 1061, same as Rice v. Rice, supra; Pickett v. Leonard, 104 N. C. 326, 10 S. E. 460, same as Rice v. Rice, supra.

—sale under process of law.

The fact that the alienation is by process of law, as by a sale for taxes, has been held not to affect the question, the alienation adeeming the devise. Borden v. Borden, 2 R. I. 94.

And the same conclusion has been reached where the sale was made in eminent domain proceedings. Ametrano v. 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Downs, 170 N. Y. 388, 58 L.R.A. 719, 88 Am. St. Rep. 671, 63 N. E. 340; Re Manchester & S. R. Co. 19 Beav. 365; Manton v. Tabois, L. R. 30 Ch. Div. 92, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1008, 53 L. T. N. S. 289, 33 Week. Rep. 832; Re Dowsett [1901] 1 Ch. 398, 70 L. J. Ch. N. S. 149, 49 Week. Rep. 268; Re Bagot, 31 L. J. Ch. N. S. 772, 6 L. T. N. S. 774, 10 Week. Rep. 607; Watts v. Watts, L. R. 17 Eq. 217, 22 Week. Rep. 105.

And in Re Sprague, 13 Ont. Week. Rep. 741, affirmed in 15 Ont. Week. Rep. 49, it was said that, in the absence of statute, a sale of lands specifically devised, even though effected by act of Parliament, would work an ademption.

As to effect of sale under orders in lunacy, see Re Freer, Jones v. Green, Holmes v. Goodworth, and Miller v. Miller, as set out infra, subdivision "Alienation while testator is insane."

—removal of subject of legacy.

Where property is described in a specific bequest as at a particular place, a permanent removal of the property from such place adeems the legacy. Spencer v. Spencer, holding that a specific devise of the furniture in a certain house was adeemed by the permanent removal of all the testator's furniture from such house. See, to the same effect, Glagrove v. Coore, 27 Beav. 138; Green v. Symonds, 1 Bro. Ch. 129, note, Houlding v. Cross, 1 Jur. N. S. 250, 3 Week. Rep. 334; Heseltine v. Heseltine, 3 Madd. Ch. 276; Colleton v. Garth, 6 Sim. 19, 2 L. J. Ch. N. S. 75; and Shaftsbury v. Shaftsbury, 2 Vern. 747.

But it has been intimated that a different rule would apply where the removal is temporary only (Spencer v. Spencer, 21 Beav. 548; Land v. Devaynes, 4 Bro. Ch. 537; Brooke v. Warwick, 2 DeG. & S. 425, 12 Jur. 912, affirmed in 1 Hall & T. 142, 18 L. J. Ch. N. S. 137, 13 Jur. 547); or for purposes of safety (Norreys v. Franks, Ir. Rep. 9 Eq. 18); or for a necessary purpose (Moore v. Moore, 1 Bro. Ch. 127; Chapman v. Hart, 1 Ves. Sr. 271, wherein a distinction was drawn between a house known that the common-law rule prevailed, and still have been satisfied to have it so. Or she may have been ignorant that such a rule ever existed, or that any change in the language of her devise was necessary. Who cannot tell with any degree of approximate certainty? Intention is the law of wills in Georgia; but the Georgia authorities on this line are chiefly concerned with the interpretation of wills, not in the ascertainment of modifications of doctrines which involve conduct. If the common-law rule applies, then this devise would be adeemed, unless that rule is subject to modification through intention. If this be a true rendition of the rule in Georgia in its last analysis, then manifestly the intention which is so controlling as to set aside a rule must be clear and explicit, and the conclusion from the evidence showing it must not be susceptible of two constructions. In other words, the conclusion must be exclusive. Even in the construction of legacies, when the courts are enjoined to seek diligently for the intention of the testator, and give effect to the same, there must be consistency with the rules of law, and, notwithstanding the great power to remodel sentences, the intention must at last be clear and unquestionable; and if the clause as it stands may have effect, it is given that effect, however well satisfied the court may be of a different testamentary intention. Code, § 3324. If this be true when the matter under consideration is specifically subjected to the

and a ship, it being said that removal from the latter would not work an ademption); or by a third party by fraud, to defeat the legacy (Shaftsbury v. Shaftsbury, 2 Vern. 747).

So, it has been held that where a testator bequeaths the household furniture in a certain house, and such goods are not there at the time of his death, because of a prior refusal of the tenant occupying such place to permit them to be stored there, the legacy is not adeemed, and the goods, which had been stored in another place, passed under the legacy. Rawlinson v. Rawlinson, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 302.

—ademption by acquisition of different estate.

Upon the purchase of the fee to property, a leasehold held by the purchaser merges therein and adeems a specific legacy of such leasehold. Emuss v. Smith, 2 DeG. & S. 722; Capel v. Girdler, 9 Ves. Jr. 509, 7 Revised Rep. 289.

And a bequest of a sublease is adeemed by the testator taking an assignment of the original lease. Porter v. Smith, 16 Sim. 251, 12 Jur. 931.

And the devise of a mortgage in fee is adeemed by a subsequent purchase of the equity of redemption. Yardley v. Holland, L. R. 20 Eq. 428, 33 L. T. N. S. 301.

So, it is held that a specific devise of the equitable fee in an estate is revoked where the testator afterwards takes a conveyance to uses, to bar dower in his own favor. Jacob v. Jacob, 82 L. T. N. S. 270, affirming 78 L. T. N. S. 825, which affirmed 78 L. T. 451; Plowden v. Hyde, 2 Sim. N. S. 171, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 329, 16 Jur. 512, reversed on other grounds in 2 DeG. M. & G. 684, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 796, 16 Jur. 823; Rawlins v. Burgis, 2 Ves. & B. 382.

However, where the testator owns a partial freehold and a leasehold, and bequeaths both, a subsequent purchase of the reversion of the leasehold will not adeem the devise, but the whole of the messuage will pass by the devise. Miles v. Miles, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

L. R. 1 Eq. 462, 35 Beav. 191, 35 L. J. Ch. N. S. 315, 12 Jur. N. S. 116, 13 L. T. N. S. 697, 14 Week. Rep. 272.

And a devise of an equitable estate in specific property is held not adeemed by the subsequent acquisition by the testator of the legal title. Dingwell v. Askew, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 427.

And a bequest of the beneficial interest in personalty has been held not adeemed by the vesting of the legal interest in the testator. Clough v. Clough, 3 Myl. & K. 296.

It has been held that the expenditure by the lunatic's committee, of a deposit of money which had been specifically bequeathed, did not adeem the legacy, and that the legatee was entitled to the amount of the legacy from the remainder of the estate. Re Carter, 71 Misc. 406, 130 N. Y. Supp. 201.

And under the rule that legacies are adeemed only where such an intention appears on the part of the testator himself, it was held in Wilmerton v. Wilmerton, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 401, 100 C. C. A. 366, 176 Fed. 896, that the collection of a part of a specific legacy by the conservator of an incompetent testator did not adeem the legacy pro tanto, in the absence of other evidence that such was the testator's intention.

But a contrary conclusion was reached in Hoke v. Herman, 21 Pa. 301, wherein it was held that payment of a debt to the committee of the insane testator adeemed a legacy of the debt.

And in Re Freer, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 622, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 301, 31 Week. Rep. 426, it was held that a sale of stock which had been specifically bequeathed, under an order in lunacy, adeemed the legacy. And the same conclusion was reached in Jones v. Green, L. R. 5 Eq. 555, 37 L. J. Ch. N. S. 603, 16 Week. Rep. 603; and in Holmes v. Goodworth, 7 L. J. Ch. 128; and in Miller v. Miller, 25 Grant. Ch. (U. C.) 224, as to farm stock and implements. As to test of intention, how much more imperative is the necessity for clearness of intention where the subject does not involve the construction of language, but the interpretation of conduct. Nor is this at all affected by the fact that intention enters frequently into the question of ademption. For instance, where money bequeathed is paid over during the lifetime of the testator, the intention with which the money is paid over may well determine whether the testator had in mind the legacy, or gift and legacy were distinct matters. Whatever may be deduced from the general language of Beall v. Blake, 16 Ga. 119, the Code of Georgia expresses substantially the common-law rule, and in §§ 3332 and 3333 expresses the exceptions which may well have been suggested by the indignant protest in that case. These exceptions are (the property having been conveyed to another): (1) Redemption of the property. (2) Abortive conveyance. (3) Exchange for property of like character. (4) Change of investment of a fund. In the last two instances the law deems the intention to substitute merely. Unless some one of these exceptions applies, then the general rule in Georgia, as it was under the common law, is ademption when the specific property is conveyed to another. There is nothing said in any of the sections in regard to the tracing of funds. If there is exchange, it must be for property of like character, and this whether it be swapping or reinvestment. If the legacy is a fund, power of one lacking testamentary capacity, to revoke a will, see note to Re Goldsticker, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 99.

In connection with the foregoing cases, it may be worthy of note that the doctrine of ademption by alienation is generally held to operate pro tanto only, so that where but part of the legacy or devise has been alienated, the remainder still passes to the legatee. See the following cases, which so hold: Gilmer v. Gilmer, 42 Ala. 9; Jacobs v. Button, 79 Conn. 360, 65 Atl. 150; New Albany Trust Co. v. Powell, 29 Ind. App. 494, 64 N. E. 640; Warren v. Wood, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 715, 31 L. T. N. S. 293.

Stat. 64, §§ 46-48, that a change in the property of the testator subsequent to the execution of the will could operate as a revocation of the devise in the will just so far as the alteration in the property has had the effect to place it beyond the operation of the provisions of the will, and no farther. Vandemark v. Vandemark, 26 Barb. 416, holding that a devise was revoked pro tanto by the conveyance of a portion thereof by the testator.

Intention as affecting question.

In case of a sale or other extinction of the subject-matter of the legacy or devise, many courts have presumed an intention that the legacy should fail. See Kenaday v. Sinnott, 179 U. S. 606, 45 L. ed. 339, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 233; White v. Winchester, 6 Pick. 48; Borden v. Borden, 2 R. I. 96; and Hambling v. Lister, 1 Ambl. 401. The only case to the contrary seems to be the early case of Birch v. Baker, Mosely, 373, in which it was said that no such presumption would be indulged.

And the courts in some instances have expressly held that a conveyance during the testator's lifetime of property specifically devised operates as an ademption or revocation of the devise, whether so intended or not, the question being held to be one of identity rather than of intention. Kean's Will, 9 Dana, 25; Beck v. McGillis, 9 Barb. 35; Walton v. Walton, 7 Johns. Ch. 258, 11 Am. Dec. 456; Hoke v. Herman, 21 Pa. 301; Humphreys v. Humphreys, 2 Cox, Ch. Cas. 184; Harrison v. Jackson, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 339, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 142; Re Bridle, L. R. 4 C. P. Div. 336; Oliver v. Oliver, L. R. 11 Eq. 506, 40 L. J. Ch. N. S. 189, 24 L. T. N. S. 350, 19 Week. Rep. 432; Longfield v. Bantry, Ir. L. R. 15 Eq. 101 (dictum).

But it has been broadly stated (Beall v. Blake, 16 Ga. 119, set out at length in LANG v. VAUGHN) that whether a specific legacy has been adeemed or not depends upon whether the testator's intention was to adeem it, but in LANG v. VAUGHN it is said that this rule does not extend to abso-reinvestment of the fund does not affect the legacy.

"The case at bar comes within none of these declared exceptions. The property was real. It was sold,—so far as the testatrix was concerned, destroyed. It was not exchanged, either by act of the parties or by her individual act, for property of like character. On the contrary, the proceeds, having become personal property, remained so until she died. She happened to have put it in a certain stock. She could have spent it, or done anything else with it. She did none of the things the Code recognizes, or the common law recognized, as substitution which would avoid ademption. I do not understand that Beall v. Blake, undertakes to declare that the common law in regard to the doctrine of ademption was not law in Georgia at the time it was rendered. The attack was on Lord Thurlow's construction of the common law, which apparently eliminated intention in all events. This was not apparently the common law, as is clearly shown by the excepted instances set out in the opinion in that case. But it would make Beall v. Blake as extreme as Lord Thurlow if it were to be held that in every instance intention governs. To do this would be to ignore the positive law of the Code; and that may not be done, even if it conflicts with intention. In the presence of positive law, a testator is not helpless, nor is the disposition of his property taken from him. He could add a codicil, if he saw fit. If he elects to allow the item to stand, and the property to so change as, under the law of Georgia, to bring about ademption, then the legacy or devise is adeemed. I therefore conclude that the devise in the eleventh item has been adeemed, and the property concerned in the interpleader falls within the operation of the residuary clause. Even if I had concluded that the intention of the testatrix might govern the situation, and modify either the common-law rule or the language of the Code, I cannot deduce from the facts presented an intention on the part of the testatrix to avoid ademption. The argument is persuasive, and the relations between the testatrix and the residuary legatees are equally suggestive. That the one was of her blood and not in good health might well influence her mind; that the others resided with her, sustained the most intimate relations with her, and were the companions of her last years, constitute, as we know, demands on the heart, and frequently of more potency than those based upon mere relationship."

lute sales by the testator of property specifically bequeathed, but should be limited to the facts of the Beall Case, in which the disposal depended upon a contingency. And in Rue v. Connell, 148 N. C. 302, 62 S. E. 306, where the testator clearly intended that all the testator's right, title, and interest to certain land should pass, it was held that the successful prosecution after the testator's death of a claim of a third person of a right to purchase the property did not adeem the devise, although the claim existed before the testator's death. And some of the early English cases contain statements to the same effect. See Bronsdon v. Winter, 1 Amb. 57, and Coleman v. Coleman, 2 Ves. Jr. 639.

In a number of jurisdictions, however, the legislature, in order to avoid the strict rule of the common law that the testator's intention, except as it is gathered from the will itself, cannot affect the question of ademption, have regulated the question by statute, the general tenor of such enactments being to make the question depend upon the testator's intent.

Thus, in Kentucky it is provided by statute (Rev. Stat. chap. 46, art. 3, Kentucky Stat. § 2068) that the conversion in whole or in part of property devised to one of testator's heirs into other property or thing shall not be an ademption of the legacy or devise unless the testator so intended, but the devisee shall receive the value of such devise unless a contrary intention appear; and that the removal of property devised shall not operate as an ademption unless a like contrary intention is manifest. See Wickliffe v. Preston, 4 Met. (Ky.) 178, holding such statute applicable to both realty and personalty; Lilly v. Curry, 6 Bush, 590, holding such statute limited to heirs of the testator; Haselwood v. Webster, 82 Ky. 409, holding that the common-law rule of ademption by alienation applied except as to heirs of the testator; Miller v. Malone, 109 Ky. 133, 95 Am. St. Rep. 338, 58 S. W. 708, and Franck v. Franck, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1790, 72 S. W. 275, holding that the statute did not apply to a devise of personalty to testator's daughter-in-law.

And in Wisconsin, under Rev. Stat. 1878, § 2278, which provides that every devise of land shall be construed to convey all the estate of the devisor therein, unless it shall clearly appear by the will that he intended to convey a less estate, a specific devise of land has been held not revoked by a subsequent contract of sale, where there is nothing to indicate an intention to revoke. Lafevre's Estate, 100 Wis. 192, 75 N. W. 971.

And in Alabama it is provided by statute (Code, §§ 1602, 1603) that a contract for conveyance of any property specifically devised does not revoke the devise where any part of the purchase money remains unpaid, unless an intention to revoke plainly

Messrs. Saussy & Saussy for plaintiff in error.

Fish, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Counsel for the plaintiff in error contend that "when the testator conveys to another the specific property bequeathed, and does not afterward become possessed of the same," whether such legacy is adeemed depends upon the intention of the testator, and they rely largely upon the case of Beall v. Blake, 16 Ga. 119, as authority to sustain such contention. One of the headnotes to that case is as follows: "Whether a specific legacy, if not illegal, has been adeemed or not, depends on whether the testator's intention has been to adeem it." While this language is broad, it must be construed in connection with the facts of the case then under consideration. A testatrix, in one item, bequeathed $1,000 to a certain legatee, but provided that the legacy should remain in the hands of her executor for four years, for the purpose of defraying therefrom the expenses of any lawsuit which might be commenced within that time, by the relatives of the husband of the testatrix, "for the recovery of any of the property left by him to me; and if such suit should terminate in favor of my estate, then the above legacy, after deducting said expense, to be paid to [the legatee],—if unfavorable, then the said legacy to be null and void." In another item she bequeathed certain negro slaves and other property to another legatee. Thus, on the face of the will, the first specific legacy mentioned was made subject to the result of a possible litigation which might be prosecuted by the relatives of the husband of the testatrix. It was expressly coupled with a condition. There was no condition attached to the second specific legacy, and the court held that as to it the intention was to bequeath the property absolutely. After the death of the testatrix, the relatives of her husband brought the suit which she had apprehended. Proceedings in equity were had, and a decree was rendered finding and decreeing one half of the estate which had been left by the husband of the testatrix in favor of her legal representatives, and the other half to be divided among the husband's relatives. By agreement of the legatees under the will of the testatrix, this verdict was changed by striking the words "legal representatives of Rebecca Bostwick" (the testatrix), and putting in their place the words "legatees of Rebecca Bostwick." The relatives of the husband agreed to such a division of the property as placed the negroes composing the specific bequest in the appears. Powell v. Powell, 30 Ala. 697; Welsh v. Pounders, 36 Ala. 668; Slaughter v. Stephens, 81 Ala. 418, 2 So. 145, construing Code § 2287, which is the same in effect as the provision of the earlier Code.

In Alabama it is further provided by statute (Code § 1603) that "a charge or encumbrance upon any real or personal property to secure any money or the performance of any contract does not operate as a revocation of any devise or bequest of such estate previously executed, unless it appears from the will or instrument creating such charge or encumbrance that such was the intention of the testator." Stubbs v. Houston, 33 Ala. 555, holding a devise of property not revoked by a subsequent mortgage thereof, where no such intention appeared either in the mortgage or in the will itself.

And where the object of the statute is to prevent a partial alienation from destroying the devise, except in cases where the purpose of the testator to give that effect to the alienation is manifest, or where the provision by which the alienation is made is inconsistent with the terms or nature of the devise, no revocation occurs by a partial alienation of the property specifically devised, where no intention to revoke is manifest in the deed and its provisions are not inconsistent "with the terms and nature of the devise." Swails v. Swails, 98 Ind. 511.

Admissibility of extrinsic evidence of testator's intent.

In determining whether a specific legacy has been adeemed, the intention to adeem will not be considered beyond the expression in the will. Ford v. Ford, 23 N. H. 212. In arriving at this conclusion, the court said that, "indeed, the rule that if the thing devised ceases to exist, the legacy will be adeemed, must be abrogated, if evidence of the testator's intention, either by his declarations, or by circumstances, or by a consideration of the peculiar condition of his property, can be considered by the court." See also LANG v. VAUGHN.

But in a few instances it has been held that the presumption of intention to revoke may be rebutted by evidence of a contrary intent. See White v. Winchester, 6 Pick. 48; Wells v. Wells, 35 Miss. 638; Stout v. Hart, 7 N. J. L. 414; and Hambling v. Lister, 1 Ambl. 401.

In some cases where the statutes provide that the sale or removal of the property must have been intended as an ademption in order to give it that effect, it is also expressly provided that the testator's intention may be shown by parol or other evidence. See, for example, Kentucky Rev. Stat. chap. 46, art. 3, § 1 (afterwards known as Kentucky Stat. § 2068) as set out in Wickliffe v. Preston, 4 Met. (Ky.) 178.

share which the executor of the testatrix was to retain. It was held that the verdict and these agreements amounted to agreeing that these negroes might be administered as if the testatrix had had the entire interest in them. It will thus be seen that in the case under discussion the question arose, not from any conduct on the part of the testatrix after making the will, but upon the fact that she bequeathed the entire title in certain negroes as a specific legacy, when in fact she only had a complete title to a half interest in them, and from the further fact that, by virtue of the subsequent litigation and agreements, the negroes were delivered to her estate to be administered as if she had in fact held a complete title in them. This is an entirely different question from that arising in a case where a testator owns property, but subsequently sells it, or places it out of the power of the executor to deliver the legacy. The opinion in that case discussed at considerable length what was deemed an extreme ruling by Lord Thurlow in Ashburner v. Macguire, 2 Bro. Ch. 108, 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 18, and also a number of other cases tending to show that the rule stated by Lord Thurlow was not absolute and without exceptions.

This decision was rendered in 1854, prior to the adoption of the Code of 1863. When the law of this state was codified, the codifiers evidently reviewed the entire subject, and sought to lay down both the general rule and the exceptional cases. Of course, a testator may provide in his will for a substitution of one piece of property for another in case of a sale of the former, or that, if property is sold and the fund reinvested, how the reinvestment shall pass, or make like provision. But if he leaves a specific legacy with no such express provision in the will, and subsequently deals with the property by way of sale or exchange, the law provides what shall be the result. If a testator makes a will containing a specific legacy, and subsequently does certain specified acts, the fact that the law declares what will be the result of those acts in the absence of any provision in the will on the subject in no way conflicts with the rule that the intention of the testator controls in construing his will. It no more conflicts with that rule than does the fact that certain words, such as "heirs," "heirs of the body," "heirs male," "fee simple," "fee tail," and others, have a certain legal meaning, and, if a testator employs them in making his will, the legal result of using them follows. The law on this subject, as codified in the Code of 1863, now appears as § 3908 of 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the Code of 1910, which reads as follows: "A legacy is adeemed or destroyed, wholly or in part, whenever the testator after making his will, during his life, delivers over the property or pays the money bequeathed to the legatee, either expressly or by implication, in lieu of the legacy given; or when the testator conveys to another the specific property bequeathed, and does not afterward become possessed of the same, or otherwise places it out of the power of the executor to deliver over the legacy. If the testator attempts to convey and fails for any cause, the legacy is still valid." And § 3909 reads as follows: "If the testator exchanges the property bequeathed for other of the like character, or merely changes the investment of a fund bequeathed, the law deems the intention to be to substitute the one for the other, and the legacy shall not fail." It will be seen that the general rule that where a testator conveys to another specific property bequeathed, the bequest is adeemed, as stated in § 3908, is coupled in that section with two exceptions: First, where he afterwards becomes possessed of the same; and, second, if he attempts to convey, and fails for any cause, the legacy is still valid. In the next section the subject of substitution is dealt with. Where the testator leaves the question for the law to determine, it is declared that the law deems the intention to be to substitute one piece of property for the other, and that the legacy shall not fail in two cases: First, if the testator exchanges the property bequeathed for other property of like character; or, second, if he merely changes the investment of a fund bequeathed. The statement that "the law deems the intention to be," etc., shows that if the testator makes no provision in his will on the subject, expressive of his intent in case of a sale or the like, the law declares what it deems is his legal intent, or, in other words, provides what shall be the result in such case. This excludes the idea that in every case what the law deems to be the intent has no force, and that the courts will go afield hunting for an intent expressed in parol or to be gathered from conduct or acts of the testator after the making of the will. In the former of the two sections quoted, there are certain cases where parol evidence is admissible. Thus it is stated that if a testator, after making his will, delivers over the property or pays the money bequeathed to the legatee, "either expressly or by implication, in lieu of the legacy given," etc. But this is very different from the question arising under a sale and reinvestment by a testator after the making of his will.

In the case before us, none of the four instances provided in the two cited sections of the Code occurred. After selling the property, the testatrix did not become possessed of it again. She did not attempt to convey it, and fail for any cause to do so. She did not exchange the property bequeathed for other property of like character. She sold real estate and invested a part of the proceeds in personalty. It is immaterial that she thought the personalty would produce a better income than the realty. The obtaining of more income may have been a satisfactory reason moving the testatrix to adeem the legacy, but did not constitute the transaction an exchange of one piece of property for another of like character. Nor did the testatrix bequeath a fund and merely change the investment of it. It was not a bequest of a fund, but a devise of realty. There are no words in the will giving to the legatee not only the realty, but the proceeds of any sale of it. The sale of real property and the investment of a portion of the proceeds thereof in personal property, standing alone, cannot fall within the provision as to changing the investment of a fund bequeathed. Several of the decisions of this court have been cited as tending to hold a doctrine different from that now announced, viz.: Smith v. Smith, 23 Ga. 21; Reed v. Reed, 68 Ga. 589; Clayton v. Akin, 38 Ga. 333, 95 Am. Dec. 393; Whitlock v. Vaun, 38 Ga. 562; Worrill v. Gill, 46 Ga. 482. But in each of them it will be found that the legacy which was declared not to be adeemed was either held not to be a specific legacy, or was construed as including not only land, but proceeds in case of sale, or they were dependent on other facts which plainly distinguish them from the present case.

Judgment affirmed.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

CHARLES R. GARDNER et al.

v.

JOSHUA V. McNEAL et al.

(— Md. —, 82 Atl. 988.)

Will — revocation — inconsistent will.

1. A will giving all testator's property to one person is revoked by the execution of another will giving practically all of the property to another, although it contains no express words of revocation, under a statute providing that no will shall be revocable 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

otherwise than by some other will or codicil in writing, or other writing declaring the same, unless the same be altered by some other will declaring the same.

Same — delivery to legatee — ademption.

2. Delivery by testator in his lifetime of specific property bequeathed by his will to the legatee has the same effect as an ademption.

Same — bequest to unincorporated church — parcel of other institution — right to take.

3. A bequest to a church will not fail because the church is not incorporated, if it is part of an incorporated college which is, by law, authorized to take and hold property on behalf of the church.

Same — bequest to church — right to take.

4. A bequest to a church cannot be turned over to it without ratification of the legislature, where the Constitution makes it void without such ratification.

Same — bank deposit — demonstrative legacy — ademption.

5. The exception in a bequest of stocks and all money remaining in bank except a specified sum, which is bequeathed to another, is demonstrative, and therefore is not adeemed by the withdrawal by testator of the bank deposit.

Same — bequest of stock — specific.

6. A bequest of "my railroad stock" is specific.

Same — sale of stock — effect.

7. A bequest of corporate stock is adeemed by its sale by testator or his agent, whose acts are ratified, and the investment of the proceeds in other stock, and the newly purchased stock cannot be substituted for the former to answer the bequest.

The legacies were not adeemed.

materially altered or new thing for the one specifically bequeathed or devised. By so doing, many apparent conflicts may be dissipated. It should also be remembered that the note does not treat the question whether or not a particular legacy is specific, but proceeds upon the premise that the legacies under consideration are specific.

Early rule.

Under the early rule, which is no longer adhered to, that a legacy of a debt or claim is not adeemed by a voluntary payment thereof, it was held that the legatee was entitled to the proceeds of the sale, provided they could be traced. Orme v. Smith, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 302, 2 Vern. 681; Drinkwater v. Falconer, 2 Ves. Sr. 623; Coleman v. Coleman, 2 Ves. Jr. 639. And the same conclusion was reached in Jones v. Fraser, 13 Can. S. C. 342, as regards the proceeds of a sale of seigniories which had been specifically bequeathed, the ground being that the sale was made necessitate urgente.

Modern rule.

But it is the well-settled modern rule that a specific legacy is adeemed by a radical and material alteration or change in the subject-matter thereof, and that the property into which it was converted by the sale or other material change cannot be substituted as a specific bequest. Georgia Infirmary v. Jones, 37 Fed. 750 (holding that a bequest of claims against the government was adeemed by their collection by the testator, although such proceeds were invested in other securities sufficient to have paid the legacy); Updike v. Tompkins, 100 Ill. 406 (holding that subsequent notes could not replace canceled notes); Ross v. Carpenter, 9 B. Mon. 367, 50 Am. Dec. 514 (holding that a sum recovered by the testator in his lifetime as damages for injuries wrongfully inflicted upon a slave, which resulted in its death, could not be decreed to the specific devisee of the slave); Durham v. Clay, 142 Ky. 96, 134 S. W. 153 (holding that a specific legacy of money was adeemed when invested in real estate, even though the money could be accurately traced); Tolman v. Tolman, 85 Me. 317, 27 Atl. 184 (holding that where notes secured by a mortgage were specifically bequeathed and later surrendered, and a reconveyance of the land for which they had been given made, after which the land was again sold to another, and notes taken which remained unpaid when the testator died, the legacy was adeemed and the new notes could not be substituted); Unitarian Soc. v. Tufts, 151 Mass. 76, 7 L.R.A. 390, 23 N. E. 1006 (set out in GARDNER v. MCNEAL); Hosea v. Skinner, 32 Misc. 653, 67 N. Y. Supp. 527 (holding that corporate bonds purchased with the proceeds of stock which had been specifically bequeathed and later sold could not be substituted so as to pass under the legacy); Snowden v. Banks, 31 N. C. (9 Ired. L.) 373 (holding that legatee was not entitled to price of slave sold by testator); Tayloe v. Bond, 45 N. C. (Busbee, Eq.) 5 (holding same as Snowden v. Banks, supra); Tipton v. Tipton, 1 Coldw. 252 (holding that a note given by a person upon the transfer to him of a note which had been specifically bequeathed could not be substituted so as to pass under the legacy); Gale v. Gale, 21 Beav. 349 (holding a legatee not entitled to the proceeds of lands devised her, but subsequently sold during testator's lifetime); Durrant v. Friend, 5 De G. & S. 343, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 536, 16 Jur. 709 (holding that the insurance on goods lost at sea at the same time testator lost his life could not be taken in lieu of the goods, under a specific bequest thereof); Sidebotham v. Watson, 11 Hare, 170, 1 Week. Rep. 303 (holding that the proceeds of a debt could not be taken in lieu of the debt, although the specific proceeds could be traced); Harrison v. Jackson, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 339, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 142 (holding that where corporate stocks were paid off during the testator's lifetime, and the proceeds invested by his desire in other securities, such other securities could not be taken under the legacy in lieu of the stocks specifically bequeathed, although such result might defeat the testator's intention); Macdonald v. But merely transferring securities from the testator into court, under an order in lunacy, will not cause an ademption, although the securities given were described as standing in the testator's name, and the legatee is entitled to the securities as held by the court. Stockbridge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On July 26, 1899, Ellen McNeal Gardner executed her will in accordance with the requirements of the statute, in the following language: "I, Ellen McNeal Gardner, of the city, county, and state of New York, being of good and sound mind, do hereby make, declare, and publish this to be my last will and testament, revoking any former wills made by me. I hereby give, devise, pass the amount received for the property under eminent domain proceedings consummated during the testator's lifetime, there being no distinction between voluntary and compulsory severance of title. Ametrano v. Downs, 170 N. Y. 388, 58 L.R.A. 719, 83 Am. St. Rep. 671, 63 N. E. 340, affirming 62 App. Div. 405, 70 N. Y. Supp. 833, which affirmed 33 Misc. 180, 67 N. Y. Supp. 128; Re Manchester & S. R. Co. 19 Beav. 365; Manton v. Tabois, L. R. 30 Ch. Div. 92, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1008, 53 L. T. N. S. 289, 33 Week. Rep. 832; Re Dowsett, [1901] 1 Ch. 398, 70 L. J. Ch. N. S. 149, 49 Week. Rep. 268; Watts v. Watts, L. R. 17 Eq. 217, 22 Week. Rep. 105; Re Bagot, 31 L. J. Ch. N. S. 772.

And in Frewen v. Frewen, L. R. 10 Ch. 610, 33 L. T. N. S. 43, 23 Week. Rep. 864, it was held that a specific devise of advowsons was adeemed by an act passed during the testator's lifetime, abolishing advowsons, and giving their owners a right to compensation, and that the devisees could not claim the compensation.

But where property is wrongfully alienated by a third person during the testator's lifetime, the legatee is entitled to the proceeds. Domville v. Taylor, 32 Beav. 604, 8 L. T. N. S. 624, 2 New Reports, 258, 11 Week. Rep. 796. And in Taylor v. Taylor, 10 Hare, 475, where a testator, after specifically bequeathing a certain leasehold, became insane, and the interested parties joined in an agreement for the sale of the property, which, after the testator's death, was approved by the court, it was held that the legacy was not adeemed, and must be regarded as unconverted at the time of the testator's death. Jenkins v. Jones, L. R. 2 Eq. 323, 35 L. J. Ch. N. S. 520, 12 Jur. N. S. 368, 14 L. T. N. S. 540, 14 Week. Rep. 665, which involved a bequest of farm stock and implements, is to the same effect.

And a slight change or alteration in property specifically bequeathed will not operate as an ademption of the legacy. Durham v. Clay, 142 Ky. 96, 134 S. W. 153 (dictum).

And it is held that a mere change in the form of the evidence of the thing specifical-and bequeath unto my husband, William Rodgers Gardner, all the property, of every description whatsoever, both real and personal, of which I may be possessed at the time of my death, or which I would hereafter have become possessed." In February, 1900, William Rodgers Gardner, the sole legatee under the foregoing will, died, and on June 6, 1906, Mrs. Gardner, the testatrix before named, executed in the manner required by law for the execution of wills the following instrument: "Washington, D. C., June 6th, 1906. I, Ellen Gardner, devise and bequeath to my brother, J. V. McNeal, my railroad stock and all money remaining in bank excepting the sum of $300, which I leave to Mary Finnegan. My pearl necklace to my niece Marie McNeal and the pearl pin and earrings to my niece Stella McNeal, my diamond ring and earrings to the church (St. Ignatius), my bureau silver to my friend Mary A Fenwick." After the death of Mrs. Gardner, which took place in July, 1910, the instrument executed by her in 1906 was found among her papers, presented to the orphans' court as the last will of the deceased, and admitted to probate on October 4, 1910. Subsequently the will which she had executed in 1899 was discovered, and upon its production and proof of its execution was also admitted to probate by the orphans' court of Baltimore city on December 10, 1910, and by its order on that date the orphans' court, directed "that the said two instruments of writing shall be conly bequeathed does not revoke the bequest. Irwin's Succession, 33 La. Ann. 63 (holding that exchanging the original evidence of a debt which had been specifically bequeathed, for a bond or other evidence of the indebtedness, did not revoke the legacy); Ford v. Ford, 23 N. H. 212 (holding that a renewal of notes did not adeem a specific legacy thereof); Stout v. Hart, 7 N. J. L. 414 (holding that the acceptance of one bond in lieu of another bond did not adeem); Anthony v. Smith, 45 N. C. (Busbee, Eq.) 188 (holding that merely renewing a bond does not adeem a legacy of the original bond); Skipwith v. Cabell, 19 Gratt. 758 (holding that the exchange of corporate bonds which had been guaranteed by the state for state bonds, as authorized by statute, did not adeem a legacy of such corporate bonds, and that the legatees were entitled to the state bonds).

And it has been held that a legacy of notes does not lapse by the accepting of new notes, where the only purpose was to render the indebtedness more secure, and the new notes were substantially the same as the old ones. Shaffer's Succession, 50 La. Ann. 601, 23 So. 739. So it has been held that a specific legacy of the proceeds of a certain bond and mortgage will not be adeemed by the sale of the premises in proceedings for the collection of the bond, where a new bond is taken, but such bond will be considered as subject to the legacy. Gardner v. Printup, 2 Barb. 33. (But upon similar facts a contrary conclusion was reached in Beck v. McGillis, 9 Barb. 35.) So, the mere changing of an account from a designated bank to another does not adeem a specific legacy of the bank account named in the legacy. Prendergast v. Walsh, 58 N. J. Eq. 149, 42 Atl. 1049. And the fact that the specific bank in which the deposit was made goes into the hands of a receiver bank, which issues a pass book for the amount of the dividend payable, does not adeem the legacy, and the legatee is entitled to such balance. Re Howard, 46 Misc. 204, 94 N. Y. Supp. 86. So, a legacy of stock of a New Jersey corporation has been held not to have been adeemed by a surrender of such stock and the acceptance in lieu thereof of voting trust certificates, which were to be exchanged for stock of the New Jersey corporation, as reorganized under the laws of another state. Pope v. Hinckley, 209 Mass. 323, 95 N. E. 798. And in Re Pilkington, 6 New Reports, 246, where corporate bonds which had been specifically bequeathed "according to the nature and quality thereof respectively" were, between the date of the will and the testator's death, converted into shares of a succeeding corporation, pursuant to a general agreement entered into with the bondholders prior to the execution of the will, it was held that the legacy was not adeemed, and that the new shares passed under the legacy. And the exchanging of bequeathed bank stock for stock issued upon the reorganization and consolidation of that and other banks was held, in Re Peirce, 25 R. I. 34, 54 Atl. 588, not to adeem the legacy. And where stock of an insurance company which lost its capital stock was specifically bequeathed, and, pursuant to legislative act, the stock was again filled, and the testator paid up a part of his shares, it was held that as to such part of the stock, the legacy was not adeemed. Havens v. Havens, 1 Sandf. Ch. 324. But, on the other hand, it has been held that the exercise of an option, given by the corporation which issued the bequeathed debentures, upon their becoming payable, of converting them into permanent debenture stock, adeemed the legacy so that the new debenture stock did not pass by the will, the ground being that the new stock was a substantially different thing from that which he gave, and did not answer the description in the will. Re Lane, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 856, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 768, 43 L. T. N. S. 87, 28 Week. Rep. 764. And in Re Slater [1907] 1 Ch. 665, 76 L. J. Ch. N. S. 472, 97 L. T. N. S. 74, 8 Ann. Cas. 141, affirming [1906] 2 Ch. 480, 75 L. J. Ch. N. S. 660, 54 Week. Rep. 602, 95 L. T. N. S. 350, it was held that a specific legacy of corporate stock was adeemed when the testator exchanged it for stock in a corporation which had succeeded the corporation, the stock of which was specifically bequeathed. And in Pattison v. Pattison, 1 Myl. & K. 12, 2 L. J. Ch. N. S.

strued together as the last will and testament of the said deceased."

This presents, as the first question for determination in this case, the effect of the instrument executed by the testatrix in 1905. It did not in terms revoke the will of 1899, and, in the absence of any expressed purpose of revocation, is it to be given the legal effect of a revocation? The statute in regard to revocation of wills (Code, art. 93, § 318) provides, in substance, that "no will . . . shall be revocable otherwise than by some other will or codicil in writing, or other writing declaring the same . . . unless the same be altered by some other will or codicil in writing or other writing of the deviser, signed as hereinbefore said, in the presence of two or more witnesses, declaring the same." It is true the instrument executed in 1905, with all the formal requisites to constitute it a will under all the requirements of the law, did not in terms revoke the will of 1899, but this is not necessary. A will may be just as effectively revoked by an inconsistent disposition of previously devised property. 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 624; Colvin v. Warford, 20 Md. 357; Johns Hopkins University v. Pinckney, 55 Md. 365; Joynes v. Hamilton, 98 Md. 665, 57 Atl. 25. By the will of 1899 Mrs. Gardner had given her entire estate of every description to her husband. By the second instrument she gave all her railroad stock and all money in bank except $300 (which was bequeathed

15, it was held that a specific bequest of "long annuities" was adeemed by a sale thereof, and that other "long annuities" purchased with the proceeds could not be substituted therefor, although the only difference was that the new annuities terminated three months sooner than the others.

So, the mere agreement of a testator to accept a note which was to be convertible into bonds in lieu of stock specifically bequeathed does not work an ademption of the legacy, where the note was not delivered until after the testator's death. Re Frahm, 120 Iowa, 85, 94 N. W. 444.

And where a mere option to purchase the property bequeathed was given, and not exercised until after the testator's death, it was held that the legatee was entitled to the proceeds. Emuss v. Smith, 2 De G. & S. 722; Re Pyle [1895] 1 Ch. 724, 64 L. J. Ch. N. S. 477, 13 Reports, 396, 72 L. T. N. S. 327, 43 Week. Rep. 420; Duffield v. M'Master [1896] 1 I. R. 370.

And an attempt to renew a lease which had been specifically devised was held, in Abney v. Miller, 2 Atk. 593, not to constitute an ademption, where the renewal was not consummated in the testator's lifetime.

And where the variation in the testator's interest in the subject of the bequest is by operation of law, and is as to form only, the legacy is not adeemed. Walton v. Walton, 7 Johns. Ch. 258, 11 An. Dec. 456 (holding that where the charter of a bank, some of the stock of which had been specifically bequeathed, expired, and all its funds were conveyed to trustees, and the testator received the dividends, but did not sell the shares, the legatee, after testator's death, was entitled to the dividends. [In connection with this case, see Re Howard, supra]); idem (holding that where shares of stock which has been specifically bequeathed under an act of legislature became vested in the state during the testator's lifetime, and a certain compensation therefor was to be paid to the stockholders, the legacy was not adeemed, and that the legatee was entitled to such compensation); Maynard v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 1 Brewst. (Pa.) 483 holding that a specific legacy of shares in a state bank was not adeemed by act of Congress, changing the bank to a national one); Bronsdon v. Winter, 1 Ambl. 57 (holding a legacy of stock not adeemed by the fact that by act of Parliament it was turned into annuities); Oakes v. Oakes, 9 Hare, 666 (holding that consolidated stock into which stock specifically bequeathed had been converted by resolution of the company, under the authority of an act of Parliament, passed under the bequest); Browne v. M'Guire, Beatty, Ir. Ch. Rep. 358 (holding that a specific legacy of government stock, converted by the state into other government stock, was not adeemed by the conversion, and that the new stock passed under the bequest. And this is especially true where the act itself provides that the change shall "not revoke any testamentary dispositions"); Re Loveman, 48 L. J. Ch. N. S. 565. And the same conclusion was reached as to property sold under authority of an act of Parliament, where the act provided in effect that the proceeds of the sale should be treated as if they were still land. Re Spragge, 13 Ont. Week. Rep. 741, affirmed in 15 Ont. Week. Rep. 49. But see Frewen v. Frewen, L. R. 10 Ch. 610, 33 L. T. N. S. 43, 23 Week. Rep. 864, as set out supra. See also Skipwith v. Cabell, 19 Gratt. 758, as set out supra, and Partridge v. Partridge, Cas. t. Talb. 226, 9 Mod. 269.

And the specific devise of an interest in a certain partnership is not adeemed by a renewal of the articles of partnership upon the expiration of the original articles. Backwell v. Child, 1 Ambl. 260.

But it has been held that the actual renewal of a lease which had been specifically devised constituted an ademption which would prevent the devisee taking the new lease in lieu of the one devised, the ground being that the original lease was utterly annihilated by the purchase of the new one. Abney v. Miller, 2 Atk. 593; Hone v. Medcraft, 1 Bro. Ch. 261; Coppin v. Fernyhough, 2 Bro. Ch. 291; Colegrave v. Manby, 6 Madd. Ch. 72, affirmed in 2 Russ. Ch. 238; Marwood v. Turner, 3 P. Wms. 163, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 469; Rudstone v. Anderson, 2 Ves. Sr. 418.

to Mary Finnegan) to her brother, and certain articles of personal jewelry to named friends. It appears from the agreed statement of facts that this comprised her entire estate at the time, with the exception of a few pieces of furniture and some minor articles of personal adornment. The second paper evidently intended to make a complete disposition of her property no less than the first, and, the legatees being entirely different persons, the inconsistency was as great as was possible. But one conclusion can be reached,—the will of 1899 was revoked by that of 1905, and was therefore without any force or effect at the time of her death, and the learned judge below was correct in his decree to this effect.

And where the terms of the devise indicate that it was not the testator's intention to include any interest subsequently acquired, a renewal of the lease works an ademption of the devise. Slatyer v. Noton, 16 Ves. Jr. 197.

But where the terms of the devise indicate that it was intended to cover renewals, as, for instance, by a devise of "all the interest I [testator] have in the lease," it has been held that the new lease passes under the devise. Carte v. Carte, 3 Atk. 174, 1 Ambl. 28, Ridgeway, 210; Colegrave v. Manby, 6 Madd. Ch. 72, affirmed in 2 Russ. Ch. 238; James v. Dean, 11 Ves. Jr. 383, affirmed on rehearing in 15 Ves. Jr. 236.

So, where it clearly appears to have been the intention of the testator to devise all his right, title, and interest in the property, the devisee has been held entitled to the proceeds of a sale of the property after the testator's death, upon the successful culmination of a suit to establish a claim of right to purchase such property, which existed before the testator's death. Rue v. Connell, 148 N. C. 302, 62 S. E. 306.

In Digby v. Legard, 2 Dick. 500, a distinction was drawn between leaseholds held for a term of years and freehold leases for life, it being held that the surrender of a lease of the latter class and the taking of a new one adeemed a devise of the original lease, but that a bequest of a leasehold for a term of years was not adeemed by a surrender thereof and the taking of new leases for further terms.

Intent as affecting question.

The general rule that a specific legacy is adeemed by a material change in the subject-matter, and that the property into which it was converted cannot be substituted so as to pass under the legacy, has been said to be due to reasons paramount to considerations of intention. Georgia Infirmary v. Jones, 37 Fed. 750 (appeal dismissed in 149 U. S. 774, 37 L. ed. 966, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1047); Harrison v. Jackson, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 339, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 142.

But, on the other hand, it has been held that where it appears to have been the clear intention of the testator that the change should not adeem the legacy or devise, and that the property in its new form should pass under the legacy, force will be given to such manifest intent. Joynes v. Hamilton, 98 Md. 665, 57 Atl. 25 (holding that the proceeds of a ground rent which had been specifically devised should be substituted therefor and pass to the devisee); Gardner 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Gardner, 72 N. H. 257, 56 Atl. 316 (holding that stock of a corporation into which the corporation which issued the bequeathed stock had merged should be substituted for such bequeathed stock); Thomond v. Suffolk, 1 P. Wms. 461 (holding that the amount of a claim which had been released by testator should be made up to the legatee); Drant v. Vause, 1 Younge & C. Ch. Cas. 580, 11 L. J. Ch. N. S. 170, 6 Jur. 313 (holding that the proceeds of the sale of the fee of the lands specifically devised passed to the devisee where the sale was made under an option given in a lease, and the lease and option so referred to in the will as to indicate an intention to substitute the proceeds in lieu of the lands in case the lessee exercised the option to purchase). See also Rue v. Connell, 148 N. C. 302, 63 S. E. 306, as set out supra. But a mere unexecuted intention to change the state of the subject of the legacy cannot be considered an ademption. Basan v. Brandon, 8 Sim. 171.

In Georgia it is provided by statute (Code 1910, § 3908) that "if the testator exchanges the property bequeathed for other of the like character, or merely changes the investment of a fund bequeathed, the law deems the intention to be to substitute the one for the other, and the legacy shall not fail." Lang v. Vaughn, ante, 542, holding that an absolute sale of land devised constituted an ademption of the devise, and that the personalty in which the testatrix invested the proceeds did not pass to the legatee.

In connection with the foregoing cases, see also Slatyer v. Noton, Carte v. Carte, Colegrave v. Manby, and James v. Dean, as set out supra.

Admissibility of extrinsic evidence of testator's intent.

Under the principle that extrinsic evidence is not admissible to show that the testator intended by his will to refer to a thing which the will does not describe, it cannot be shown that a thing wholly different from that bequeathed was believed and intended by the testator to be held in substitution of the thing bequeathed. Rogers v. Rogers, 67 S. C. 168, 100 Am. St. Rep. 721, 45 S. E. 176, holding that evidence was not admissible to show that testator intended and believed that a bond and mortgage of land sold by order of court to pay debts, taken by him, would go the legatees of such debts, in lieu thereof. See also Lang v. Vaughn, ante, 542 G. J. C.

The proceedings in the case make necessary a consideration of the various legacies contained in the will of 1905.

The agreed statement shows that the articles given by the will to Marie McNeal had been actually given to her before the death of the testatrix, and therefore constituted no part of her estate at her death, and, so far as the legacy was concerned, it had been anticipated by the testatrix in a manner which had the same effect as an ademption. Gallagher v. Martin, 102 Md. 115, 62 Atl. 247.

The legacies to Stella McNeal and Mary A. Fenwick were, specific legacies, and no reason exists why the articles given these ladies should not be delivered to them by the administrators, and the circuit court was correct in so directing.

The legacy of "my diamond rings and earrings to the church (St. Ignatius)," presents a different question. So far as the articles are concerned, the legacy is specific, but St. Ignatius Church is not a body corporate. But the agreed statement of facts embodies the following: "That St. Ignatius Church, mentioned in said will of June 6, 1905, is situated at the corner of Calvert and Madison streets, Baltimore, and adjoins and communicates on the south with and is physically a part of Loyola College building, which said college building occupies (including said church) the entire block on the west side of Calvert street, from Madison street to Monument street; that the rector or president of said college is, by virtue of his office, the rector or pastor of said church, the priests attached to said college being also attached to said church, and that said church and college are integral parts of the same management; that the title to said property embracing the church and college building is vested in the Associated Professors of Loyola College, in the city of Baltimore, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of Maryland, and that by an act of the general assembly of Maryland (Laws of 1888, chapter 208) said corporation was duly authorized to take and receive bequests on behalf of said church." The act of 1888 referred to was one to enlarge the powers of "the Associated Professors of Loyola College in the City of Baltimore," and as a portion of said enlarged powers the corporation was specifically authorized, for the purposes of said church, to take, hold, and receive any gift, grant, devise, or bequest of any property, real, personal, and mixed, as fully and to the same extent as it is authorized to do as an educational institution. This legacy, therefore, presents clearly the case of misnomer of a legatee, and a mere misnomer will not operate to defeat the intent of a testatrix, where the beneficiary of the intended bounty is perfectly certain. This legacy is analogous to the one contained in the will of Melissa Baker to "the Woman's College located at the city of Lynchburg," which was held to be a valid bequest to "the trustees of the Randolph-Macon College," in Trinity M. E. Church v. Baker, 91 Md. 539, 46 Atl. 1020, and to the legacy which was sustained in Woman's Foreign Missionary Soc. v. Mitchell, 93 Md. 199, 53 L.R.A. 711, 48 Atl. 737, and to the devise which was held good in Doan v. Ascension Parish, 103 Md. 662, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1119, 115 Am. St. Rep. 379, 64 Atl. 314.

By the decree in this case the legacy now being considered was sustained, and the administrators were directed to make distribution of it to the Associated Professors of Loyola College. In so decreeing either the court below had evidence before it which is not in the record, or else it fell into a partial error. The legacy was one manifestly intended for the benefit of the church known as St. Ignatius Church, not for the educational purposes included within the powers of the Associated Professors of Loyola College. It was therefore a legacy of the class coming within the provisions of article 38 of the Declaration of Rights; and, before it can be treated as valid and effectual, it must receive the sanction of the general assembly of the state. It nowhere appears in the record that this sanction has ever been given, and there is nothing in the terms of the act of 1888 which can properly be construed as giving a sanction by anticipation to all devises or legacies which may thereafter be made to that corporation for its religious purposes. The will now under consideration was admitted to probate on the 4th of October, 1910, and there has been no meeting of the general assembly since that date; but an executor is always entitled to a reasonable time in which to obtain legislative approval, where such sanction is required. When such approval is given, the legacy will become payable, and not before. Accordingly the decree below should be so far modified as to provide that the said bequest should be distributed to the Associated Professors of Loyola College upon the production to the executor of satisfactory evidence that the sanction of the general assembly of the state had been given to it, and not before.

With regard to the legacy to Mary Finnegan, it appears that at the time when Mrs. Gardner executed her will in 1905, she had on deposit to her credit a sum of money more than sufficient to have paid this legacy, but that between that time and the time of her death she had withdrawn from bank all, except the sum of $12, and the contention is that the legacy to Mary Finnegan was adeemed except as to said amount of $12. Whether the decree of the lower court was correct in this regard depends upon whether the legacy in question was or was not a specific legacy. If specific, the ruling was undoubtedly correct; on the other hand, if the legacy was demonstrative, it was incorrect. To reach a satisfactory determination in this regard, it is necessary to understand with precision the distinction between the different kinds of legacies. The language of the will, "I, Ellen Gardner, devise and bequeath to my brother, James McNeal, my railroad stock and all money remaining in bank, excepting the sum of $300, which I leave to Mary Finnegan," shows clearly that it was the purpose of the testatrix that the $300 bequeathed to Mary Finnegan was to be paid out of moneys remaining in bank, and, if the testatrix had at the time of her death $1,000 to her credit in bank, it would have been perfectly easy to discharge the legacy by paying over to her any $300, so to the credit of said testatrix, and not otherwise disposed of. The inclination of the courts is against construing a legacy to be specific, because "specific legacies are not liable to contribution in case of a deficiency of assets, and inasmuch as the legacy fails entirely, if the testator parts with the property or thing specifically bequeathed" (Dryden v. Owings, 49 Md. 356; Kunkel v. Macgill, 56 Md. 120); and when, under the language of a will, a legacy is susceptible of being construed either as a specific or as a demonstrative legacy, courts lean to the construction which will regard it as demonstrative. A demonstrative legacy is defined in Kunkel v. Macgill, supra, as "a legacy in the nature of a general legacy, with a certain fund pointed out for its payment;" and that, in our view, is precisely the character of legacy here given to Mary Finnegan. It is a bequest of $300, to be paid out of the money remaining in bank, and the fact that there was not that amount remaining in bank at the time of her death, entitles her, in addition to the $12 which was in bank, to the payment of the balance out of the general assets belonging to the estate, if such general assets existed and, if not, then pro rata with general legatees, if any. In the present case there were assets, which, as will be seen in a moment, were adequate, out of which to pay this balance, and this portion of the decree of the lower court which held the legacy as specific, and that it had been adeemed as to all above the sum of $12, must be reversed.

The remaining legacy which this appeal brings before us for construction is as follows: "I, Ellen Gardner, devise and bequeath to my brother, James V. McNeal, my railroad stock and all money remaining in bank excepting," etc. It appears from the agreed statement of facts that at the time when Mrs. Gardner executed her will she was the owner of 12 shares of the common stock of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, and 60 shares of the preferred stock of the same corporation, and that she had a cash balance in bank of $436.03. It further appears that the preferred stock was sold about October 1, 1909, by her brother and agent, Joshua V. McNeal, and the proceeds of that sale, together with some of the money in bank, reinvested in the purchase of bonds of various corporations. The bequest of the stock was undoubtedly a specific legacy. Bonds and shares of stock of corporations may be specifically bequeathed, and the word "my," "in my possession," or "standing in my name," and other like expressions referring to the corpus of the fund, have generally been relied on as showing the intent of the testator that the bequest of such stock was specific. Kunkel v. Macgill, supra. The effect of the language of the testatrix is therefore to give to her brother, Joshua V. McNeal, the 12 shares of the common stock of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad as a specific legacy. With regard to the 60 shares of preferred stock, the same result by no means necessarily follows.

The nonexistence of property at the time of the death of a testatrix which has been specifically bequeathed by will is the familiar and almost typical form of ademption. This may result from a variety of causes, such as a gift during the lifetime of the testatrix, of the particular article which was the subject-matter of the legacy, its consumption, loss, or sale, and in each of such instances the courts have held a legacy to be adeemed. A case of almost exact parallelism with the one under consideration was in the case of the Unitarian Soc. v. Tufts, 151 Mass. 76, 7 L.R.A. 390, 23 N. E. 1006, in which a testatrix by her will gave to a legatee certain railroad stocks, which she subsequently sold and reinvested the proceeds, and this was held to have adeemed the legacy; the court saying: The general rule is that, when the chattel specifically bequeathed by a testator is sold or conveyed by him during his life, the legacy is adeemed. And in Weston v. Johnson, 48 Ind. 1, after the statement of the same rule, the court adds: "If the proceeds from such sale or disposition were to be substituted and permitted to pass, the effect would be . . . to convert a specific into a general legacy." The same principle will be found stated in Cowles v. Cowles, 56 Conn. 240, 13 Atl. 414, and has been recognized in this state in Brady v. Brady, 78 Md. 461, 28 Atl. 515.

In that case the testator gave to his son certain cows and farming implements, with a life estate in the same chattels to his widow. When the life estate terminated, none of the cows which were in the possession of the testator when he made the will were living, and the legacy of these animals was held to be adeemed, while in the case of the farming implements, a portion only of which had disappeared through use, the legacy was held to have been adeemed only in part.

Applying these cases to the one under consideration, we must hold the legacy of 12 shares of common stock to be valid, and that of the 60 shares of preferred stock to have been adeemed, and that the reinvestments which had been made cannot be substituted as a specific legacy in favor of Joshua V. McNeal.

It was earnestly argued that this change of investment was made by Joshua V. McNeal, the brother of the testatrix, without any special sanction from the testatrix, and it may be without her knowledge, and that by reason of these facts the legal result which would follow a sale of the property by the testatrix were avoided. In this view we are unable to concur. Whatever Mr. McNeal may have done was done as agent of Mrs. Gardner, and his acts as such agent were practically ratified in advance when she delivered to him the certificates of the preferred stock, indorsed for transfer, and there is no suggestion or imputation that Mr. McNeal violated or in any way exceeded the powers conferred upon him, or that his acts in disposing of the stock for her, and otherwise reinvesting the proceeds, were ever in any manner disavowed by her. The will of June 6, 1905, did not contain any residuary clause, and, under the construction which we have felt compelled to put upon it, it necessarily follows that, as to a considerable portion of her estate, Mrs. Ellen M. Gardner died intestate. That she had no intent to die thus intestate is undoubtedly true, and in that respect again the present case is in exact parallel with the case of Unitarian Soc. v. Tufts, supra. But that fact cannot alter the legal result, and the balance of her estate after the payment of specific and demonstrative legacies, is distributable to her brother, Joshua V. McNeal, and her half-brother, James H. McNeal.

The decree of the Circuit Court will therefore be affirmed in part and reversed in part, and the case remanded, to the end 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that a decree may be entered in accordance with this opinion, and the administration of the estate completed accordingly.

Decree affirmed in part and reversed in part, and case remanded, costs to be paid out of the estate.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

RE ESTATE OF E. J. PRUNER, Deceased.

BEN. J. HILTNER, Admr., etc., of Clara
R. Moyer, Deceased, Appt.

(222 Pa. 179, 70 Atl. 1000.)

Will — legacy of insurance policy — ademption.

1. A bequest of insurance policies which testator holds on another's life as security for a debt is adeemed by collection of the policies by testator and investment of the proceeds in other securities, upon death of the insured within his lifetime.

Same — specific legacy — appended condition.

2. A provision after a bequest of life insurance policies which testator holds on another's life as security for his debt, that legatee "pay the premiums on the same till they mature," does not destroy the specific character of the legacy.

(June 23, 1908.)

APPEAL by the administrator of Clara R. Moyer, deceased, from a decree of the Orphan's Court for Centre County dismissing exceptions to the report of the auditor distributing the funds in the hands of the executor of the estate of E. J. Pruner, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. O. H. Hewitt, for appellant:

The character of a legacy, whether specific or demonstrative, is essentially a question of intention.

Note. — Collection of insurance policy during lifetime of testator as ademption of specific legacy thereof.

RE PRUNER is directly supported by the few cases which have passed upon the specific question therein involved.

Thus in Davidson v. Davidson, 4 F. 107— Ct. of Sess. as set out in 2 Mews, Eng. Case Law Dig. Supp. of 1898-1907, col. 2814, a case on all fours with the PRUNER CASE, where a testator insured the life of his wife and specifically bequeathed the proceeds thereof, and she died during his lifetime and the proceeds were collected and merged in the testator's general estate, the legacy was held adeemed thereby.

So, the collection by the testator of an insurance policy the proceeds of which he had

The doctrine of ademption by acquisition applies to specific legacies only, and does not obtain in the cases of general, demonstrative, or pecuniary bequests.

Smith's Appeal, 103 Pa. 559; Fryer v. Morris, 9 Ves. Jr. 360, 7 Revised Rep. 222; Ives v. Canby, 48 Fed. 718; Corbin v. Mills, 19 Gratt. 438; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 630; Collins v. Wakeman, 2 Ves. Jr. 683; Nooe v. Vannoy, 59 N. C. (6 Jones, Eq.) 185; Coleman v. Coleman, 2 Ves. Jr. 639, Doughty v. Stillwell, 1 Bradf. 300; Georgia Infirmary v. Jones, 37 Fed. 750.

Messrs. John G. Love, P. J. Little, and Harry Keller, for appellee:

The bequest is specific, and there being no life insurance policies, such as specifically described, at the date of the death of the testator, the bequest was adeemed.

Walls v. Stewart, 16 Pa. 281; Blackstone v. Blackstone, 3 Watts, 335, 27 Am. Dec. 359; Ludlam's Estate, 13 Pa. 188; Hoke v. Herman, 21 Pa. 301; Pleasants's Appeal, 77 Pa. 356; Smith's Appeal, 103 Pa. 559; Fidelity Ins. Trust & S. D. Cos. Appeal, 108 Pa. 492, 1 Atl. 233; Donaldson's Estate, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 235.

Fell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this appeal arises under the following clause of the testator's will: "I also give to my niece Clara R. Moyer, the life insurance policies which I hold on the life of A. C. Moyer, she to pay the premiums on the same till they mature." A. C. Moyer was the husband of Clara R. Moyer; and the testator held by absolute assignments two policies of insurance on his life. The testator paid the premiums for a number of years and charged them in ledger accounts headed, "A. C. Moyer Life Insurance Policy, New York Life," and "Mutual Life Insurance Co., N. Y., Investment in Policy on A. C.

Moyer's Life." The insured died before the testator, who received the proceeds of the policies and deposited them in his account in the bank of which he was president. He used the money received from the insurance, with other money, in the purchase of bonds, which he placed in a safe-deposit box where he kept his securities. The auditor found that at the time of the assignment of the policies the testator was a creditor of the insured and had an insurable interest in his life, that there was nothing to indicate that the bonds purchased in part with the money received from the insurance companies were not the absolute property of the testator, and that the legacy was specific, and was adeemed by the maturity and payment of the policies before the death of the testator. These findings were affirmed by the orphans' court.

It is conceded that, under the findings of fact, the appellant can succeed only on the ground that the legacy was not specific and adeemed by the payment of the policies. It is argued with much earnestness and ability that the words in the bequest, "she to pay the premiums on the same till they mature," disclose an intention on the part of the testator not to give his niece the insurance policies freed of any charge upon them, but to give her the proceeds of the policies less the amount of the premiums paid by him, and that the legacy was a bequest of a sum of money payable out of a particular fund, and was demonstrative, and not adeemed by the payment of the policies. In order to guard a legatee against the risk of ademption, and in order that the legacy may be liable to contribution and abatement in case of a deficiency of assets, courts incline against construing legacies as specific. But this well-recognized doctrine must not be allowed to contravene the plain import of the will. Notes to Ashburner v. Macguire, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 267. The bequest of the "life insurance policies which I hold on the life of A. C. Moyer" is clear-specifically bequeathed, and the commingling of such proceeds with his other funds, was held in Nusly v. Curtis, 36 Colo. 464, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 592, 118 Am. St. Rep. 113, 85 Pac. 846, 10 Ann. Cas. 1134, to constitute an ademption of the legacy. And the same conclusion was reached in Barker v. Rayner, 5 Madd. Ch. 208, affirmed in 2 Russ. Ch. 122, the court saying that the only inquiry was whether the specific thing remained at the death of the testator, and that it could not enter into a consideration of the testator's intention.

As to bequest of policy of insurance or proceeds thereof as specific legacy, see note to Nusly v. Curtis, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 592, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The general question of ademption of a specific legacy or devise by disposal, loss, or destruction of the property bequeathed, is treated in the note to Lang v. Vaughn, ante, 542, and the general question of ademption of specific legacy or devise by change in or substitution of other property for that bequeathed is annotated in connection with Gardner v. McNeal, ante, 553. And as to gift by testator as ademption of general legacy to donee, see the note to Johnson v. McDowell, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 588, and as to gift to one spouse by parent of the other as advancement or ademption, see note to Ireland v. Dyer, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1050.

G. J. C.

ly specific. The added words, "she to pay the premiums on the same till they mature," refer to payments that might become due after the policies passed by the will to the legatee. If they had been in force at the death of the testator, his niece would have received them free of any charge for premiums paid by him. We think the conclusion expressed by the learned judge of the orphans' court, that it was "the intention of the testator to give the policies to his niece on the condition and understanding that after his death his estate should no longer be chargeable with the maintenance of the same," is correct.

The decree is affirmed, at the cost of the appellant.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

THOMAS GRIMSHAW, Admr., etc., of Thomas Cole, Deceased, Respnt.,
v.

LAKE SHORE & MICHIGAN SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(205 N. Y. 371, 98 N. E. 762.)

Railroad — employee on engine — licensee.

1. A railroad employee permitted by the engineer to ride on an engine, contrary to the rules of the company, of which he is ignorant, is a licensee toward whom the company must exercise ordinary care.

Same — riding on engine — statutory prohibition — permission.

2. The statutory prohibition against riding on any railroad engine or freight or wood car without authority or permission of the proper officers of the company does not extend to one to whom permission has been given by the person in charge of the engine or car.

Same — track crossing — negligence.

3. A railroad company is bound, in the operation of its trains at a crossing of another road, to exercise ordinary care not to injure a person riding upon an engine on the other road, whose presence thereon was not of such a character as to constitute him a wrongdoer.

Same — negligence of employee — riding on engine.

4. A railroad employee cannot be said to be negligent as a matter of law in riding on a locomotive which has no cars attached,

Note. — As to liability of railroad company for injury to person wrongfully on train by collusion with a train employee, see notes to Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Lawson, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 721, and St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Jones 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 419.

so as to prevent his holding another company liable for injury to him due to a collision of its train with the engine at a point where the tracks of the two companies crossed.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Erie County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas D. Powell with Messrs. Hoyt & Spratt, for appellant:

Plaintiff's intestate was a trespasser upon both the Wabash engine and the tracks of defendant. And the defendant, in the absence of evidence that it wilfully or wantonly injured him, is not liable.

If the defendant is to be held liable for negligence, then plaintiff's intestate, having violated the rules of the Erie and Wabash companies provided for his protection, was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

Willard Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The tracks of the Erie Railroad Company cross the tracks of the defendant, the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company, at a point in the city of Buffalo. At the time of the accident which gave rise to this action, in December, 1907, the Wabash Railroad Company operated some of its trains over these tracks of the Erie. A Wabash engine thereon attempted to cross the point of intersection when it was struck by one of the defendant's freight trains running along one of the intersecting tracks. The collision resulted in the death of the plaintiff's intestate, Thomas Cole, an employee in the office of the master mechanic of the Erie Railroad Company at East Buffalo, who was riding on the locomotive. This action was brought to charge the defendant with liability for negligence in the operation of its freight train at the crossing. The answer was a general denial. The plaintiff recovered a small verdict, the judgment upon which has been affirmed by the appellate division, one of the justices dissenting on the ground that the plaintiff's intestate was a trespasser upon the Wabash engine at the time of the accident, and the defendant could be held liable only in case it caused his death wilfully, wantonly, or recklessly, of which there was no evidence. The trial judge charged the jury that the defendant owed to every one on that engine ordinary care to keep him from being injured, and it must be assumed that the verdict was based upon a finding of the absence of such ordinary care.

The plaintiff's intestate was evidently on the locomotive with the sanction of the engineer in charge. He had been in the habit of riding on it once or twice a week for a couple of months prior to the accident. It is true that there were rules both of the Wabash and of the Erie Company to the effect that unauthorized persons would not be permitted to ride on the engine; but it did not appear that Cole had ever had notice or possessed any knowledge of these rules. He was a licensee, rather than a trespasser in the same sense that one is a trespasser who boards a train forcibly or gets on secretly to obtain transportation furtively. In the absence of authority on the part of the engineer to permit him to ride on the engine, he did not become a passenger, but the permission relieved him from the imputation of being a wrongful intruder, and obligated the Wabash Company to the exercise of ordinary care not to injure him. See 4 Elliott, Railroads, 2d ed. § 1581. His presence on the engine, being thus lawful as to the Wabash, was equally lawful as to the defendant; and it was also bound to exercise ordinary care not to injure him. There was evidence that it failed in its duty in this respect.

We are referred to the case of Eaton v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 57 N. Y. 382, 395, 15 Am. Rep. 513, as an authority precisely in point to show that the plaintiff's intestate was not lawfully upon the engine at the time when he was killed. That case was decided by the commission of appeals in 1874, and the decision was not unanimous. There was an able dissenting opinion by Commissioner Earl, afterward chief judge of this court. The plaintiff had been invited by the conductor of a coal train belonging to the defendant to ride thereon. The conductor informed him that the company was in want of brakemen, and invited him to ride back to a specified station with a view to obtaining employment as a brakeman. There was a printed regulation of the company forbidding passengers to ride upon coal trains, but it did not appear that the plaintiff knew of this regulation or had any reason to suppose that the conductor was doing an unauthorized act in inviting him to get upon the train. A majority of the commission of appeals held that, inasmuch as the conductor of a freight train has no power whatever as to the transportation of passengers, notice to the plaintiff of his limited authority in this respect would be implied, and hence that the plaintiff's presence on the freight train was unlawful. From this view Commissioner Earl dissented, saying: "I think no authority can be found holding that a person, under such circumstances, is unlawfully or wrongfully upon a train, but there are numerous authorities in this and other states holding otherwise. This being so, there is abundant authority for holding that he was entitled to protection against the wilful or negligent acts of the defendant or its agents." In view of this dissent, I think that the Eaton Case should be regarded as a controlling precedent only in cases where the circumstances are precisely similar, and that the doctrine of the prevailing opinion should not in any wise be extended. Thus limited, it is applicable only to cases where the party injured is chargeable with notice that the railroad employee who permits him to ride on a particular train has no authority to do so.

It cannot fairly be contended in the present case that the plaintiff's intestate must be presumed as matter of law to have known that the engineer had no authority to allow him to ride upon the engine.

It may also be observed in regard to the Eaton Case that the members of the commission of appeals who united in the prevailing opinion expressly refrained from declaring that the plaintiff was a trespasser. Eaton v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. supra, 57 N. Y. 394, 15 Am. Rep. 513.

While permission to ride on a freight train or locomotive given by subordinate agents such as the conductor or engineer will not ordinarily suffice to constitute a person to whom permission is thus given a passenger, yet the weight of authority is in favor of the proposition that the consent of such employee is sufficient to require the exercise of ordinary care by the employer even though it does not demand the highest practicable degree of care such as a carrier owes to a passenger.

The tendency of the courts is to hold that a person riding upon a train other than a passenger train with the consent of those in charge, although against the rules of the company of which he is ignorant, is to be deemed a licensee, rather than a trespasser. See Lemasters v. Southern P. Co. 131 Cal. 105, 63 Pac. 128.

The case upon which the appellant chiefly relies is Wickenburg v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 94 Minn. 276, 102 N. W. 713. There it appeared that the tracks of the defendant company and the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis, & Omaha Railroad Company intersect at Turtle lake, in the state of Wisconsin. In consequence of the negligence of the defendant, one of its trains collided at the crossing with a train on the Omaha road, seriously injuring the plaintiff, who was a boy twelve years old, and who had boarded the Omaha train when it stopped, before passing the crossing, for the purpose of riding to a neighboring station. He was riding upon one of the cars or clinging to its steps in violation of a Wisconsin statute. His presence was unknown to the Omaha Company or any of its employees in charge of the train. The supreme court of Minnesota held that the obligation of the defendant to exercise reasonable care to avoid a collision with the Omaha train, or not to injure persons lawfully riding thereon, did not extend to the plaintiff, and that he could not recover. It is to be observed that this was the case of a trespasser, pure and simple, and not a licensee, for, as has been said, no one on the Omaha train sanctioned the plaintiff's presence thereon or was aware of it. The Omaha Company therefore owed him no duty until it discovered him in a position of peril, and was only liable to him for a wilful or wanton injury. That this decision, however, was not intended to go so far as to pass upon the rights of a licensee under similar conditions, as distinguished from a mere trespasser, is apparent from the following paragraph in the opinion: "We need not indulge in a discussion of the question whether persons upon a train with which another negligently collides, who are there with the knowledge and consent of the company, riding without payment of fare with the consent of the employees, or upon forged passes or other unlawful or fraudulent means, would be entitled to recover. There is a marked distinction between persons riding on a train with the knowledge and consent of its employees, and persons situated as plaintiff was,—upon the steps of one of the cars attached to the train, without right, in violation of express law, and without the knowledge or consent of the company."

The suggestion is made in behalf of the appellant that the deceased was on the engine in violation of express laws, and was even guilty of a crime in being there at the time when he was killed in consequence of the defendant's negligence. Penal law (Consol. Laws 1909, chap. 40), § 1990. The prohibition of the penal law, however, against riding on any railroad company's engine or freight or wood car, without authority or permission of the proper officers of the company, does not extend to a case where permission is given by "the person in charge of said car or engine." It is manifestly unreasonable to assume that Cole was on the engine without the permission of the engineer, in view of the evidence which has been mentioned as to his practice of riding thereon for two months before his death.

The concrete rule of law which we deem applicable to such a collision as occurred in this case is that the defendant whose freight train ran into the Wabash engine at the crossing was bound to exercise ordinary care not to injure any person riding upon that engine whose presence thereon was not of such a character as to constitute him a wrongdoer. Further than that, the status of the injured person toward the corporation on whose locomotive he was riding was immaterial to the company operating the train which caused the injury. If the collision had happened between the defendant's train and a passenger train of the Wabash, and had resulted in injury to passengers on the latter train, the Wabash Company would have owed such passengers the duty to exercise the very highest degree of care in the management and operation of its train, whereas the defendant would have been bound only to exercise ordinary care toward such Wabash passengers to avert a collision. See Loudoun v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 162 N. Y. 380, 56 N. E. 988. It does not follow that because the Wabash Company may not have owed any duty to the plaintiff's intestate as a passenger that the defendant owed him no duty at all.

It may be conceded that if the decedent had been a trespasser upon the Wabash engine in the true sense of the term,—that is to say, a person who had forcibly introduced himself upon the engine against the will or without the knowledge of those in control,—neither the Wabash Company nor the defendant would have owed him any duty except to avoid the infliction of a wilful or wanton injury. As to all persons, however, whose presence upon the Wabash engine was sanctioned by those in charge of its operation, such presence is to be deemed lawful so far as third parties are concerned, and it was no concern of the defendant just what legal relation the plaintiff's intestate occupied toward the Wabash Company, so long as he was not a forcible or secret trespasser.

It cannot be held that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. The cases which impute contributory negligence to one who takes a comparatively perilous place upon a locomotive, instead of riding in a car provided for passengers, have no application here, where there is nothing to show that the peril to the deceased was in any wise augmented by any act of his in choosing a dangerous, rather than a safe, place in which to ride. The locomotive on the occasion of the collision was proceeding alone.

There is no other feature of the case which requires discussion. It was tried without any substantial error affecting the 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) result, and the judgment should therefore be affirmed, with costs.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

ABE GOLDSTEIN et al., Resp'ts.,

v.

PETER FOX SONS COMPANY, a partnership, App'ts.

(— N. D. —, 135 N. W. 180.)

Writ — service on partner — supposed corporation.

1. Where a summons wherein a defendant company was erroneously named as a corporation, when in fact it was a copartnership, was personally served within the state on a partner as the managing agent of the alleged corporation, it constitutes a valid service upon the partner and copartnership, sufficient to vest jurisdiction in the court to permit, on proper showing made, an amendment of the summons and complaint served, that the defendant company may be designated therein as a partnership with partners named.

Same — amendment.

2. Such service was not void, and the amendment so permitted did not thereby bring new parties defendant into the suit; but, instead, it was merely descriptive of the entity against whom the action was brought and upon whom service was made.

Same — jurisdiction — extent.

3. Such personal service upon a partner confers jurisdiction upon the court to enter judgment under § 6847, Rev. Codes, 1905, Headnotes by Goss, J.

Note. — Effect of erroneously describing defendant in process as a corporation instead of an individual or partnership, or vice versa.

This note does not discuss the question as to what is an erroneous description, but only sets out the effect of those descriptions that are clearly or admittedly erroneous. Cases of mere misnomer, without any mistake as to the character of the defendant, and cases merely involving the sufficiency of a description of defendant as a "company," without indicating whether it is a partnership or a corporation, are also excluded.

The question as to whether a partnership may sue or be sued in the firm name is discussed in the note to Spaulding Mfg. Co. v. Godbold, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 282; and the question of the validity of constructive service upon a partnership in the firm name is treated in the note to Ord v. Neiswanger, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 287.

Inquiry as to the effect of such misde-jointly against the partner served and all members of the partnership named; and, where property is in custodia legis by virtue of the levy of an attachment in the action, the court has authority under said statute to order that the property held be sold and applied in satisfaction of the judgment.

Jurisdiction — special appearance — effect.

4. Where the jurisdiction of the court over the person of the defendant is challenged, under a special appearance made pending the action and before judgment, the same is not a general appearance, and a judgment entered by default is valid.

Appeal — jurisdiction of trial court — review.

5. The question here presented going only to the jurisdiction of the court to enter the judgment sought to be vacated under a special appearance, this court will consider only the jurisdictional questions raised, and, on determining that the trial court had jurisdiction to enter the judgment, the decision of the trial court refusing to vacate the same is affirmed.

(Spalding, Ch. J., dissents.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Richland County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract to pay for a carload of potatoes which was entitled as against and the procscription of defendant as will be here considered necessarily leads to the question whether process carrying on its face such misdescription may be amended and corrected, since, if not amendable, it is null and void; but if amendable, the defect may be cured upon discovery of the true character of the defendant.

The effect given to such a misdescription usually depends upon the question whether it is interpreted as merely a misnomer or defect in the description, or whether it is deemed a substitution or entire change of party; in the former case an amendment will be allowed, in the latter it will not be allowed.

Describing defendant as corporation instead of partnership.

Generally, in the furtherance of justice, courts will permit the plaintiff to amend his process so as to charge defendant as a partnership instead of corporation, when the latter designation is erroneously given in the first instance, and when there is no corporation of that name; the error in such case is not that the wrong party is sued, but that he is misdescribed, the firm name being equally suited either to a corporation or to a partnership. There is no change of party, but the same individuals are still before the court. Anglo-American Packing & Provision Co. v. Turner Casing Co. 34 Kan. 340, 8 Pac. 403; Farmers' & M. Bank v. Bank of Glen Elder, 46 Kan. 376, 26 Pac. 680; Teets v. Snider Heading Mfg. Co. 120 Ky. 653, 87 S. W. 803; Standard Hay & Grain Co. v. Ratliff Bros. 144 Ky. 161, 137 S. W. 1035; Munzinger v. Courier Co. 82 Hun, 575, 31 N. Y. Supp. 737; Evoy v. Expressman's Aid Soc. 51 N. Y. S. R. 38, 21 N. Y. Supp. 641; Skoog v. New York Novelty Co. 4 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 144; Newton v. Milleville Mfg. Co. 17 Abb. Pr. 318, note; GOLDSTEIN v. PETER FOX SONS CO.

Especially will such an amendment be allowed where the defendant has appeared and filed an answer to the merits. Anglo-American Packing & Provision Co. v. Turner Casing Co. supra. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Or when the amended process is offered before an answer interposing a defense on the merits is filed. Teets v. Snider Heading Mfg. Co. 120 Ky. 653, 87 S. W. 803.

Or where such an erroneous summons is personally served within the state upon one of the partners as managing officer of the defendant. GOLDSTEIN v. PETER FOX SONS CO.

Or where the defendant answers and sets up a counterclaim. Standard Hay & Grain Co. v. Ratliff Bros. 144 Ky. 161, 137 S. W. 1035.

And in such a case, when the defendant sets up a counterclaim, judgment may properly be entered against it as a partnership, even though plaintiff fails to file an amended petition. Ibid.

And the application of this rule is not affected by the fact that the plaintiff might bring another action if the defective process were declared null and void; nor by the fact that another summons against the persons named as partners will be necessary. Teets v. Snider Heading Mfg. Co. supra.

And in case of such amendment, the names of the individual partners may be added. Anglo-American Packing & Provision Co. v. Turner Casing Co. 34 Kan. 340, 8 Pac. 403; Teets v. Snider Heading Mfg. Co. 120 Ky. 653, 87 S. W. 803; Evoy v. Expressmen's Aid Soc. 51 N. Y. S. R. 38, 21 N. Y. Supp. 641; Skoog v. New York Novelty Co. 4 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 144; Newton v. Milleville Mfg. Co. 17 Abb. Pr. 318, note; Blue Grass Canning Co. v. Wardman, 103 Tenn. 179, 52 S. W. 137.

But in some courts such a misdescription is interpreted not as bringing the right defendant into court under a wrong name, but as suing the wrong party, and in those jurisdictions an amendment to correct the defect is deemed as bringing in new parties, and is therefore not allowed. White Co. v. Fayette Automobile Co. 43 Pa. Super. Ct. 532.

And it has been said that a writ describing defendant as a corporation, when in fact it is a partnership, although it uses the correct firm name, runs against nobody, cess served upon defendants as a corporation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Purcell & Divet, for appellants:

A copartnership is not considered a person, and must sue and be sued by its members.

All partners must be joined as defendants in an action on a partnership obligation.

30 Cyc. 565, note 39; Rev. Codes, § 5842.

When new parties are brought in by amendment, it is as necessary to serve the amended process as it is to serve original process.

White v. Johnson, 27 Or. 282, 50 Am. St. Rep. 726, 40 Pac. 511; Shaw v. Cook, 78 N. Y. 194; Plemmons v. Southern Improv. Co. 108 N. C. 614, 13 S. E. 188; Powers v. Braly, 75 Cal. 237, 17 Pac. 197; Thompson v. Allen, 86 Mo. 85; Tom Boy Gold Mines Co. v. Green, 11 Colo. App. 447, 53 Pac. 845.

Service must be made in the manner prescribed, and failing in that, the fact that the process may actually come to the hands of the defendant, or he became possessed of full knowledge thereof, does not give jurisdiction.

Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. v. Keen-since there is no such defendant as the writ describes. Halbert v. Soule, 57 Vt. 358.

And in such a case, since there is no defendant, the writ cannot be amended by substituting a partnership with names of partners. Sawyer v. New York State Clothing Co. 58 Vt. 588, 2 Atl. 483.

Nor can it be amended by describing the defendant as an unincorporated society organized under the laws of the state, and composed of certain individuals named. Maisch v. Order of Americus, 223 Pa. 199, 72 Atl. 528.

The members of a company cannot be held liable as partners under a summons directed against the company as a corporation. Bartram H. & Co. v. Collins Mfg. Co. 69 Ga. 751.

Process directed against a company as a corporation, upon which a writ of garnishment issues, cannot later be amended so as to charge individuals as partners doing business under the firm name; this would be substituting new parties defendant; the amended complaint must be deemed the commencement of a new suit. Schiele v. Dillard, 94 Ark. 277, 126 S. W. 835.

And where a suit for libel is brought against a publishing company as a corporation, and after answer the pleadings lie dormant for more than the limitation period, and later, upon discovering that the defendant is unincorporated, plaintiff files an amended petition setting up the mistake and charging individuals as partners doing business under the firm name, those individuals may take advantage of the statute of limitations, for they were not brought into court by the original process, but are new parties to the action. Leatherman v. Times Co. 88 Ky. 291, 3 L.R.A. 324, 21 Am. St. Rep. 342, 11 S. W. 12.

Describing defendant as corporation instead of individual.

When a milling company is the entity being sued, the question whether its appellation in the complaint is that of a corporation, a partnership, or a name assumed by an individual, is a matter merely of description, and if the complaint originally describes defendant as a corporation, it may be amended by adding the name of an individual doing business under the company name, without changing parties to the suit, especially where the Code fixes the only limit to amendments which relate back to the commencement of the suit, "that they shall refer to the same transaction, property, and parties as the original," and adding that where this is not apparent on the averments of the pleading, it shall be a question for the jury. Manatee Mill. Co. v. Hobdy, 165 Ala. 411, 138 Am. St. Rep. 73, 51 So. 871.

Under a statute requiring the allowance of amendments to cure any defect of form or substance in attachment affidavits, bonds, and writs, a plaintiff is entitled to an amendment of those papers which originally erroneously described defendant as a corporation, so as to make them designate defendant as an individual doing business under that name and style; and if the court refuses to allow such amendments, a mandamus will issue directing their allowance; the mistake sought to be corrected is not as to the entity of the defendant, but merely as to the designation of the kind of entity; it is not a question of name, but of designation, the amendment serving only to give accuracy and certainty to it. Ex parte Nicrosi, 103 Ala. 104, 15 So. 507.

Process misdescribing defendant as a company, supposing it to be a corporation, may be amended by striking out the supposed corporate name, which represents no legal entity, and substituting the name of an individual already served as defendant; this is no substitution of parties, but simply a correction of a misnomer. Butler Hard Rubber Co. v. Solomon Toubé Co. 38 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 23, 2 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. 41.

But an amendment generally by striking out the name of the defendant importing a corporate character, and inserting in lieu thereof the names of individuals as defendants, is not authorized either by the Code or by adjudged cases; such an amendment would result in the continuance of the action against other and different parties, and is not allowable. Where a suit is brought against individual directors of a school district, naming them, but also describing them as a body politic and corporate, and giving the corporate name, their individual names will be considered as surplusage, and the suit is well brought against the corporation, and is not bad as being brought against the individual directors. Botkin v. Osborne, 39 Ill. 101.

But in Illinois State Hospital v. Higgins, 15 Ill. 185, it is said that a suit against a corporate body should be brought against the corporation, and not against the individuals incorporated by the common appellation.

A complaint against "the X Lumber Company, a firm composed of A & B, individually," may be amended to read against "the X Lumber Company, a corporation organized, etc.," for the party sued is the X Lumber Company, and the words stricken out and those added are merely descriptive. But a summons and complaint naming as party defendant individuals as doing business under a firm name cannot be amended by striking out their names and substituting the firm as a corporation; such an amendment would in effect strike out the only parties sued, and add an entirely new party defendant, for, as originally written, the words "doing business as" a firm are merely descriptio personarum, and therefore immaterial. Goss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The summons and complaint was issued November 6, 1908, with an attachment, in an action by these plaintiffs against the defendant company, designated as the Peter Fox Sons Company, a corporation, instead of against a copartnership with members named, as now entitled. A car of poultry was attached November 9th, and personal service of summons, complaint, warrant of attachment, and notice of levy was then made at Hankinson upon Anthony Fox, one of the copartners. The defendant company was named as a corporation, and service upon it was attempted to be made by such personal service upon Anthony Fox as its managing officer, then within the state, and alleged to be in charge of the poultry attached. The provisional remedy was issued; and no question of the regularity of the levy or attachment proceedings is raised other than the right of the court to permit the amendment made to all the pleadings and files, so the action is now entitled against a partnership, defendant, with copartners named. On the thirtieth day after such levy and personal service upon Anthony Fox, and while the action was pending against the company named as a corporation, the many Foxes as members of the partnership entered, by their attorneys, a special appearance in the action brought against the alleged corporation. Therein they recited that they are "appearing specially for the purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court, and for no other purpose, and move the court for an order setting aside the service of summons herein and dismissing this action." With the motion as a part thereof, made under special appearance, was a notice of hearing thereon set for January 5, 1909; supporting the motion were affidavits of Frank Fox and Joseph Fox, wherein they aver that the Peter Fox Sons Company is not a corporation, but a partnership, consisting of eight partners named Fox; and that no service has been made upon them, except the service of the summons upon Anthony Fox as an officer, agent, or representative of the Peter Fox Sons Company charged as a corporation; and that all members of said partnership are residents of Chicago, and there engaged in the commission business. A continuance of the hearing on the motion was had under agreement between counsel and the court until January 19th, when it was further continued to be taken up at the convenience of the court and counsel. To that date no general appearance had been made by the attorneys for these appellants.

On December 19th, without notice, upon porate capacity; such an amendment would change entirely the nature of the action. Shuler v. Meyers, 5 Lans. 170.

Miscellaneous.

Where an account is against a corporation, but the summons in the action upon the account runs against the superintendent of the corporation, and the judgment first rendered against him is on motion amended so as to be against the corporation, on appeal the amendment will be presumed to be correct, especially when it is shown that the corporation appeared, and the objection that it was not the real defendant was not raised until after verdict. Shorter University v. Franklin, 75 Ark. 571, 88 S. W. 587, opinion on rehearing 75 Ark. 573, 88 S. W. 974.

When suit is brought by one corporation against another corporation, it is error for the magistrate to issue the summons in the names of the individual members composing the corporations; and to render judgment against the individual members of the defendant corporation; but the individual names may be stricken out of the record and the cause may proceed in the corporate names. Campbell v. Brunk, 25 Ill. 225. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Where a state brought action for franchise taxes against a waterworks company as a corporation, and defendant demurred for want of jurisdiction, and set up that it was never incorporated, and where the city owned the company and chose the officers who made the report upon which the tax was based, it was proper for the state to amend its petition by making the city a party defendant, and the original petition and the amendment may be considered together as an original petition against the city, since the latter appeared without reservation; the mistake was in the name of the party upon whom liability rested as the owner of the property. Newport v. Com. 106 Ky. 434, 45 L.R.A. 518, 50 S. W. 845, 51 S. W. 433.

Where a petition describes defendant as a corporation, and the answer denies the fact of incorporation, and there is no proof offered on that issue, plaintiff should not recover, for if defendant is a partnership the proceeding is defective, and the burden is on the plaintiff to prove defendant a corporation. Pike, M. & Co. v. Wathen, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1264, 78 S. W. 137.

a showing by affidavits, plaintiffs moved the court to amend all the pleadings nunc pro tunc to read as now entitled. And on December 21st, and while the motion to set aside the service was pending, the motion to amend nunc pro tunc was granted, and all pleadings and files amended accordingly, as of the date of the commencement of the suit, November 6, 1908; and a new complaint was filed so entitled, wherein the copartnership relation of defendants was pleaded. All this was without notice to opposing counsel, who had appeared on the motion to dismiss made under special appearance. Thereafter, and on January 19th, seventy-four days after this issuance of the attachment, and more than sixty days from its levy, defendants being in default in general appearance, on proof thereof by affidavit and on proof on the merits submitted, the court entered findings of fact and conclusions of law under which, on January 20, 1909, a judgment was entered in favor of plaintiffs and against defendants jointly, adjudging the sale of the personal property levied upon; that its proceeds should be applied in satisfaction of such judgment and costs.

Immediately after the entry of this judgment, on affidavits and under a special appearance, an order to show cause was applied for and issued. It briefly recited the proceedings had and the pendency of the prior motion under special appearance, and cited plaintiffs to show cause forthwith why the service of the summons, the judgment entered, and all other proceedings had, should not be vacated and set aside and the action be dismissed. In applying for this order to show cause, defendants endeavored to avoid making a general appearance. Their motion was: "Come now the above-named defendants, appearing specially for the purpose of this motion and none other, objecting to the jurisdiction of the court, and move the court for an order setting aside and vacating the service of summons herein, and vacating and setting aside the judgment heretofore entered herein against the defendants, and vacating and setting aside all proceedings heretofore had herein." On the return of the order to show cause the court, on February 10, 1909, denied the motion, thereby refusing to vacate the judgment or dismiss the action. Appellants appeal therefrom, assigning error sufficient to require a review of these entire proceedings.

A discussion of jurisdictional principles is now in order. Jurisdiction to issue the provisional remedy of attachment upon compliance with the statutory requisites was vested in the court by statute. A summons was issued, regular on its face, accompanied with a verified complaint and affidavit and undertaking for attachment, and upon their presentation the clerk issued from the court a warrant of attachment for service by levy thereunder, as provided by law, and the property of the defendant, the Peter Fox Sons Company, was levied upon under the supposition that such company was in fact, as designated, a corporation. Whether the defendant was a corporate entity, existing as such by law, or whether instead it was a contractual entity, a partnership made up of various natural persons, is, so far as the validity of the provisional remedy is concerned, of no consequence. The warrant and proceedings had thereon, being regular, were valid until set aside. The court had jurisdiction of the general subject-matter, and had acquired, under a valid levy, possession of property upon which it could proceed in rem, regardless of whether it ever procured personal service upon the defendant named in the process, it having power to proceed against such defendant by substitute service by the publication of summons. This power existed by virtue of the property so obtained under the levy. To that extent for sixty days after the issuance of the warrant of attachment, by force of statute (§ 6950, Rev. Codes 1905), a quasi or conditional jurisdiction remained in the court, for which purpose, under § 6850, Rev. Codes, 1905, from the time of "the allowance of a provisional remedy, the court is deemed to have acquired jurisdiction and to have control of all the subsequent proceedings." The proceedings had, then, even though designated as against a corporation which in fact was nonexistent, were valid, and clothed the court with jurisdiction to such an extent as might be necessary for it to control subsequent proceedings, including the property levied upon. And the writ, being valid, likewise protected the officer in his levy. While life was remaining in the proceedings had by provisional remedy, jurisdiction was thereby conferred upon the court to amend any process or pleadings by changing as it did the designation of the defendant from a corporation to a copartnership with individual members named. Such amendment could be made, subject, of course, to attack by motion for any irregularity existing. But until so attacked, the warrant and proceedings had thereon were valid, and thereby kept in the court the jurisdiction it possessed by virtue of the warrant of attachment issued and the levy had, pending the service of the summons. But such authority failed before entry of judgment and on the expiration of the sixty-day period prescribed by § 6940, Rev. Codes 1905, without service of summons or a first publication thereof, unless it be that the service attempted by the delivery of the summons and other papers to Anthony Fox was a valid service, conferring thereby jurisdiction upon the court of the person served, be it corporation or members of partnership.

What, then, was the effect of such service where the summons was directed against the Peter Fox Sons Company, a corporation, as defendant, when in fact the Peter Fox Sons Company existed, not as a corporation, but as a partnership, and the person upon whom such summons was served, instead of being the supposed managing agent of the corporation, was a member of such copartnership? Was such service a valid service, or was it void? If void, it was no service, and the court could thereon base no jurisdiction. But if the service was merely defective, and as such subject to some attack thereon, it was valid until attacked, and necessarily conferred jurisdiction upon the court of the person served. And who was served? Certainly not something having no existence. Nor was it a corporation that was sought to be reached and brought before the court, but instead it was "the Peter Fox Sons Company," who had dealt with and had become liable to these plaintiffs. And in this connection, under the affidavits filed against the granting of the order to show cause, it appears that this Peter Fox Sons Company had placed in circulation cards describing their business, carefully refraining from stating what they were, and, upon inquiry made to Anthony Fox by the attorney of record for plaintiffs, prior to suit, that he might know whether to sue it as a partnership or corporation, this party, bearing the appropriate cognomen of Fox, informed him that the Peter Fox Sons Company was a corporation. Taking the moving affidavits of this company as true, such statement must have been false, and whether it was made to enable defendant company to urge the contention now before us, or on the contrary made without reference to any action to be brought, it is unnecessary to ascertain. Granting the falsity of such statement and plaintiffs' reliance thereon, it is unnecessary to determine the real intent underlying the falsehood. This managing officer of the company, when served with summons, knew it was the Peter Fox Sons Company, a partnership, that was served, as he well did the impossibility of serving a nonexistent corporation, by mistake or misapprehension so designated. As is well said in Ex parte Nicrosi, 103 Ala. 104, 15 So. 507, an action wherein a person doing business under a company name was served with a summons designating the company name as a corporation, the court holds the term "corporation" to be merely descriptive of a named defendant, and not a part of the name itself. The reasoning of the court is as conclusive as it is unanswerable on the question before us. We quote from the opinion: "It is clear that the Roswald Grocery Company, whatever it was, whether a partnership, a corporation, or an individual, assuming the name for the purposes of trade, was the party against whom or which suit was instituted, has all along been prosecuted, and will be continued if and after the amendments moved for are allowed. There is, in other words, no question here as to the identity of the defendant throughout all the proceedings which have been or may, in any proposed event, be had, being originally and at all times the same in the mind of the plaintiff. The entity which entered into the original contract, which has enjoyed the shelter of plaintiff's house, which has failed to pay the agreed price therefor, and which is sought, in this action, to be coerced into payment thereof, is one and the same, whether it be a contractual entity (a partnership), an artificial entity (a corporation), or a personal entity (an individual); and, whether one or another of these entities, its name is the same,—the Roswald Grocery Company,—and its liability is the same and enforceable by the same remedies. That entity, whatever its character or the source or manner of its being, was proceeded against originally in this case, and brought before the court by attachment of its property. Once there, it was found that a mistake had been made not as to the entity itself,—not as to the party sued,—but merely in respect of describing what kind of an entity the party defendant was. The motion to amend stated and confessed this mistake of description. The plaintiff averred and showed this mistake, and he asked to correct it. He, in effect, said to the court that, while he had sued the proper party, and had levied on the goods of the proper party, he had misdescribed that party, not, indeed, in respect even of the name of the defendant, but in respect solely of the status of that proper party as being an artificial, instead of a personal, entity; for surely the averment that the Roswald Grocery Company was a corporation is no part of the name of that company. It might as well be said that to aver that Jones & Smith is a partnership is to make the averment of partnership a part of the name 'Jones & Smith;' or that to sue 'John Smith, a man,' is to make the defendant's name not 'John Smith only, but 'John Smith a man.' And to omit such averments, no more changes the name of the corporation than of the partnership or the individual. It is not a question of name; . . . but it is a matter of description, a change of which does not affect the identity of the party sought to be described, but only gives accuracy and certainty to it. The case of Western R. Co. v. Sistrunk, 85 Ala. 356, 5 So. 79, is, on principle, in point. The averment that a defendant is a corporation is there held to be descriptive of a named defendant, and not a part of the name itself; and that, where this description had been omitted, it might be added without offense to the limitations upon our very broad statutes of amendments. Its addition did not change the party sued. Being merely descriptive when it is at first stated by mistake, it is not conceivable how its elimination could make of that thing which it was incorrectly supposed to describe a different thing. To add it does not change the name, being no part of the name; and, it being already stated, to strike it out cannot. Being stricken out in this case, the suit is against the Roswald Grocery Company. The further amendment is that this company is Esther Roswald, and that she is engaged in business, rented this house, executed these notes, and owes this debt under the name, and style of 'the Roswald Grocery Company.' . . . The amendments should have been allowed. We feel that a different conclusion would be to emasculate our very liberal and to be liberally construed statute on the subject, which requires the allowance of amendments to cure 'any defect of form or substance.'"

And in this connection we have, in § 6883, Rev. Codes 1905, a similar statute, reading: "The court may, before or after judgment, in furtherance of justice, and on such terms as may be proper, amend any pleading, process, or proceeding, by adding or striking out the name of any party, or by correcting a mistake in the name of a party, or a mistake in any other respect, or by inserting other allegations material to the case, or, when the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense, by conforming the pleading or proceeding to the facts proved."

The foregoing leaves but little to add. Defendant will contend that such an amendment is in reality bringing in new parties to the suit, and therefore, if permissible, service of summons upon such new parties is necessary, citing thereunder White v. Johnson, 27 Or. 282, 40 Pac. 511, 50 Am. St. Rep. 726, and note thereto, and similar holdings. If the amendment here permitted amounted to the bringing in of new parties, counsel's contention would be supported by the weight of authority, but it does not substitute a new for the old party. It merely makes definite the character of the real party sued, the necessity for the knowledge concerning which, besides being proper for the sake of certainty, is that the court may order the appropriate judgment in form and comply with the statute in such respect. See Western R. Co. v. Sistrunk, 85 Ala. 352, 5 So. 79, above referred to, holding: "An amendment to a complaint and summons, showing that the defendant is a body corporate and is sued in its corporate capacity, does not operate to substitute a new party defendant." Consult also Nisbet v. Clio Min. Co. 2 Cal. App. 436, 83 Pac. 1077, wherein defendant was sued as the Clio Mining & Milling Company, a corporation. Two corporations existed; one the Clio Mining Company, and the other the Clio Mining & Milling Company as named, which latter company attempted to defend because of misnomer for the mining company intended to be sued and upon whom service of summons was made. An amendment was permitted, and the action continued as against the real company concerned, although erroneously named as the other corporation. Thereon the court says: "Under the circumstances disclosed by this record, it would be sticking in the bark, and sacrificing substance for shadow, to lay down the technical rule that the plaintiff was stripped of the privilege or right to amend his pleading by the voluntary appearance of the Clio Mining & Milling Company in an action plainly brought against another corporation of a similar name, but different residence. . . .

In the case at bar the body of the complaint clearly indicated that the intention was to sue the Clio Mining Company and recover upon its debt, and parties appearing in that action could not close their eyes to substantial facts and rely upon mere technical omissions in the caption or title of the cause,"—citing Anglo-American Packing & Provision Co. v. Turner Casing Co. 34 Kan. 340, 8 Pac. 403. In Stowers Furniture Co. v. Brake, 158 Ala. 639, 48 So. 89, it is held that "where the complaint did not show whether the defendant company was a partnership or a corporation, it was properly amended to show that it was a corporation,"—in line with Gans v. Beasley, 4 N. D. 140, 59 N. W. 714, where, as in this case, service was attacked under a special appearance. But the opposite contention was urged in Gans v. Beasley, that the summons was addressed to no person, and that no person was required to answer, and that the court obtained jurisdiction of no person by the service. Amendment nunc pro tunc was had as in this case. The court says: "An attempt was made to describe the defendants in the original summons, but such description was imperfect inasmuch as it gave only their firm name, and did not give the full Christian and surnames of the individual members of the firm, as good practice requires." The amendment was held proper, that the right to amend "as to names of parties exists where the amendment does not operate to the prejudice of the parties, and does operate in furtherance of justice. But the right to amend must be qualified so as to forbid an amendment which effects an actual change of parties." This decision in 1894 placed our state in line with the more recent authorities, that the service of a summons containing a misnomer, but where served upon the party to the suit, confers jurisdiction; and, having the right, the court may, in its discretion, permit an amendment in the designation of the party litigant. Newton v. Melville Mfg. Co. 17 Abb. Pr. 318, note, and Skoog v. New York Novelty Co. 4 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 144, hold that where persons doing business under the name of the New York Novelty Company, were served with summons in that name, a motion to amend the summons by inserting the names of such persons as defendants should be granted, if there was no corporation by that name, though the complaint alleged that it was such corporation.

See also Hathaway v. Sabin, 61 Vt. 608, 18 Atl. 188; Messler v. Schwarzkopf, 35 Misc. 72, 71 N. Y. Supp. 241; York v. Nash, 42 Or. 321, 71 Pac. 59; and Baldock v. Atwood, 21 Or. 73, 26 Pac. 1058. See also 30 Cyc. 144: "Under the Codes and practice acts of the several states, much latitude is now permitted with regard to amendments affecting parties, and it is usual that the court be permitted, on motion of either party at any time, in furtherance of justice and on such terms as may be proper, to permit an amendment adding or striking out the name of a party, or correcting a mistake in the name of a party, or changing the character in which he is sued." And 31 Cyc. 487, that "as a general rule, under the statutes, a misnomer of a plaintiff or defendant is amendable unless the amendment is such as to effect an entire change of parties. But where the right corporation has been sued by the wrong name, and service has been made upon the right party, although by a wrong name, an amendment substituting the true name of the corporation may be permitted." And the same authority, on page 489, that "an amendment charging defendant as a partnership instead of as a corporation may be allowed, and the converse, has been held. Likewise it has been held that, where an action is brought by plaintiffs as copartners instead of as a corporation, through a mistake of facts concerning their incorporation, they may be permitted to amend by making the corporation plaintiff,"—citing Farmers' & M. Bank v. Bank of Glen Elder, 46 Kan. 376, 28 Pac. 680; Anglo-American Packing & Provision Co. v. Turner Casing Co. 34 Kan. 340, 8 Pac. 403; Teets v. Snider Heading Mfg. Co. 120 Ky. 653, 87 S. W. 803; Haggarty v. Strong, 10 S. D. 585, 74 N. W. 1037. See also 38 Century Dig. cols. 1177 et seq., and 40 Century Dig. cols. 2789 et seq.; 15 Dec. Dig. secs. 94, 95, et seq. See 19 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 573, where it is stated that "it is the general rule that, where parties have been once brought under the jurisdiction of the court, such jurisdiction can be lost only by actual dismissal of the action, and amendments of the pleadings will not require a new service of process."

In many of the foregoing cited cases, the defendant, misnamed, has appeared generally and sought an advantage because of such misnomer, by answer, plea in abatement, or motion invoking the jurisdiction generally of the court; and, to such extent, the additional reason why jurisdiction should be sustained, that the defendant submitted to the jurisdiction of the court, existed over that here found. But authorities hold that under a statute similar to § 6883, Rev. Codes 1905, once jurisdiction attaches, the authority of the court is ample to correct a mistake in name or designation of the party sued. The authorities are practically unanimous in holding with the Alabama case quoted, that the designation of the defendant as a corporation or partnership does not thereby conclude the court from permitting an amendment to the process or pleading that the same shall describe the legal entity of the real party, whether person, partnership, or corporation. Where the correct person, either natural or artificial, is served in an action brought against it on a cause of action existing, when it is erroneously named, jurisdiction is conferred upon service made upon it, and, having jurisdiction, power exists to amend in furtherance of justice to conform to the fact.

Defendants contend that the service made upon Anthony Fox was under a supposition that a corporation was being served, and that he served as an officer of a corporation, and knowing that such substitute service was made for such purpose, and that no corporation existed, and that no valid proceeding could be had against it, he had the right to ignore, as he did, such service: and that plaintiff could not thereunder, to his prejudice, change by amendment the action to constitute one against a partnership of which he was a member, and thereby bind him or any members of the partnership individually by such service. This reasoning overlooks the fact that the Peter Fox Sons Company is the defendant, by whatever name it may exist, and Anthony Fox, personally, and through him his copartners, were charged with notice of the pendency of this suit and the knowledge of the law; and that thereunder an amendment was permissible that the suit might continue against the members of the partnership jointly, obedient to § 6847, Rev. Codes 1905, that, "when the action is against two or more defendants, and the summons is served on one or more, but not on all, of them, the plaintiff may proceed as follows: (1) If the action is against defendants jointly indebted upon contract, he may proceed against the defendant served, unless the court otherwise directs; and if he recovers judgment, it may be entered against all the defendants thus jointly indebted, so far only as that it may be enforced against the joint property of all and the separate property of the defendants served; and if they are subject to arrest, against the persons of the defendants served; or (2) if the action is against defendants severally liable, he may proceed against the defendants served in the same manner as if they were the only defendants." Under this statute the court, having had power to amend after personal service upon one member of the partnership, had jurisdiction to order a joint or joint and several judgment against such person; and where the property in custodia legis was the joint property of the several partners, one of whom was served, the court properly ordered a joint judgment in so far as it was necessary to enforce the same against the joint property.

In reaching our conclusions we have not overlooked the following cases, in part holding the contrary, and to that extent against what we believe to be the weight of authority. Leatherman v. Times Co. 88 Ky. 291, 3 L.R.A. 324, 21 Am. St. Rep. 342, 11 S. W. 12; Basett v. Fish, 75 N. Y. 303; New York State Monitor Milk Pan Assn. v. Remington Agri. Works, 89 N. Y. 22; which last case, in an unsatisfactory per curiam opinion, without citation of authority, reverses the same case in 25 Hun, 475. The Kentucky case tries to discriminate its holding from Heckman v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 9 Ky. L. Rep. 297, 4 S. W. 342, supporting our conclusions herein.

Nor do the following, cited in appellants' brief, apply or announce any rule inconsistent with our holding: Powers v. Braly, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

75 Cal. 237, 17 Pac. 197; Plemmons v. Southern Improv. Co. 108 N. C. 614, 13 S. E. 188, and Thompson v. Allen, 86 Mo. 85, to the effect that, on the bringing in of a new defendant, service must be had upon him before further proceedings be taken. As heretofore stated, the amendment permitted brought in no new party, but merely permitted a change in description of the entity of the Peter Fox Sons Company, the defendant. While said partnership could not at common law be proceeded against as a legal entity without the partners being named, yet it was sued under its firm name with service upon one partner, and jurisdiction was thereby conferred upon the court of the Peter Fox Sons Company, in whatever capacity it might exist; and, having such jurisdiction of it, the amendment allowed, designating its individual members, was not in fact bringing in new defendants. Had it been sued as a partnership, with partners named, and service been made upon Anthony Fox, one of them, no question could be raised but that the court could render the judgment entered. With the same facts existing, but without designation of corporate entity or naming of partners, under Gans v. Beasley, 4 N. D. 140, 59 N. W. 714, the same thing here done, and the same judgment here entered, would necessarily have to be sustained. The erroneous designation of the defendant company as a corporation certainly could not defeat jurisdiction when under such holding a failure to characterize the entity sued does not.

The appellants, throughout this proceeding, have acted on the theory that no general appearance has been made. Their every act has been performed under a special appearance, although they have thereunder procured by the issuance of an order to show cause by the court, and, upon the service thereof and appearance of opposing parties thereunder, have participated in the hearing called by the court. Whether so doing would be considered as an appearance generally, or an appearance under the special appearance made to invoke the court to issue the order, we do not determine, as it is not necessary to do so. We have assumed that no general appearance herein has been made in law. The order to show cause is general in its terms, and the party is cited to respond to proceedings other than those sought under the special appearance. Whether the participation in the determination of these matters, on the return of the order, is a waiver of the special appearance made, we do not decide. The weight of authority is that the invoking of the power of the court to determine more than the question of the jurisdiction of the person is a submission of the person to the jurisdiction; or, in other words, one cannot, by motion under special appearance, challenge, in effect, as by demurrer, the right of the court to entertain the subject-matter or act thereon, without submitting jurisdiction of the person as fully as though the same matter had been challenged by demurrer, even though the whole proceeding be attempted under a special appearance.

Following appellant's theory of the case and consonant with his assignments of error, we do not pass upon whether the court abused its discretion in entering this judgment with the motion pending before it; nor do we treat the application other than as one solely of jurisdiction in the lower court to enter the judgment. As defendant there challenged only the jurisdiction, and that was there, as here, determined adversely to him, it was in no sense there, and is not here, to be treated as an application to vacate the judgment on other than strictly jurisdictional grounds.

Therefore our conclusion is that the service of this summons was not a void act, but instead clothed the court with jurisdiction over the Peter Fox Sons Company, whatever its legal status was; and possessing jurisdiction by attachment of the property, and with the personal service on Anthony Fox, having jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter, the court could permit the amendment as made, the defendant being wholly in default; that the effect of such amendment was not to substitute or bring in new parties defendant, but merely to establish the identity of the true party sued and served; and hence service of the amended or a new summons and amended pleadings was unnecessary, the court retaining jurisdiction by the service had, and with authority, under § 6847, Rev. Codes 1905, thereunder to enter judgment, as it did, and which judgment was and is valid; and vacation of the judgment being sought on jurisdictional grounds only, the findings of its validity is the equivalent to a denial of the application to vacate it.

Accordingly, the judgment appealed from is affirmed, with costs.

TAL MILLWEE et al.

(31 Okla. 620, 122 Pac. 173.)

Voter—restraining election.

1. A court of equity has no jurisdiction to restrain the holding of an election, since the right involved is a political one.

Party—restraining election—interest of taxpayers.

2. A taxpayer has not such an interest in a suit to enjoin the holding of an election to recall the mayor of a city of the first class in pursuance to the provisions of its charter, as will entitle him to prosecute such suit as a complainant.

(March 12, 1912.)

Note.—Interference by equity with matters preceding election.

This note supplements the earlier note appended to Shoemaker v. Des Moines, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 382.

As to the right of a taxpayer in the absence of statute to enjoin the payment of election expenses by a municipality, see subdivision VII. of the note in 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1.

As to mandamus to compel election officers to act after they have met and adjourned, see the note in 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1089.

Political matters—generally.

The later cases, like those in the earlier note, take the position that equity will not interfere in matters preceding elections where the controversy is merely a political one, there being no property rights involved. One case, however, makes a distinction between enjoining the election itself, and merely interfering with its preliminary steps.

The Kansas supreme court points out that many of the decisions holding that courts of equity will not enjoin an election are from courts where the distinction between courts of law and equity are still preserved, and that they proceed upon the theory that equity has no jurisdiction of matters which do not affect rights of property, and therefore will take no cognizance of injuries affecting mere political rights. Duggan v. Emporia, 84 Kan. 429, 114 Pac. 235, Ann. Cas. 1912 A. 719. The court, however, says arguendo that since the distinction between courts of law and equity no longer exist in Kansas, and since the courts would not hesitate to compel by mandamus a county clerk to place the name of a candidate upon a ballot, no good reason appears why the same court should not, at the suit of proper parties and upon sufficient grounds, enjoin the clerk from placing the name of the candidate thereon. However, with respect to enjoining the election itself, the court said that it could conceive of no condition where a court of equity would be justified in enjoining the calling and holding of an election, and that certainly it should never do so because of mere irregularities. The specific holding in the case was that a city should not, at the suit of a taxpayer, be enjoined from submitting to its electors, under an initiative and referendum statute, a proposed ordi-

ERROR to the District Court for Pittsburg County to review a judgment in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to enjoin the holding of an election for the recall of the mayor. Reversed.

Kane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit in equity commenced by nance authorizing the city to lease or sell its electric light plant, either because such leasing or selling was ultra vires, or because the ordinance was void for noncompliance with prescribed formalities, or because it was contended that the proposed consideration for the lease or sale was inadequate. The reasons were, among others, that it did not appear that the taxpayer would suffer injuries as a consequence of holding the election; that to grant the relief would be to enjoin legislation which the court had no power to do; and that the court would not anticipate that the city would attempt to lease or sell the plant.

Equity will not enjoin the holding of an election in response to the petition of an elector who is a mere volunteer, upon the ground that the act under which the election is proposed to be held is unconstitutional, at least where he fails to show that the election, if held, will result in damage to himself. Jones v. Black, 48 Ala. 540. The controlling reason of the court is that while courts have the undoubted power to declare a statute unconstitutional, it is a delicate power which should be exercised only when the exigencies of a particular case require it, and that equity will not take jurisdiction for the sole purpose of determining the constitutional question, and especially at the suit of one whose rights it does not especially affect.

Coincidentally with a statement in Dugan v. Emporia, supra, the Louisiana court holds that the possibility of an affirmative vote in an election to decide upon whether a certain tax shall be levied, is too remote and contingent to form the basis of a taxpayer's suit to enjoin the holding of the election upon the alleged ground that the act authorizing it is unconstitutional. Roudanez v. New Orleans, 29 La. Ann. 271. This decision was approved in a subsequent case holding that in view of the possibility of a negative vote in an election on the question of the creation of a new parish, equity will not enjoin the election upon the ground that the statute authorizing it is unconstitutional because the constitutional limit of representation has already been reached, and because the statute provides that the result should be determined by a majority of the votes cast, whereas the state Constitution requires a two-thirds vote. Dubuisson v. Election Supers. 123 La. 443, 49 So. 15, following Roudanez v. New Orleans.

In Mann v. County Ct. 58 W. Va. 651, 52 S. E. 776, an injunction at the suit of a citizen against an election was denied, where the petitioner showed no special interest in respect of which he would suffer a special injury, it being held insufficient that the community in which he resided might be injuriously affected thereby. In reaching this conclusion, the court said not only that the power to call a special election was legislative or governmental in its nature, so as to preclude equity from interfering unless there was special injury, but also that it was of a political nature, which was entirely foreign to the ordinary jurisdiction of equity.

Inclining to the view that elections are not to be subjected to judicial interference, the court in Gibbs v. McIntosh, 78 Miss. 648, 29 So. 465, held it error for the chancellor to interfere, by a writ of supersedeas, with a local option election upon the ground that there was illegality in the preliminary proceeding, and that the election if held would be invalid. While approving the statement in this case that it is not the policy of the state to have elections and other political matters of government reserved to legislative discretion, interfered with by the judicial department, the Mississippi court intimates that the rule is not absolute, by declaring in Conner v. Gray, 88 Miss. 489, 41 So. 186, 9 Ann. Cas. 120, that the judiciary will interfere only where the legislature has not the power to authorize the holding of an election under the Constitution, or where, having the power, it has exercised it in a way which is in plain violation of the state Constitution; but that in both instances it must appear from the act itself that it is unconstitutional. Applying this rule, the court holds that an

the defendants in error, plaintiffs below, against the plaintiffs in error, defendants below, for the purpose of enjoining the proper officer or officers of the city of McAlester from calling an election for the purpose of submitting to the electors of said city the question whether the mayor of said city should be recalled. Plaintiffs alleged that they are voters and taxpayers of said city, and that they and each of them are owners of property in said city, and the same has been assessed for taxation for the year 1911; that they are liable for their proportionate share of all public expenses incurred by said city; that the sections of the charter of said city which provide for the recall of city officers are unconstitutional and void, for several reasons, which are fully set out, and for said reasons said defendants are without authority to call said election; that, if same is called, it will be illegal, void, and without any effect whatever; that to hold same would occasion a great expense and outlay of public money of the city of McAlester, their due proportion of which plaintiffs would be compelled to pay. All of which would occasion plaintiffs an irreparable injury, for which they are without an adequate remedy at law. Wherefore they pray that the election shall be enjoined. Upon final hearing, the peremptory writ of injunction was issued by the court below upon the ground that the contention of the plaintiffs as to the unconstitutionality of said charter election proposed to be held in a new county formed by the legislature will not be enjoined at the suit of a taxpayer upon the ground that the holding of the election will create additional expense on taxpayers; nor at the suit of an officeholder in one of the old counties, upon the ground that his term of office will be shortened by reason of his residence in the territory which formed the new county.

An election (on the matter of building a new schoolhouse) will not be enjoined at the suit of residents, voters and taxpayers, because such election may be void, the remedy in the case of a void election being an injunction to restrain the carrying out of any propositions voted for. Thompson v. Mahoney, 136 Ill. App. 403. In this case the court said: "The attempt to check the free expression of opinion, to forbid the peaceable assemblage of the people, to obstruct the freedom of elections, if successful, would result in the overthrow of all liberty regulated by law. The mere effort to assume such power is dangerous to the rights of the citizen. . . . The principle which would authorize the mighty mandate of a court of chancery in this case would justify it in every election to be held by the people, and thus the whole administration of the government might be obstructed and all power and authority placed at the footstool of the judge." See, however, De Kalb County v. Atlanta, 132 Ga. 727, 65 S. E. 72, infra.

So, an injunction will not issue against an election to determine whether a part of a county shall be incorporated as a town, after all of the statutory prerequisites have been complied with,—either upon the assumption that the incorporation will result in unbearable financial burdens, since equity will not interpose to prevent an individual from doing a foolish act at his own expense, or upon the contention that there will be illegal voting, for equity does not interfere to prevent the perpetration of a crime, the remedy being by punishment after it has been committed. Guebelle v. Epley, 1 Colo. App. 199, 28 Pac. 89.

Election, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 71, that equity should not intervene under extraordinary power to prevent an election, unless the public interests involved were of the most serious character and when its failure to act promptly would be attended with the greatest injury to the public, and that therefore an injunction against an election to fill a vacancy would not be granted upon an ex parte application, upon the ground merely that the proposed election was premature.

It is held in Meacham v. Young, 115 Ky. 246, 72 S. W. 1094, that the calling of a primary is a party matter to be determined by the party authorities, and that the court has no more power to interfere with their action than it would have to enjoin a regular election.

Citing McALESTER v. MILLWEE, the Oklahoma court subsequently held that equity has no jurisdiction to restrain the holding of an election, since the right involved is a political one. Copeland v. Olamith, — Okla. —, 124 Pac. 33.

[Attention is also directed to Cozart v. Fleming, 123 N. C. 547, 31 S. E. 822, holding that, incidentally to a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto between candidates who received a tie vote for an office, an injunction against declaring the office vacant and holding a new election will be granted pending a trial of the issue.]

Where, however, a proposed election is wholly unauthorized, and it appears that if held it may result in a multiplicity of suits, or unlawfully subject the taxpayers to expense without their consent, equity will interfere.

But, thus it is held in Georgia that a county (and one of its taxpayers) a part of whose territory has been added to a city, which was previously located entirely in an adjoining county, may have an injunction against an election to determine in which of the two counties the city shall have its situs, where such election is proposed to be held under an ordinance which is invalid because enacted under the erroneous supposition that it was authorized by statute. DeKalb County v. Atlanta, supra. The was well taken, to reverse which this proceeding in error was commenced.

Counsel for the respective parties seem to have refrained from presenting to this court the question whether the parties plaintiff below as taxpayers had such an interest in the subject-matter of the suit as to entitle them to prosecute the same, and whether a suit in equity will lie to enjoin the calling of an election. They say that, whilst the first of these contentions may be made upon authority, they are so anxious to have this court pass upon the case upon its merits that they do not wish to urge that question in this court. The court does not take that view of the matter; we think it is time enough to pass upon such important questions when they are reached in due course, with proper parties, in a proper proceeding. Many applications have been made to this court to interfere with the holding of elections of one kind or another by the exercise of some of the high prerogative writs over which original jurisdiction has been vested in this court by the Constitution; so far as we are aware, relief of that kind has been consistently refused, and whilst the applications have never reached the stage where it became necessary to hand down a written opinion. As the question is jurisdictional, we cannot overlook the uniform practice merely because counsel do not wish to make that point. Courts of equity are only conversant with matters of property and the maintenance of civil rights, and will not court recognized that, generally speaking, the holding of an election is a political matter, and will not be enjoined, but said that an election of the character involved in this case presented quite a different question. "If the city of Atlanta," said the court, "and its officers, have no lawful authority to call or hold an election for the purpose of changing a county line; and if the result of the election, when held, cannot lawfully be enforced; and if the only method of preventing an attempted enforcement, save by resisting each act separately after the illegal change has been put into effect, is by injunction, it is difficult to see why the entire proceeding cannot be stopped in limine. Why should a municipality or its officers be permitted to go to the expense of holding an election for the purpose of annexing territory or changing a county line, and pay such expenses, or others consequent thereon, out of money raised by taxation, when the declaration or announcement of its result, or the surveying of the line, under the Constitution and laws of this state, cannot have the slightest effect, or be put into execution? If the whole action is ultra vires, and calculated to impose burdens upon the individual citizen and taxpayer, or to unlawfully interfere with the rights of another county, why should it be allowed to proceed, merely to be enjoined later when sought to be put into effect? Indeed, if the plaintiffs had remained quiescent and had permitted the election to be held, the notices given, and the line between the two counties to be changed, and dominion over territory taken from one county to be exercised by the other, and perhaps expense incurred, and had then for the first time asserted that the entire proceeding was unconstitutional, would they not have been met with the contention that they were estopped, or that equity would not grant them relief because of laches in applying for its aid?" Thus it is seen that the principles which governed the court were: (1) That equity will interfere to prevent multiplicity of suits, (2) to prevent unlawful interference with the rights of a county, and (3) to prevent the imposition, by ultra vires acts, of burdens upon the individual citizen and taxpayer. See, however, Thompson v. Mahoney, supra.

And an election for the organization of a new county was enjoined at the suit of taxpayers in Oden v. Barbee, 103 Tex. 449, 129 S. W. 602, where it appeared that the petition for the election was fraudulent because the persons whose names appeared thereon were not qualified voters, being women, children, and nonresidents. The court said that the objection that this was purely a political question, and not cognizable by the court, could not prevail in a case where it is proposed to organize a new county without the consent of the inhabitants, and thus subject them to the expense of erecting county buildings and of organization.

No other decision has been found to make the distinction discussed in Duggan v. Emporia, supra, and the courts seem as reluctant to interfere with preliminary matters as to enjoin the election itself.

There is no right on the part of voters and taxpayers to injunctive relief against the use of voting machines at elections, and therefore the court has no jurisdiction of suits seeking such relief. United States Standard Voting Mach. Co. v. Hobson, 132 Iowa, 38, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 512, 119 Am. St. Rep. 539, 109 N. W. 458, 10 Ann. Cas. 972.

And the courts are without power to direct what instructions shall be given to voters as to marking ballots, and to issue a restraining order prohibiting the commissioners from giving instructions inconsistent with those directed. Com. ex rel. Howley v. Mercer, 190 Pa. 134, 42 Atl. 525.

So, an injunction against adding names to a political committee or striking names therefrom will not be granted when the committee does not own or pretend to own or derive any benefit from anything of value held by them in common, although the committee is elected at primary elections and the law recognizes political parties so far as to prescribe the duties of officers at such interfere to enforce or protect purely political rights. This doctrine has been universally applied in other jurisdictions where equity has been invoked to interfere in matters preceding an election. In Fletcher v. Tuttle, 151 Ill. 41, 25 L.R.A. 143, 42 Am. St. Rep. 220, 37 N. E. 683, the supreme court of that state, after a review of the authorities, reaffirmed the doctrine previously adopted that chancery has no jurisdiction to protect purely political rights such as those in respect to public elections, and held specifically that an injunction could not be granted to prevent the giving of election notices or the certifying of nominees for districts created by an apportionment act claimed to be unconstitutional, because such rights were purely political and enforceable only at law.

It had been previously held in that state that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to restrain the holding of an election, since the right involved is a political one. People ex rel. Fitnan v. Galesburg, 48 Ill. 485; Walton v. Develing, 61 Ill. 201; Darst v. People, 62 Ill. 306; Harris v. Schryock, 82 Ill. 119. This question is fully annotated in a note to Shoemaker v. Des Moines, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 382. These cases seem to sustain the conclusion here reached.

Moreover, in Hilzinger v. Gillman, 56 Wash. 228, 105 Pac. 471, 21 Ann. Cas. 305, it was held that, in an action by a councilman to enjoin the city clerk from certifying to an elector's petition for his recall, a taxpayer has no interest entitling him to intervene under Ballinger, Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 4846, it not being alleged that the clerk would not defend the action. The section of the statute above referred to provides: "Any person may before the trial intervene in an action or proceeding, who has an interest in the matter in litigation in the success of either party, or an interest against both." Our statute provides that all actions must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. In view of the similar qualifications required of a suitor by the two statutes, there can be no doubt that the Washington case, although the taxpayer sought to come in as an intervener, is an authority sustaining the conclusion that a taxpayer has not such an interest in a suit to enjoin the holding of an election to recall the mayor of a city of the first class in pursuance to the provisions of its charter as will entitle him to prosecute such suit as a complainant. Thompson v. Haskell, 24 Okla. 70, 102 Pac. 700.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to dismiss the same.

primaries. Kearns v. Howley, 188 Pa. 116, 42 L.R.A. 235, 68 Am. St. Rep. 852, 41 Atl. 273.

So, in Sherlock v. District Ct. 39 Colo. 41, 88 Pac. 396, it was held improper for the district court to enjoin, upon the ground that there was no vacancy to be filled, a county clerk from printing upon the official ballot nominees of the various parties for an office, no protests having been filed within the time allowed therefor by statute. The court declared that the candidates were duly nominated, and that it was the duty of the county clerk to have their names printed upon the ballot, and that "under the facts disclosed by this record it was not proper, or in accordance with the practice hitherto prevailing in this jurisdiction, to have litigated before the election, as was attempted below, or in an injunction action, the important question therein presented." The court cited as supporting this conclusion Mills v. Newell, 30 Colo. 377, 70 Pac. 405; Mannix v. Selbach, 31 Colo. 502, 74 Pac. 460; and Beach v. Berdel, 31 Colo. 505, 74 Pac. 1129, which, however, do not pass upon the specific point.

In State ex rel. Rinder v. Goff, 129 Wis. 668, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 916, 109 N. W. 628, involving an application for leave to commence an action to enjoin the printing of a certain name on an official ballot, or for a writ of mandamus to compel the printing 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of the relator's name thereon, it was held that the supreme court would not exercise its original jurisdiction merely to determine which of two candidates for a county office received the greater number of votes at a nominating election.

State ex rel. Sligh v. Reek, 18 Mont. 561, 46 Pac. 442, holds merely that where, because of laches in filing the application, the court has but a few hours to consider the question, it will not, by enjoining the placing of names upon an official ballot, undertake to determine which of two rival conventions of a political party nominating candidates for the same offices, is the regular convention.

Effect of other remedy.

A few cases afford an additional ground for denying equitable relief, in the fact that there is another adequate remedy.

Thus, it is declared in Parlor v. Fogle, 78 S. C. 570, 59 S. E. 707, that the right to vote at an election is a mere political right, and, as a general rule, is not within equitable cognizance; and that the right of equitable interference, if it exists, should be exercised with the greatest caution and only where there is no other adequate legal remedy and it appears that an irreparable wrong will result from holding the election. It was held in this case that no injunction would be granted against the holding of an election upon the formation of a new county, either upon the ground that some of the petitioning electors would be unconstitutionally deprived of their votes, or because the election officers had not registered the voters. The argument of the court was with respect to the first ground, that, assuming a threatened denial of the right of certain electors to cast their ballot, still the election might result in favor of the side in which such complaining electors would have voted, or the result might be so overwhelmingly against that side that the votes of all whose rights were threatened would have no practical effect, and that if it should turn out that a denial of their rights had affected the result, there would be an adequate remedy by certiorari to test the validity of the election. With respect to the second ground, the court said in effect there was no reason for asking equity to enjoin an election which could not be held if there were no registered voters.

So, an election for the removal of a county seat will not be enjoined where the statute providing a mode for contesting elections furnishes a full remedy should the election be held. Weber v. Timlin, 37 Minn. 274, 34 N. W. 29.

So, it was held that an injunction restraining election officers from registering voters and holding an election was not warranted merely because an amended city charter apportioned the municipal districts unequally with respect to population, although they were accorded the same representation; nor because such charter prescribed other qualifications for voters than were prescribed in the Constitution of the state, and was thus particularly oppressive to colored people. Holmes v. Oldham, 1 Hughes, 76, Fed. Cas. No. 6,643. The court said that whatever might be the propriety or impropriety of the legislation, the remedy sought was not a proper one, since there was no special wrong or irreparable damage done or threatened. It was declared that in case of confusion with respect to who were to be deemed elected, the remedy would be by quo warranto brought by those out of possession of the office against those in possession. In short, it was said that if the election should prove to be illegal and unconstitutional, the remedy by quo warranto would be complete, and that if it was legal, and any of the complainants or other citizens were deprived of their rights under the Federal Constitution, there was ample remedy in the courts of law, by indictment and otherwise.

In Little v. Barksdale, 81 S. C. 392, 63 S. E. 308, an injunction against holding a special election, sought upon the ground that the supervisor was in error in holding that the petition for the election was signed by one fourth of the qualified electors, was 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

denied upon the ground that the petitioners had a plain and adequate remedy at law, and that no property rights justifying equitable interference were involved.

Effect of property rights.

It was declared in Murfreesboro R. Co. v. Hertford County, 108 N. C. 56, 12 S. E. 952, that conceding that equity has no power to restrain the municipal authorities from ordering an election in pursuance of any provision of law, for the purpose of selecting officers or determining any question that may be settled by the result of such election, a different rule prevails where, though the election may be lawfully held, it is apparent that no possible benefit will accrue from holding it, to the person at whose instance it is ordered, and where irreparable injury may be done to others who cannot be compensated in damages. Applying this rule, the court upheld a preliminary injunction granted at the suit of a railroad about to be constructed and the contractor for its construction, against the holding of an election to determine whether a specific application of county bonds, whose issuance had already been authorized, should be made in the construction of the road, where the election would be of no benefit to the people of the township, and would occasion a temporary depreciation of the bonds, and thus embarrass and delay the construction of the road.

And a state political committee will be enjoined from interfering with the holding of a primary election by the local committee, where such attempted interference took place on the eve of such primary and after the candidates had obtained vested rights by paying their fees and incurring other expenses. Neal v. Young, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 183, 75 S. W. 1082. The court said that if this were a controversy between the old local committee which the state committee sought to dismiss, and a new committee appointed by the latter, and no question was involved except as to which committee should be considered the regular one, then it would be a purely political question, to settle which the courts would not take jurisdiction; but that since the candidates must be deemed to have acquired vested rights, there was something more than a mere political question, and equity would take jurisdiction.

The owner of property within an area proposed to be annexed to a municipality may enjoin the execution of an ordinance directing an election to vote upon the annexation, where such ordinance is ultra vires because of noncompliance with statutory prerequisites. Layton v. Monroe, 50 La. Ann. 121, 23 So. 99, distinguishing Roudanez v. New Orleans, 29 La. Ann. 271, supra.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE H. MARSH

v.

GEORGE E. BOYDEN.

(33 R. I. 519, '82 Atl. 393.)

Highway — rule of road — passenger leaving street car — applicability.

1. A passenger injured by an automobile when alighting from a street car cannot rely on the violation by the driver of the automobile, of his statutory duty to pass to the left of the car, to establish negligence on his part.

Same — degree of care necessary.

2. That the driver of an automobile passes an overtaken vehicle on the wrong side does not impose upon him a greater degree of care to avoid injury to pedestrians than would rest upon him had he been on the proper side.

Trial — verdict — special finding — inconsistency.

3. A finding that an automobile which injured a passenger as he stepped from a street car was between the car and the point to which the passenger claims to have looked back before leaving the car is not inconsistent with a general verdict against the driver of the automobile, as indicating negligence on the part of the passenger, if there is nothing to show on which side of the street it was, or that a view of it was not shut off by the car.

Highway — leaving car — approaching automobile — negligence.

4. A passenger is not negligent in alighting from a street car, knowing that an automobile is following the car, if it is not so close that it could not have been stopped by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence on the part of the driver before it reached him.

(March 15, 1912.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Providence and Bristol Counties, made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Vincent, Boss, & Barnefield, for defendant:

The statutory law of the road, as to the side of the road on which vehicles shall pass, does not apply when one of the vehicles is an electric car on fixed tracks.

Note. — For reciprocal duty of operator of automobile and pedestrian to use care, see note to Baker v. Close, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 487; and see especially pages 493 et seq., as to the duty near street cars. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. Frank Healy and George T. Marsh for plaintiff.

Dubois, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trespass on the case for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff through an accident wherein he was thrown down and run over by the automobile of the defendant shortly after leaving an electric car whereon he had been a passenger. A trial of the case in the superior court resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant made his motion for a new trial, which was denied by the justice of said court who presided at the trial. To the denial of his motion for a new trial the defendant duly excepted, and has prosecuted in this court his bill of exceptions, including said exception and others taken in the course of said trial, and now relies upon the four following:

"Seventh. To the ruling of the trial justice refusing to instruct the jury in accordance with the defendant's second request, which said request is to be found on page 478 of said transcript, which ruling was erroneous, in that the defendant was entitled to have the jury so instructed, to which ruling the defendant duly excepted, as appears on pages 476 and 478 of said transcript.

"Eighth. To the following portion of the court's charge to the jury: 'Now, gentlemen, we will take up the count which claims that this defendant should have driven his car on the opposite side of the electric car. Under the law of this state, "every person traveling with any carriage or other vehicle, who shall meet any other person so traveling on the highway or bridge, shall seasonably drive his carriage or vehicle to the right of the center of the traveled part of the road, so as to enable such person to pass with his carriage or vehicle without interference. Every person traveling with a carriage or other vehicle, who shall overtake any other person so traveling on any highway or bridge, shall pass on the left side thereof, and the person overtaken shall, as soon as practicable, drive to the right, so as to allow free passage on the left." And under § 12 of the automobile laws there is this provision: "When two vehicles meet on a public highway, the operator of each vehicle shall seasonably keep to the right to pass without interference, and when a vehicle overtakes another, the one in the rear shall give timely warning as aforesaid, and shall pass on the left." That applies, in my opinion, to a vehicle or automobile approaching an electric car. If they desire to pass the electric car, it is my opinion, and I so charge you, that it is their duty to pass upon the left of that car, having due regard to the people who may be coming on the right-hand side in an opposite direction. If they fail to do that, it does not follow, as a matter of law, that they are guilty of negligence. If they fail to do that, and go on the right-hand side of the car, they are held to a greater degree of care than they would be if they had gone on the left-hand side of the car, as the law provides—which said charge was erroneous, in that there was no requirement of law which required the defendant's automobile, at this time and place, to pass to the left of the electric car from which the plaintiff alighted, to which said portion of said charge the defendant duly excepted, as appears on page 476 of said transcript.

"Ninth. To the following portion of the court's charge to the jury: 'If you should find that this was a closely built-up section, from the evidence, if by reason of the fact that the houses on one or both sides were devoted to business purposes, or there were dwelling houses averaging less than 100 feet apart, why, the rate of speed allowable or permissible there would not be greater than 15 miles per hour'—which said charge was erroneous, in that there was no testimony which showed that the statute therein referred to was applicable to this case, to which said portion of said charge the defendant duly excepted, as appears on pages 476 and 477 of said transcript.

"Tenth. To the denial by the trial judge of the defendant's motion for new trial, which denial was clearly and plainly erroneous, in that, under the special findings of the jury, taken in connection with the evidence, the plaintiff was not in the exercise of due care, and assumed the risk of injury, to which denial the defendant duly excepted."

The seventh exception aforesaid was taken to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury as follows: "There is no requirement of law which required the defendant's automobile at this time and place, to pass to the left of the electric car from which the plaintiff alighted." In the third count of his declaration the plaintiff avers, inter alia, that on the 8th day of September, 1909, the defendant, by his agent and servant, operated a certain automobile in the city of Providence; that on said day the plaintiff was a passenger upon a street car proceeding along Union avenue, which car stopped for him to alight therefrom at a white post near Webster avenue; that he did alight from said car, and that, while he was crossing Union avenue toward its northerly sidewalk, the defendant's automobile, managed by his agent, overtook said car; and that it became and was the duty of the defendant, his agents and servants, to pass said street car on the left side thereof, as he safely could, so that the plaintiff would not be run into while he was in the exercise of due care, yet the defendant attempted to and passed said street car on the right-hand side thereof, instead of the left, and then and there ran into the plaintiff while crossing said street in the exercise of due care. This allegation is based upon the assumption that the law of the road and the statute relating to automobiles impose upon persons operating automobiles, when overtaking and desiring to pass electric cars, the duty of passing the overtaken car upon the left side thereof. This construction of the statutes was adopted by the justice of the superior court, who presided at the trial, and was included in that portion of his charge to the jury which forms the basis of the defendant's eighth exception, hereinbefore set forth. The law or rule of the road, above alluded to, is contained in Gen. Laws (R. I.) 1909, chap. 87, § 1, and reads as follows: "Section 1. Every person traveling with any carriage or other vehicle, who shall meet any other person so traveling on any highway or bridge, shall seasonably drive his carriage or vehicles to the right of the center of the traveled part of the road, so as to enable such person to pass with his carriage or vehicle without interference or interruption. Every person traveling with any carriage or other vehicle, who shall overtake any other person so traveling on any highway or bridge, shall pass on the left side thereof, and the person so overtaken shall, as soon as practicable, drive to the right, so as to allow free passage on the left." And the law prescribing the duty of operators of motor vehicles in the premises is contained in said Gen. Laws, chap.

86, and in that portion of § 12 thereof which reads as follows: "Whenever two vehicles meet on a public highway, the operator of each vehicle shall seasonably keep to the right, so as to pass without interference. Whenever one vehicle overtakes another, the one in the rear shall give timely signal as aforesaid," with his bell, horn, or other device for signaling, "and shall pass on the left, and the operator of the one in front shall seasonably bear to the right, so as to allow free passage on the left."

The seventh and eighth exceptions may well be considered together, for they relate to a refusal to charge the jury in a certain definite manner, and to a charge which not only did not include the instruction prayed for, but was diametrically opposed to it. In our opinion the prayer for instruction should have been granted, and the charge given is objectionable, because the rule of the road could not properly be invoked in the case at bar. If the rule of the road had any application at all, it must have been with reference to the street car or the people thereon; but the plaintiff at the time of the accident had ceased to be a passenger on the car, and there was no interference with the car, or collision in which it and the automobile of the defendant were involved. The plaintiff was not injured in consequence of the neglect of any duty which the defendant owed to the car or its occupants. Of course, the defendant was bound to take notice of the fact that a street car had stopped to allow passengers to alight, and to so conduct his vehicle as not to run down persons who had so alighted; but that is not a duty imposed by the statutes hereinbefore referred to as prescribing the rule of the road. If a duty was violated, it is the duty of using due care under all the circumstances of the case. The duty of using due care is not of statutory origin. The duty of using due care for one's self arises out of one of the first laws of nature, that of self-preservation. The duty of using due care not to injure another or his property arises out of the exigencies of society, and its observance is necessary for the preservation thereof. The maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, expresses it, and to the enforcement of the maxim much of the police power of the state is exercised.

The charge of the court was that the statutes aforesaid, in his opinion, applied to a vehicle or automobile approaching an electric car, and that if they desired to pass the electric car (which they had overtaken), it was their duty to pass upon the left of that car, having due regard to the people who may be coming on that side in 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) an opposite direction. He qualified the above to this extent: "If they fail to do that, it does not follow, as a matter of law, that they are guilty of negligence. If they fail to do that, and go on the right-hand side of the car they are held to a greater degree of care than they would be if they had gone on the left-hand side of the car, as the law provides. In other words, the one who violates the law of the road by driving on the wrong side assumes the risk of such experiment, and is required to use greater care than if he were on the right side." The qualification was also erroneous. They would not be held to a greater degree of care as being upon the wrong side of the road; in fact, the degree of care required was exactly the same on the one side of the car as upon the other, and that was due care,—care proportionate to the conditions existing at that time and place.

The judge further instructed the jury as follows: "But if you should find, gentlemen, that, notwithstanding the fact that he went on the right-hand side of this car, he did exercise that care which an ordinarily careful and prudent man would exercise under all the circumstances of this case, then, gentlemen, your verdict should be for the plaintiff." This portion of the charge was correct; but, in my opinion, it was not introduced for the purpose of nullifying the instructions which had just preceded the same, and was not calculated to correct the erroneous impression that must have been conveyed to the minds of the jurors by the preceding portion of his charge. Moreover, at the conclusion of the charge the judge explicitly said: "The defendant's requests I have covered, all but No. 2, and to that I give Mr. Vincent an exception." This refusal to charge as requested by the defendant makes it evident that the judge persisted in his view of the applicability of the rule of the road to the circumstances of the case, and also shows that he did not intend to modify the instructions he had given relating to the same. We are of the opinion that the charge and refusal to charge constitute reversible error, and therefore sustain the defendant's seventh and eighth exceptions.

We do not find that the court erred in that portion of his charge which is the subject of the defendant's ninth exception. There was some testimony tending to prove that the section wherein the accident occurred was closely built up. The charge as given was correct, and left the fact to be determined by the jury from the evidence. The defendant's ninth exception is therefore overruled. The defendant's tenth exception must be also be overruled.

The defendant's motion for a new trial was based upon the following grounds: "First. Because the verdict is against the law and the evidence, and the weight thereof. Second. Because the special findings of the jury are inconsistent with the general verdict. Third. Because the second special finding of the jury, taken in connection with the first special finding, is inconsistent with the general verdict. Fourth. Because the special findings of the jury show that the plaintiff was not in the exercise of due care. Fifth. Because the special findings of the jury show that the plaintiff, in attempting to cross the street in front of the automobile, assumed the risk of injury."

The verdict referred to reads as follows: "The jury find that the defendant is guilty in manner and form as the plaintiff has in his declaration thereof complained against him, and assess damages for the plaintiff in the sum of $7,500. The jury further find specially: (1) The plaintiff, immediately before he stepped onto the running board, did look back along Union avenue to the drug store at the corner of Union and Priscilla avenues. (2) At the time when the plaintiff was about to step down upon the running board, and when he says he looked back along Union avenue to the drug store at the corner of Union and Priscilla avenues, the automobile of the defendant was on Union avenue between Priscilla avenue and the place of the accident."

It appears from the evidence that the distance from the place where the plaintiff looked, immediately before he stepped onto the running board of the car, to the drug store, at which he then looked, is 236 feet. It also appears that Union avenue, between Priscilla and Webster avenues, is 50 feet wide. It further appears that the width of the sidewalks on the northerly and southerly sides of Union avenue, between the streets mentioned, is 10 feet; that the width of Union avenue between the southerly sidewalk and the southerly rail of the car track is 8 feet, and between the northerly sidewalk and the northerly rail of the car track is 17 feet. What the plaintiff's angle of vision was when he looked, and what obstruction the car presented to his vision, do not appear. There was testimony concerning the presence of another car following the one from which the plaintiff alighted, and that the automobile of the defendant passed that car on its left side, and proceeded on the southerly side of Union avenue for some distance, until it crossed over to pass the first car on its right side. Exactly where the second car was when the plaintiff looked towards the drug store does not appear, nor does it 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

clearly appear where the defendant's automobile then was. We cannot say from the evidence that the special findings are inconsistent with the general verdict. The defendant's automobile may have been on the southerly side of Union avenue, between Priscilla avenue and the place of the accident, and still not have been in sight of the plaintiff. Or the plaintiff may have been mistaken when he says that he did not see the automobile.

But, even if he had seen it, unless it was then so close that it could not have been stopped by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence on the part of its manager, he would have had the right to assume that the person in charge of it would not run it over him. It is not claimed, and it cannot be inferred from the evidence, that he was desirous of committing suicide. Furthermore, as it does appear that the automobile was lighter at the time of the accident, the light should have enabled the chauffeur to have seen the plaintiff in the road, in time to stop or avoid hitting him, unless the vehicle was rounding a curve in passing the rear end of the car from which the plaintiff had alighted, in which case the light would have been of little assistance to the driver of the automobile.

As the defendant's seventh and eighth exceptions have been sustained as aforesaid, the case is remitted to the Superior Court for a new trial.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

IDA M. TRAVIS, Resp't.,

v.

ANDREW R. SCHNEBLY, Appt

(68 Wash. 1, 122 Pac. 316.)

Marriage — engagement — ill health — postponement — effect.

1. One who, having engaged to marry a woman, postpones the ceremony because of her ill health, undertakes to wait a reasonable time for her recovery.

Same — release of engagement.

2. A man is released from his promise of marriage if the other party to the contract becomes ill without fault of either party, after the promise is made, and fails to recover her health within a reasonable time thereafter.

(March 28, 1912.)

Note. — Ill health as defense to action for breach of promise to marry.

This note is supplemental to a note covering the same question, in 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 582.

In Waneczek v. Kratky, 69 Neb. 770, 66

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Garfield County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of promise of marriage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. L. Sharpstein and E. V. Kuykendall, for appellant:

Disease and physical disability justify withdrawal from a marriage promise.

Grover v. Zook, 44 Wash. 489, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 582, 120 Am. St. Rep. 1012, 87 Pac. 638, 12 Ann. Cas. 192; Blank v. Nohl, 112 Mo. 159, 18 L.R.A. 350, 20 S. W. 477; State v. Bittick, 103 Mo. 183, 11 L.R.A. 587, 23 Am. St. Rep. 869, 15 S. W. 325; Trammell v. Vaughan, 158 Mo. 214, 51 L.R.A. 854, 81 Am. St. Rep. 309, 59 S. W. 79; Kellett v. Robie, 99 Wis. 303, 74 N. W. 781.

Messrs. Cain & Hurspool and John C. Applewhite, for respondent:

An illness or physical disability which justifies the breaking of a promise of marriage must be such a one as will almost inevitably, from the nature of the thing, result in impaired health to the parties, and lead to the bearing of children physically weak and predisposed to disease, thus making it a matter of public policy for the state to object to the marriage.

Smith v. Compton, 67 N. J. L. 548, 58 L.R.A. 480, 52 Atl. 386.

Crow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action by Ida M. Travis against Andrew R. Schnebly to recover damages for an alleged breach of promise to marry. From a judgment in her favor, the defendant has appealed.

L.R.A. 798, 96 N. W. 651, there is an obiter statement to the effect that there is attached to every contract of marriage an implied condition that the parties to the agreement will be released by any subsequent change in the mental or physical condition of either party which renders it impossible to accomplish the object of the marriage relation, and in such an event no action will lie for breach of contract.

In Beans v. Denny, 141 Iowa, 52, 117 N. W. 1091, the court said that the court might well have instructed the jury that a person is always excusable for declining to carry out his promise of marriage to one afflicted with syphilis, unless the promise was made with knowledge of the condition, without qualifying the instruction by reference to unfitness for matrimony, but as there was no conflict in the evidence but that syphilis does render one unfit for matrimony, such qualification was not prejudicial.

In the above case the court, in view of the doubt entertained by the medical profession as to the curability or eradicability of syphilis, intimated that if it were confronted 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Respondent alleged that in October, 1904, she and appellant promised to marry each other within a reasonable time; that she has been ready and willing to marry appellant; that in December, 1907, she made preparations for their marriage; that, at appellant's request, postponements were made until the spring of 1908, and the fall of 1908, but that he failed and refused to marry her, though requested so to do. Appellant admitted the original agreement, but denied other allegations of the complaint. For his first affirmative defense he alleged that subsequently they mutually agreed that each of them should be released from the promise, that appellant might be at liberty to marry any other person, and that in reliance upon that agreement he married his present wife. For a second affirmative defense he alleged "that subsequently to the time when plaintiff and defendant became engaged to marry each other the plaintiff became afflicted or was discovered to be afflicted with a certain ailment or disease or weakened physical condition, commonly known and described as a 'floating kidney,' the tendency of which is to render a woman so afflicted therewith nervous, irritable, and weak, and to greatly increase the danger above the danger ordinarily incurred by entering into the marriage relation and becoming a mother, and that defendant is naturally of a nervous temperament and condition, and that because of the said condition of plaintiff an operation was performed upon plaintiff, which operation did not cure her, and she continued in ill health thereafter, and because of the lack of physical ability and strength on the part of the plaintiff, accruing and developing subsequently to the ed with the situation, it would hesitate to hold that a plaintiff who has become afflicted with that disease may complain of a breach of a previous promise of marriage, at least, when made in ignorance of the malady, upon the assumption that she had been cured thereof. The point, however, was not saved, as the defendant's pleadings relied upon the allegations that the plaintiff was still suffering from the disease, and so the judgment of the lower court for the plaintiff was affirmed.

Supervening insanity is a good defense to an action for breach of marriage promise. Liddell v. Easton [1907] S. C. 154, Ct. of Sess. cited in 2 Butterworths' Dig. 141.

And in O'Reilly v. Sweeney, 54 Misc. 408, 105 N. Y. Supp. 1033, it was held that an action for breach of promise cannot be predicated on a promise of marriage made by one who has been judicially declared incompetent in lunacy proceedings, especially where, after restoration, there was no renewal or ratification.

For a note as to disease as defense to marriage, see 15 L.R.A. 531. J. H. B.

engagement of plaintiff and defendant, the marriage of plaintiff and defendant was from time to time postponed; and that, because thereof, the defendant in good faith requested the plaintiff to be released therefrom, and that defendant understood and was led to believe by the plaintiff that she agreed thereto; and that because of all of the aforesaid things the defendant, acting in good faith, ceased his attentions to the plaintiff, and subsequently entered into the marriage relation with his present wife." To this defense respondent replied as follows: "Replying to the matters and things set forth in defendant's second, further, and separate answer and defense herein, plaintiff admits that subsequent to her engagement with defendant she was afflicted with a certain ailment commonly known as a 'floating kidney,' and alleges that long prior to the breaking of said engagement by defendant she was operated upon for said ailment, and wholly and permanently cured, and plaintiff denies all the other allegations in said second further answer and defense contained."

On the trial it was conceded that the original promise was made in October, 1904; that respondent was then in good health; that subsequently she was afflicted as alleged, and that she was operated upon in the city of Spokane during the year 1905, and was treated for some time thereafter. Respondent introduced evidence tending to show a complete recovery; while evidence introduced by appellant tended to sustain his contentions that she had never recovered, and that she was unfit to enter the marriage relation. Appellant in substance testified that he and respondent became engaged in October, 1904; that her health was then good; that she became ill in the spring of 1905; that he learned of her illness in February or March; that she went to Spokane for an operation and treatment; that he next saw her in September, 1905; that she was then in bad health, being confined to her bed a portion of the time; that later in the fall she was suffering from nervous prostration, and stated that she had consulted a physician, who said she would have to undergo another operation; that appellant saw her five or six times during the winter of 1905 and 1906; that he next saw her in the fall of 1906; that she was then sick; that he did not see her from the fall of 1906 until the spring of 1907, at which time she was apparently better, and thought she would get well; that he then told her they might as well get married; that she said the next fall would suit her, but that no date was then fixed; that in the fall he suggested they get married early in March, 1908; that in March, 1908, her health was not good; that he next saw her in June, 1908; that she then said her health was such they had better call the engagement off; that he said he would wait until fall; that he did so; that he talked with her in September, 1908, at which time she said she would rather he would wait until spring; that he said he would do the best he could; that he did wait until spring; that he saw her in February, 1909; that they again discussed her health, which was no better; that she thought they should wait until fall; that he then said he had waited as long as he could; and that they had better call the engagement off. Appellant thereafter married his present wife, and this suit was commenced.

This evidence, if true, shows that respondent's ill health, incurred after the engagement, was the sole cause of numerous delays, covering a period of more than three years. Appellant's contentions on this appeal are all predicated upon instructions given and refused. We only find it necessary to consider his assignment that the trial judge erred in refusing his requested instruction No. 9, which reads as follows: "If, after plaintiff and defendant became engaged, the plaintiff became too ill to enter into the marriage relation, the defendant would not be required to wait an unreasonable length of time for her to recover, and if you find from the evidence that she was thus ill, and that defendant waited as long as was reasonable under all the circumstances for her to recover, and she had not recovered, then he had a perfect right to withdraw from the engagement, and your verdict should be for the defendant." This instruction should have been given. Its refusal constituted reversible error.

When the parties first entered into their mutual agreement to marry, plaintiff, as far as known, was a strong and healthy woman, free from any physical ailments or diseases. Shortly thereafter, without fault of either of the parties, she became ill, and was compelled to submit to a surgical operation, and for a long period of time continue under medical treatment. Appellant contracted to marry a healthy woman, and not an invalid. When it became manifest that by reason of poor health she could not marry, postponements were made, awaiting her recovery. This constituted a modification of the original contract, and imposed upon appellant the duty to wait a reasonable time for her recovery. The agreement still contemplated that appellant was to marry a healthy woman. He at no time agreed to marry an invalid, although he did agree to wait a reasonable time.

Ill health of one party, contracted without his or her fault, after the original promise to marry, is a defense available to the other party in an action for breach of promise. A man who has only agreed to marry a healthy woman should not be compelled to accept her as his wife should she become an invalid before marriage. In Gring v. Lerch, 112 Pa. 244, 250, 56 Am. Rep. 314, 3 Atl. 841, 843, the court said: "A man does not court and marry a woman for the mere pleasure of paying for her board and washing. He expects and is entitled to something in return; and, if the woman with whom he contracts be incapable, by reason of a natural impediment, of giving him the comfort and satisfaction to which as a married man he would be entitled, there is a failure of the moving consideration of such contract, and no court ought to enforce it by giving damages for its breach."

Appellant contended that respondent's long-continued illness unfitted her for the marriage relation; that she had become a confirmed invalid; that she never recovered her health; and that he should not be held in damages. He also introduced evidence which, although disputed, if accepted as true, was sufficient to sustain these contentions. It was for the jury to determine whether respondent's health was in fact restored, and whether appellant had waited a reasonable time for her recovery. This is not an action in which a defendant is pleading his own illness as a defense, but one in which, according to his contention, he is called upon to marry an invalid who was a healthy woman when the original contract was made. Under such a state of facts, if proven to the satisfaction of the jury, a defendant should not be held liable for damages. This case in its facts differs materially from that of Grover v. Zook, 44 Wash. 489, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 582, 120 Am. St. Rep. 1012, 87 Pac. 638, 12 Ann. Cas. 192. We have made an exhaustive examination of the authorities, but find no similar case. Here we have a plaintiff who, according to appellant's contention, was well and hearty when he agreed to marry her, but who had the misfortune to incur a serious and perhaps permanent illness which impaired her physical vigor and unfitted her for becoming a helpmeet to her husband. Yet she insists that he should either marry her or respond in damages. No court should impose any such obligation upon him. Respondent has been unfortunate, but that is not appellant's fault. It must be pre-40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sumed that he would not have entered into the agreement could he have foreseen the unfortunate condition into which she has fallen relative to her health. To award damages for his refusal to thereafter marry her would be to make for him a contract which he himself neither made nor intended to make. If her illness had existed prior to his promise, and he had been aware of the same, a different question would be presented; but it did not then exist. Appellant was entitled to have his evidence submitted to the jury with the instruction requested.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

Dunbar, Ch. J., and Chadwick, Morris, and Ellis, J.J., concur.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

JOHN R. BENNETT, Plff. in Err.,
v.

FEDERAL COAL & COKE COMPANY.

(— W. Va. —, 74 S. E. 418.)

Interest — demand for labor and materials.

1. As a general rule, where plaintiff's demand is liquidated, or, if unliquidated, can be readily ascertained by computation, interest thereon should be allowed, if the demand be for work done or material fur-

Headnotes by MILLER, J.

Note. — Acceptance of principal sum as affecting the right to interest.

The right to recover interest after the payment of the principal sum due depends upon whether the interest is due by the terms of the contract, or whether it is merely implied and allowed by way of damages in an action for the principal. If interest is due by the terms of the contract, the payment of the principal is no bar to its subsequent recovery, but if it is not due by the terms of the contract, the payment of the principal sum is a bar to recovery. It will be noted that the doctrine of accord and satisfaction has entered into this question and prevented a recovery of interest even where it is due by the terms of the contract, and, on the other hand, that where there is an agreement at the time of payment that the question of interest should be afterwards settled, the payment does not prevent recovery of interest even in those cases in which it is not due by the terms of the contract.

Contracts providing for interest.

In Canfield v. Eleventh School Dist. 19 Conn. 529, where the principal had been nished, from the date the labor is done or material furnished, or from the date when, by the terms of the contract, payment should have been made.

Same — implied contract.

2. When there is no express contract to pay interest, there is generally an implied contract to do so.

Same — contract liability.

3. Where the contract or obligation expressly stipulates for the payment of interest, the interest becomes an integral part of the debt, and payment and acceptance of the principal sum will not, as a general rule, defeat a subsequent action to recover the interest not paid, carried by the contract.

Same — penalty — loss.

4. But where the contract does not so specifically provide for payment of interest, but the right thereto is by an implication, interest is considered as damages, and not as forming the basis of the action, and is recoverable only along with the principal sum and as an incident thereto, and if the principal sum be accepted in settlement, the right to the damages is lost, and no separate subsequent action can be maintained therefor.

Accord — acceptance of principal — waiver of interest.

5. The old common-law rule applied in Nixon v. Kiddy, 66 W. Va. 355, 66 S. E. 500, that payment by a debtor, and receipt by the creditor, of a less sum than is due upon an undisputed liquidated demand, is not satisfaction of the debt, although the creditor agrees to accept it as such, is inapplicable to a balance claimed for interest due by way of damages on an implied agreement to pay interest.

Same — protest — effect.

6. The fact that receipt of payment without interest may have been done under protest of a creditor will not change the legal effect of his act on his right to maintain a subsequent separate suit to recover the interest.

(March 5, 1912.)

paid and accepted after suit had been begun, the rule is stated, as in BENNETT v. FEDERAL COAL & COKE Co., that if there was an express agreement to pay interest, the payment of the principal would not prevent recovery of the interest, but if it was claimed merely as damages for the delay in paying the principal, there could be no recovery. As to whether or not there was an express agreement is not decided in this case, as there was another ground on which the court allowed a recovery of the interest.

Where the interest is payable by the terms of the contract, it becomes an integral part of the debt, and the payment of the principal sum does not prevent a subsequent recovery of the interest. This rule has been applied and a recovery of interest allowed after the payment of the principal,

—where the principal of an interest-bearing note was paid by the maker. Robbins v. Cheek, 32 Ind. 328, 2 Am. Rep. 348, overruling Compant v. Ewing, 8 Blackf. 328, an action to recover interest after the payment of a promissory note, in which recovery was denied. It does not appear from the report of the latter case whether the note did or did not bear interest;

—where a county order which the treasurer refused to pay or indorse, so that it would bear interest, was afterwards paid by him without interest in obedience to the order of the court in a mandamus proceeding. Marks v. Purdue University, 56 Ind. 288. The action in this case was one for damages, in which the interest was sought to be recovered as an element of such damage;

—where a merchant sought to recover interest after the payment of the principal on an account for goods sold and delivered, there being an express agreement to pay interest. Froment v. Oltarsh, 60 Misc. 89, 11 N. Y. Supp. 657;

—where recovery of interest on the principal sum due on a bond was sought after 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the payment of the principal sum. King v. Phillips, 95 N. C. 245, 59 Am. Rep. 238.

There is dictum of like effect in Leighton v. Leighton Lea Asso. 122 N. Y. Supp. 139. See also McKay v. Fee, 20 U. C. Q. B. 268, and Darlow v. Cooper, 34 Beav. 281.

There is dictum in Williams v. Houghtaling, 3 Cow. 86, an action on a bond expressly bearing interest, and on which a payment had been made, to the effect that if the whole of such payment had been applied to the extinguishment of the principal, no interest could be recovered. This dictum is referred to in Fake v. Eddy, 15 Wend. 76, as having been misapplied in this case. In the latter case, the rule is laid down that where there is an express agreement to pay interest as well as the principal of the demand, the payment of the principal is no bar to an action for the interest.

In Valentine v. Donohoe-Kelly Bkg. Co. 133 Cal. 191, 65 Pac. 381, where it was the custom of a bank which held the note of a partnership indorsed by one of the partners, to charge the interest to the partnership account, it was held that such bank could not, after it had surrendered the note to the individual partner upon payment of the principal and a small amount of current interest, collect any further interest of such individual, under a Code provision that accepting payment of the whole principal as such waived all claim to interest.

In Hall v. King, 2 Colo. 711, where the payee of an interest-bearing note accepted the payment of the principal and surrendered the note, on the express promise of the maker subsequently to pay the interest, it was held that the payee might maintain an action upon such promise to recover the interest.

In Chase v. Manhardt, 1 Bland, Ch. 333, there is dictum to the effect that if a creditor receive or recover his principal debt in any manner so as not thereby, either ex-

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Marion County to review a judgment setting aside a verdict in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover interest on a principal sum for building certain coke ovens, audited and credited by defendant to plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. Powell, C. Powell, and Scott O. Lowe, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff, on settlement, was entitled to interest on the principal sum due him, from the time it became due and payable up to the time the notes were given, December 4, 1906.

pressly or tacitly, to relinquish his claim to the interest then due, he may sue for and recover such interest.

In Emmittsburg R. Co. v. Donoghue, 67 Md. 383, 1 Am. St. Rep. 396, 10 Atl. 233, a promise to relinquish the interest upon the receipt of the principal of a bill was held to be without consideration, and a recovery of the interest was allowed in a separate action, although the bill was surrendered at the time of payment. Generally, as to payment of part of a liquidated and undisputed indebtedness as a consideration for discharge of the whole, see notes in 20 L.R.A. 785; 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1018; and 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1005, and specifically, as to payment less interest, see p. 789 of the note in 20 L.R.A.

In Eames v. Cushman, 135 Mass. 573, where new notes were given in renewal of notes on which the interest was overdue, such notes not including this interest, nor being received in satisfaction thereof, but leaving this question an open one, the maker of the note saying that he would make it all right and acknowledging that he was legally liable for the interest, it was held that such interest could be recovered either upon the theory that the original note remained in force, or upon the theory that the defendant made a new oral promise in consideration of the surrender of the note. The former theory was adhered to in this case and recovery allowed.

In Lumley v. Musgrave, 4 Bing. N. C. 9, 3 Hodges, 247, 1 Jur. 799, 5 Scott. 230, 7 L. J. C. P. N. S. 49, where a new bill was given for an old, the new one being for the same amount as the old, and the old was left in the hands of the holder, it was held that the inference from these facts was that the old bill was left in the hands of the holder as security for the interest which had become due upon it, and which might become due, until the second bill was paid; and a recovery of interest thereon was allowed after the second bill was paid. The same holding appears in Lumley v. Hudson, 4 Bing. N. C. 15, 5 Scott. 238.

The court does not decide this question in Helier v. Franklin, 1 Starkie, 291, but 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The giving of a receipt, though in full, did not bar plaintiff from afterwards collecting interest.

The interest due plaintiff at the time of the transaction of December 4, 1906, was contractual interest; it should be regarded as interest due by implied contract, if, indeed, it was not due by express contract.

in that case a recovery of interest was allowed after the payment of the principal of a bond.

In Watts v. Garcia, 40 Barb. 656, where a decedent had in his lifetime made an agreement with a firm to make deposits with them subject to his drafts, the firm to allow interest on the deposits and to charge interest on the drafts, and such arrangement continued during the lifetime of the decedent, and the money was held several years after his death, when it was paid to the administrator, together with interest thereon to the time of death, it was held that, in the absence of a showing that the firm had terminated the agreement at death, interest on such deposits from the date of death till the time of payment, being due at the time of payment, might be collected in a separate action, and was not affected by the payment of the principal.

In East v. Thornbury, 3 P. Wms. 126, a legatee who had settled with the personal representative of the estate under the mistaken belief that her legacy was to bear interest from a year after her marriage, instead of from a year after the death of the testator, as provided in the will, was held to have the right to recover interest, although the legacy had been paid.

In Stone v. Bennett, 8 Mo. 41, where there was an express agreement in a bond to pay interest, it was held that the interest might be recovered after the principal sum had been paid.

No question seems to have been raised as to the effect of the payment of the principal and the interest provided thereby, upon the right to maintain an action for the recovery of an additional amount of interest provided by a collateral contract, in Greenwood v. Fenton, 54 Neb. 573, 74 N. W. 843.

and satisfaction, and recovery of the interest is denied. Thus, in Storch v. Dewey, 57 Kan. 370, 46 Pac. 698, where there was a bona fide dispute as to the date from which interest on the promissory note in question should be computed, and an agreement was finally reached as to the amount to be paid in full satisfaction thereof, there was held to be a valid accord and satisfaction, preventing a recovery of a balance of interest claimed due.

In Tuttle v. Tuttle, 12 Met. 551, 46 Am. Dec. 701, where a note was given by one son to another, payable at the decease of the father, and the payee of the note was away, his whereabouts being unknown to the maker for a number of years after the death of the father, and when he returned the principal sum was paid without interest, it was held that a recovery on the note presented a question of so much doubt and uncertainty that, if the payee received the principal sum with the understanding that the same was to be in full discharge of all claim on his part upon the note, it would constitute a good defense to the action.

In Westcott v. Waller, 47 Ala. 492, where the principal and a part of the interest on a judgment obtained in the court of a state which was in rebellion was paid, a recovery of the balance of the interest was denied, on the theory that a valid accord and satisfaction had been effected. The action for the interest was one against a surety on the original debt, the principal and a cosurety having become insolvent, and the defendant in the action having been brought to the verge of insolvency, and there was held to be sufficient doubt as to the recovery of the amount of the judgment as to present a situation in which an accord and satisfaction might be had.

In Johnson v. Brannan, 5 Johns. 268, it was held that the general rule that payment of a less sum after the debt is due, in satisfaction of the debt, is not good by way of accord and satisfaction, should not be applied to an action on a promissory note, where the payment which was accepted in satisfaction exceeded the principal sum of 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the note, and fell short only about $2 of the interest.

In State v. Crutchfield, 3 Head, 113, where the state refunded to one who entered state land the title to which failed, the amount paid by such enterer, it was held that, assuming that there was a legal obligation on the state to refund the money with accruing interest, the terms of adjustment proposed by the state to refund the amount paid, and the acceptance by the enterer of such proposition, constituted an accord and satisfaction, which prevented the maintenance of an action to recover the interest thereafter. The decision in this case, however, rests more strongly on the proposition that the state was not bound to refund any of the money, and the voluntary payment of the principal imposed no obligation to pay interest.

In Bidder v. Bridges, 57 L. J. Ch. N. S. 300, L. R. 37 Ch. Div. 406, 58 L. T. N. S. 656, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 393, where the solicitor of plaintiff, against whom the costs were taxed in an action, paid the amount of such costs by his personal check to the defendant's solicitor, who thereupon surrendered the final certificate with a receipt of the costs indorsed thereon, and such action was intended to settle the claim, it was held that there could be no subsequent recovery of interest, although under the law the costs bear interest. The decision in this case is placed upon the ground of valid accord and satisfaction. In discussing the question of consideration, Cotton, L. J., states that the fact that the solicitor gave his check, and thereby became personally liable for the amount of the costs, was a sufficient consideration to support the agreement.

See also Henry v. Flagg, 13 Met. 64, on theory of waiver.

But if there is not a valid accord and satisfaction, there may be a recovery of the interest. Thus in Beer v. Foakes, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 221, s. c. on appeal, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 605, 54 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 130, 51 L. T. N. S. 833, 33 Week. Rep. 233, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 370, where a judgment debtor Va. 544, 36 S. E. 984; Fuller v. Crittenden, 9 Conn. 401, 23 Am. Dec. 364.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff brings error to the judgment below, setting aside the verdict in his favor and awarding defendant a new trial.

The suit was in assumpsit, and except one item, "to one dump cart, $50," the purpose of the suit is to recover interest on the principal sum, $21,085.00, for building certain coke ovens, during the year 1905-06, audited and credited by defendant to plaintiff, some months prior to payment.

The correctness of the judgment below and the rulings of the court on the trial, and in the giving and refusing of instructions to the jury, for the most part, depend upon the effect of a settlement made, December 4, 1906, and the following receipt, then executed and delivered by plaintiff to defendant, as follows:

Pittsburg, Pa., Dec. 4th, 1906.

Received of Federal Coal & Coke Company twenty-one thousand six hundred ninety-five dollars in form of 2-6 mo. notes for $10,000, each, and check for $1,695 in settlement of account. $21,695.

John R. Bennett.

It is conceded that the notes and the check receipted for cover the exact amount of the principal, and $610 included in the check for interest on the notes from their entered into an agreement with his creditor to pay a certain sum on the judgment, and the balance by instalments, the creditor agreeing not to take any action on the judgment, it was held that the creditor might, after the principal sum had been paid, recover interest and issue execution therefor on his judgment, as there was no consideration for the agreement not to do so.

In Barron v. Vandvert, 13 Ala. 232, where a part of the principal of a promissory note was paid on the express promise of the payee to release the maker thereof from payment of interest, there was held not to be a sufficient consideration for such promise, and recovery of the interest was allowed.

—effect of statute providing for interest.

Where the obligation is one that by statute bears interest, some courts regard this as an equivalent of contractual interest, and therefore allow a recovery, even though the principal sum has been paid, while others regard it in the nature of damages, and refuse recovery after the payment of the principal sum. Thus, in Devlin v. New York, 131 N. Y. 123, 30 N. E. 45, recovery of interest was allowed after the payment of an award for land taken in eminent domain proceedings, where the statute provided for interest.

And in Smith v. Buffalo, 39 N. Y. Supp. 881, where the payment of claims for sewer repairs was delayed and finally paid without interest, and the city charter provided for interest in such cases, it was held that there might be a recovery of the interest.

In Hobbs v. United States, 19 Ct. Cl. 220, a statute providing for interest in certain cases of appeal from decisions on claims against the United States was held to be so far contractual as to authorize a recovery of interest by such a claimant after the payment of the principal sum. In this case the claimant demanded the whole sum due, including interest, but when he was informed that the appropriation was short, he took the amount of the principal.

28 Am. St. Rep. 333, 49 N. W. 683, where certain claims against a city, invalid because of the failure regularly to enter into a contract, were legalized by an act of the legislature, and the city authorized and empowered to pay the same with interest thereon, and the city council, believing it within its discretion to pay or refuse to pay the claims, when in fact the statute was mandatory, ordered the principal paid, the acceptance of this principal by the contractor did not preclude the maintenance of a separate action by him for the recovery of the interest.

On the contrary, in Ludington v. Miller, 6 Jones & S. 478, where a statute gave interest on the amount of a recovery in an action for death, to be computed from the date of death, the statute was held to declare a rule of damages by which the amount of a verdict might be increased, and did not present an element of contract with reference to such interest; therefore recovery of the interest was denied after payment of the principal sum by way of compromise to the suit.

The same view is taken in Brady v. New York, 14 App. Div. 152, 43 N. Y. Supp. 452, where it is stated that interest provided by statute is recoverable, not by virtue of a contract, but in the nature of damages for nonpayment of the debt, hence there can be no recovery after the judgment has been satisfied in full and a satisfaction under seal given.

A statute fixing the legal rate of interest and providing what obligations shall bear interest does not make interest contractual, so that it may be recovered after payment of the principal. Graveson v. Odd Fellows' Temple Co. 6 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 287.

Under a statute providing that if a bank refuses to pay a deposit on demand, the depositor is entitled to receive and recover interest on the same at the rate of 12 per cent per annum, it was held, in Potomac Co. v. Union Bank, 3 Cranch, C. C. 101, Fed. Cas. No. 11,318, where a bank had so refused to pay a deposit and suit was thereupon begun, whereupon the bank paid the deposit with 6 per cent interest, which date to date of maturity, and that nothing was included, or intended to be included, for interest prior to the date of the receipt and settlement. The interest which the plaintiff sues for in this action is the interest which he claims accrued to him on the principal sum from April 1, 1906, when he alleges the principal sum should have been paid, and the date of his receipt and settlement, claiming to have accepted the notes and check under protest, and with the understanding on his part that the prior interest was to be adjusted between him and the president of the defendant company, when he should recover from his then illness, and be able to attend to business. The president died a few days afterwards, and the interest was never adjusted, wherefore this suit.

Refusing plaintiff's two instructions embodying the contrary proposition, the court below on the trial, at the instance of defendant and over the objection of plaintiff, instructed the jury, in substance, that if they believed from the evidence that plaintiff and defendant made a settlement on December 4th, 1906, and that the plaintiff accepted from the defendant the two notes for $10,000 each, and the check or voucher for $1,695, and thereupon signed and delivered to the defendant the receipt above mentioned, plaintiff was not entitled in this action to recover any interest theretofore accrued on the items and amount therein settled, and that he was estopped from re-amount was accepted by the depositor, that such payment and acceptance prevented a recovery of the remainder of the interest.

See also National Bank v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 84 U. S. 437, 24 L. ed. 176; see Re John Osborn's Sons & Co. 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 887, 100 C. C. A. 392, 177 Fed. 184; Johnson v. Tuttle, 17 Abb. Pr. 315.

Contracts not expressly providing for interest.

The distinction between interest in the nature of damages, and interest due by implied agreement based on the presumed intention of the parties, for which plaintiff's counsel argued in BENNETT v. FEDERAL COAL & COKE Co., and which as a logical proposition apparently met the approval of two members of the court, has received little or no sanction from the cases within the scope of the present note. But for the sake of its possible value in the future consideration of the subject, an attempt has been made to indicate the nature of the claims in the individual cases sufficiently to indicate to what extent the actual results may be harmonized with the suggested distinction, and to what extent they necessarily involve the repudiation, or at least the ignoring, thereof.

Where the contract is silent as to interest, so that if it can be recovered at all, it is as an incident of such debt and only as damages to make the creditor good for the loss he has sustained by reason of the breach or default, an action to recover it cannot be maintained after payment of the principal, as such interest cannot exist without the debt, and, the debt being extinguished, the right to claim interest must necessarily be extinguished also.

This rule has been applied, and recovery of the interest denied after payment of the principal,

—where a shipper was seeking to recover interest on the amount of a claim which had been paid him by a carrier for loss of goods. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Alford & Co. 5 Ga. App. 428, 63 S. E. 524;

—where a legatee was seeking to recover interest from and after a year from the date of the testatrix's death, on a legacy which had previously been paid. American Bible Soc. v. Wells, 68 Me. 572, 28 Am. Rep. 82. Compare with East v. Thornbury, 3 P. Wms. 126, where interest was provided in the will;

—where a widow was claiming interest on a legacy left her by the will of her late husband, after such legacy had been paid. Re Hodgman, 140 N. Y. 421, 35 N. E. 660;

—where a person was seeking to recover interest on an unliquidated demand for board, which had been paid after suit begun. Simmons v. Almy, 103 Mass. 33;

—where a lessor was seeking to recover interest on a claim for rent, the principal of which had been paid him after suit was begun. Davis v. Harrington, 160 Mass. 278, 35 N. E. 771. A similar holding appears in Crane v. Brooks, 189 Mass. 228, 75 N. E. 710, an action on an account;

—where a depositor was seeking to recover interest on a deposit made with a bank in the usual manner, payment of which on the first presentation of check and demand of payment was refused on account of the bank having been summoned as garnishee in an action against the depositor, but which was subsequently paid and accepted by him without demand for interest. Arnold v. Sedalia Nat. Bank, 100 Mo. App. 474, 74 S. W. 1038;

—where a county was seeking to recover interest of the county treasurer, who had defaulted in the payment of the county funds to his successor, but who had finally paid the principal amount and received a receipt. Maloy v. Bernalillo County, 10 N. M. 638, 52 L.R.A. 126, 62 Pac. 1106. The court, in this case, notes that there is no specific provision of the statute making the funds bear interest;

—where the board of freeholders of a county were seeking to recover interest on a sum of money which the county collector covering any such interest in the absence of an express contract on the part of the defendant to pay the same, made before or at the time of said settlement.

It is not pretended or proven that there was any such express contract. Plaintiff relies solely on an implied promise to pay interest from April 1st, 1906, the latest date when, by the terms of his contract as he claims it, estimates were to have been furnished him, and the estimates or principal sums paid.

The general rule of law in this, as in other jurisdictions, undoubtedly is that where the demand of the plaintiff is liquidated, or, if unliquidated, can be readily ascertained by computation, as in this case, interest thereon will be allowed, if the demand is for work done or material furnished, from the time the material is furnished or work completed, or from the time when, by the terms of the contract, payment should have been made. 22 Cyc. 1513, 1514, 1540, 1543; Becker v. New York, 77 App. Div. 635, 78 N. Y. Supp. 1064. It is equally well settled, as shown by the authorities cited, that when there is no express contract to pay interest, there is an implied contract to do so. Chapman v. Shepherd, 24 Gratt. 377; Roberts v. Cocke, 28 Gratt. 207; Cecil v. Deyerle, 28 Gratt. 775; McVeigh v. Howard, 87 Va. 603, 13 S. E. 31; Kent v. Kent, 28 Gratt. 840; *Cecil v. of the debt, or only an incident to it, recoverable along with the debt, or by way of damages for the wrongful detention thereof? On the proper answer to these questions depends the answer to the question above propounded, What is the legal effect of the receipt given in December, 1906?

The authorities we believe to be uniform in holding that where the contract or obligation to pay money bears interest on its face by express stipulation, the interest becomes an integral part of the debt, as much so as the principal itself. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1032; 22 Cyc. 1570, and authorities cited in note 78, and the Virginia authorities above cited. At least payment of the principal sum will not defeat a subsequent action to recover the balance for interest carried by the contract. 22 Cyc. 570, 571, and notes; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1033.

But the contract we have here is one which does not bear interest on its face; there is only an implied contract to pay interest. What is the relationship of interest to principal in such cases? It is a mere incident to the demand, and recoverable only in an action on the demand itself, and by way of damages for the wrongful detention of the money, as counsel for defendant contend; or is it, as in the case of an express contract, an integral part of the debt, recoverable by separate action after payment of the principal, as is argued by counsel for plaintiff? This is the pivotal question.

In Chandler v. People's Sav. Bank, 61 Cal. 401, where parties had settled mutual accounts without charging interest, and the one to whom a balance was found due had accepted payment by note and mortgage, it was held that the court would not go behind such settlement for the purpose of allowing interest to the party who gave the note, in order to reduce the amount thereof.

In Vider v. Chicago, 164 Ill. 354, 45 N. E. 720, affirming 60 Ill. App. 595, recovery of interest was denied after the payment of the principal sum to a contractor who was to be paid from special assessments, which the city delayed in collecting for a year. There was no discussion in this case, however, as to the effect of payment, but the decision is placed on other grounds. In the opinion of the appellate court, there is a statement to the effect that the majority of that court were of the opinion that the reception by the contractor of the principal sum precluded the recovery of anything more.

In Milliken v. Southgate, 26 Me. 424, where a person received a certain sum of money on agreement to repay it if it was found, upon the settlement of a concern, that he was not entitled to hold the sum, and on such settlement, such sum was repaid without any statement as to interest, it was held that there could be no recovery of interest, since there had been no express promise to pay interest and no breach of contract that could authorize an award by way of damages. A parol promise to pay interest which was set up in this case was held to be without consideration, and therefore ineffectual.

In Robbins Cordage Co. v. Brewer, 48 Me. 481, where an account between the parties had been settled by giving in payment a promissory note, it was held that there could be no recovery of interest thereafter. It is further stated in the opinion in this case that there was not sufficient evidence to authorize a recovery of interest on the implied contract is a mere incident to the debt, and that after payment of the principal interest cannot be recovered by separate action, defendant's counsel rely upon the following authorities: Brewster v. Wakefield, 1 Minn. 352, Gil. 260, 69 Am. Dec. 343; Graves v. Saline County, 43 C. C. A. 414, 104 Fed. 61; Southern R. Co. v. Dunlop Mills, 22 C. C. A. 302, 42 U. S. App. 169, 76 Fed. 505; Smith v. Buffalo (Sup.) 39 N. Y. Supp. 881; Fake v. Eddy, 15 Wend. 76; Stewart v. Barnes, 153 U. S. 456, 38 L. ed. 781, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 849, and the leading case of Moore v. Fuller, 47 N. C. (2 Jones, L.) 205, a North Carolina case, and 22 Cyc. 1572, 1573.

Barnes, 153 U. S. 456, 38 L. ed. 781, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 849, Judge Shiras says: "Interest in such cases is considered as damages, and does not form the basis of the action, but is an incident to the recovery of the principal debt. The right of action is the right to compel the payment of the money which is being retained. When he who has the right commences an action for its enforcement, he at the same time acquires a subordinate right, incident to the relief which he may obtain, to demand and receive interest. If, however, the principal sum has been paid, so that, as to it, an action brought cannot be maintained, the opportunity to acquire a right to damages is lost."

Plaintiff's counsel reply that in the ap-account, even if there had been no settlement. There is dixtum of like effect in Howe v. Bradley, 19 Me. 31.

In Talbot v. Bay City, 71 Mich. 118, 38 N. W. 890, a writ of mandamus to compel a city to pay interest on certain orders given for paving work, after the orders had been paid without interest and accepted by the relators, was refused, where there was no promise to pay interest in the orders or no statutory authority authorizing the payment of such interest.

In Consequa v. Fanning, 3 Johns. Ch. 587, it was held that an account between parties which had been settled and the balance paid would not be opened up in the absence of evidence warranting a contrary finding, since the receipt of the balance is good proof that no interest was due by the course of dealing, or that it was received or waived.

In Middaugh v. Elmira, 23 Hun, 79, it was held that there could be no recovery of interest on an order drawn on a city treasurer, after payment of the principal, notwithstanding the holder expressly reserved the right to claim interest, and would not have surrendered the order if he had known that he was thus losing his right to claim interest.

In Re Smith, 1 Misc. 253, 22 N. Y. Supp. 1085, it was held that a wife could not recover interest from her husband's estate on a sum of money which had been in possession of the husband, but which had been repaid to the wife, in absence of an express agreement to pay interest.

In Bronner Brick Co. v. M. M. Canda Co. 18 Misc. 681, 42 N. Y. Supp. 14, an action on account for goods sold and delivered, where the balance of the account was paid after action was begun, the rule is stated that such payment extinguishes all claims for interest unless there is an agreement that it should not so bar the claim.

In Bloodgood v. United States, 39 Ct. Cl. 69, where part of a judgment obtained against the United States was stated by the attorney general in his report of the same to Congress as being invalid, and thereupon Congress made an appropriation for the payment of the balance, which was 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

paid and received by the judgment creditor in satisfaction thereof, it was held that such judgment creditor could not, after a subsequent payment of the invalid part of such judgment, recover interest on such invalid part, as the payment thereof was a gratuity, and, in the absence of express authority therefor, no interest could be recovered.

Recovery of interest was denied in Churcher v. Stringer, 2 Barn. & Ad. 777, 1 Dowl. P. C. 332, 9 L. J. K. B. 318, where the principal sum due on an award was paid sometime after the same became due, but the decision in this case was placed expressly on the manner in which it was sought to recover the interest, the action being one by motion for an attachment. In the course of the opinion, the court states that interest as well as principal may be recovered in an action, but on motion the principal only.

The rule that payment of the principal sum extinguishes the claim for interest was applied in Johnson v. District of Columbia, 31 Ct. Cl. 395, where Congress changed a rule by which the compensation of contractors was estimated, thereby extinguishing a counterclaim which the District of Columbia was seeking to exercise against a claim of a contractor, and it was held that interest on the counterclaim up to the passage of the act by which it was extinguished could not be allowed.

In Bond v. Cutler, 10 Mass. 419, it was held that no action could be maintained on an appeal bond after the satisfaction of the judgment appealed from, by execution thereon, for interest from the rendition of such judgment to its discharge, where there was no stipulation in the bond requiring interest to be paid. A similar holding appears in Gage v. Gannett, 11 Mass. 217, an action on the bond of a county officer conditioned on payment of money received by him.

In Snowden v. Thomas, 4 Harr. & J. 335, where a debt due from a partnership to the heirs of a deceased partner was paid without interest, and a receipt in full of all claims taken, it was held that there could be a recovery of the interest in equity, in the absence of a showing that the receipt plication of the rules of law concerning interest to this case, interest should not be classified, as defendant's counsel does, as (1) interest in the nature of damages; (2) interest due by express contract; that a proper classification would be, (a) interest in the nature of damages for the detention of money; (b) contractual interest, subdivided into, (1) interest due by express contract, (2) interest due by implied agreement, based on the presumed intention of the parties. They say the authorities are divided as to whether interest by way of damages may be recovered after acceptance by the creditor of the principal sum due. They admit, however, that the weight of authority is against its collection. They might have gone farther, we think, and admitted that there is no authority to the contrary.

The principal proposition, and the one on which they rely, is that in Virginia and in this state at least, and according to the decisions they rely upon, interest due by implied contract has the same relation to the principal debt as interest due by express contract; that interest due by implied contract is as much an integral part of the debt, and as recoverable by separate action, as if borne on the face of the contract, and by express provision thereof, and recoverable by separate action.

Can this position be supported by authority? It is conceded that no Virginia or West Virginia decision can be found exactly in point, and none are cited, nor have had been given with an intention or agreement to give up the interest. The court in this case treats the interest as due at the time of payment of the principal sum, although it does not appear that it was due by virtue of any contract, or in any other manner than on an implied obligation to pay interest on money which one has belonging to another.

Where a person furnished supplies to a mining company, under a contract by which he was to be paid for the supplies furnished during each month on the 15th of following month, and in accordance therewith presented his bill and was paid after some delay and without interest, and continued this arrangement for some time, but finally brought an action for a balance of the account and interest, and in such action sought to recover the interest on the monthly payments for the time such payments were delayed, it was held in Bassick Gold Mine Co. v. Beardsley, 49 Colo. 275, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 852, 112 Pac. 770, that there could be no recovery of interest.

In Ryan Drug Co. v. Hvambzahl, 92 Wis. 62, 65 N. W. 873, where, on an open account between the parties, statements of the account were sent from time to time and drafts drawn on the debtor, such statements were held to constitute an account stated, and in an action for the balance of the account, interest could not be allowed except from the commencement of the action. It is not clear from the report of this case, however, that the decision is based upon the fact that payment of the principal sum due prevented the recovery of the interest.

Doctrine of waiver.

Some courts treat the acceptance of the principal sum in the nature of a waiver of the claim for interest, and deny recovery on this theory.

Thus, in Henry v. Flag, 13 Met. 64, where the holder of promissory notes which bore simple interest on their face, but which the holder claimed were to bear annual interest, indorsed them, and at the same time entered into a collateral agreement with the indorsee to pay annual interest in case the makers of the notes failed to do so, the court in holding that no action could be maintained against such indorser for the annual interest, after the amount of such notes, together with simple interest, had been paid by the makers and received by the indorsee, states that the payment of interest on the whole sum might have been enforced by action to enforce the payment of the same at the end of each year, if the indorsee had seen fit to do so, but not having done so, it is to be presumed in this, as in the cases of annual interest stipulated for in the note itself, that the party waived such claim for annual interest.

So, in Jacot v. Emmett, 11 Paige, 142, it was held that the receipt of a balance due on an account, without any reservation of the right to claim interest afterwards, was a waiver of such claim. The doctrine of waiver entered somewhat into the decision in Bronx Gas & Electric Co. v. New York, 29 Misc. 402, 60 N. Y. Supp. 548, and also in Abbott v. Wilmot, 22 Vt. 437, and in Bidwell v. Preston, 88 C. C. A. 19, 160 Fed. 653, supra. See also Valentine v. Donohoe-Kelly Bkg. Co. 133 Cal. 191, 65 Pac. 381; Consequa v. Fanning, 3 Johns. Ch. 587; Tenth Nat. Bank v. New York, 4 Hun, 429.

In Childs v. Millville Mut. M. & F. Ins. Co. 56 Vt. 609, a recovery of interest was denied an insurance agent who had paid a loss on a policy issued by his company, and had been repaid by the company the amount so paid by him, he at the time surrendering the policy duly receipted, to the company. This decision is based on the doctrine that the receipt of the money and the surrender of the policy constituted a release which effectually discharged the claim, although it is assumed by the court that the agent was entitled to interest.

Where the payment of the principal sum is not made until after suit is brought thereon, the additional question of the effect of the failure to adjudicate the entire cause we found any decision from any state supporting counsel to the extent claimed. Nor are any authorities cited by counsel illustrating the application of the law to their classification of interest. If their classification be the correct one, in what kind of cases would interest be allowed by way of damages for the detention of money? They would say, perhaps, in actions for torts. But without statute interest is not usually recoverable in such actions. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1031. What the books generally mean when they refer to interest recoverable by way of damages is interest recoverable, not by express contract, but by implied contract and as damages for the unlawful detention of the money. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Stew- art v. Barnes, supra, affirms this proposition in language already quoted: "Interest in such cases is considered as damages, and does not form the basis of the action, but is an incident to the recovery of the principal debt." So, in Graves v. Saline County, 43 C. C. A. 414, 104 Fed. 61, it is held that where interest is not stipulated for in the contract, and is recoverable merely as damages, or as an incident to the debt, it may not be recovered after acceptance by the creditor of full payment of the principal of the obligation. Citing numerous cases supporting the proposition, some of which have already been cited. To the same effect is 22 Cyc. 1572. In Davis v. Harrington, 160 Mass. 278, 35 N. E. 771, Justice Knowlton says: "But interest of action is involved. By some courts, payment, even under such circumstances, is regarded as the important fact preventing recovery, and that it was not made until after suit was begun is not regarded as making any difference. Such was the view taken in Davis v. Harrington, 160 Mass. 278, 35 N. E. 771, infra, and other cases referred to below. Other courts regard the splitting of the cause of action as the principal objection to recovery.

Thus, in Hayes v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 753, 19 N. W. 245, where a railway company paid the amount of an appraisal for taking property to the sheriff, and took possession of the property, then took an appeal thus preventing payment to the landowner, and thereafter, when the appraisal was increased by the appellate court, paid the increased amount, which was then paid to the landowner, and no question of interest raised, it was held that such landowner could not thereafter recover the interest.

And in Jamison v. Burlington & W. R. Co. 87 Iowa, 265, 54 N. W. 242, where the landowner had accepted the amount of an award for the taking of a right of way across his farm, it was held that he could not, a year and a half after such adjudication, open up the case and have it redocketed and the question of interest decided.

In Mann's Succession, 4 La. Ann. 28, where, on a hearing in opposition to an account of an administrator, the account was settled and judgment given for the amount due the state, it was held that a rule would not thereafter be granted to recover interest in the nature of a penalty, since such interest should have been claimed in the original action. A similar decision appears in Anderson's Succession, 12 La. Ann. 95.

In Wickersham v. Whedon, 33 Mo. 561, it was held that no action could be maintained for interest from the date to maturity of a note, where a former suit on this note had been brought, in which, under a mistake of law, interest had been asked from the maturity instead of from the date thereof, and a judgment obtained and satisfied on this theory.

And where a police judge compelled the payment of his salary without interest, by mandamus against the mayor and council, requiring them to perform the acts necessary to such payment, it was held that no subsequent action was maintainable for such interest. Gordon v. Omaha, 71 Neb. 570, 99 N. W. 242.

—payment of principal sum due on judgments.

Where the principal sum due on a judgment had been paid and accepted by the judgment creditor, such payment does not prevent execution issuing for the interest, where a statute makes the judgment bear interest. Johnson v. Tuttle, 17 Abb. Pr. 315.

And in Fishburne v. Sanders, 1 Nott & M'C. 242, an action of debt on a former judgment, where the balance due on such judgment was paid into court after action begun, but not accepted by creditor, it was held that the plaintiff could, notwithstanding the payment of the principal sum, maintain the action for interest. A similar holding appears in Pinckney v. Singleton, 2 Hill, L. 343.

Claims filed in insolvency proceedings have been likened to judgments, and the rule as to judgments which bear interest by virtue of a statute has been applied. Thus, in National Bank v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 94 U. S. 437, 24 L. ed. 176, the creditor of a defaulting bank who had been paid the full amount of his claim by the receiver was held entitled thereafter to maintain an action for interest. The proving of the claim to the satisfaction of the comptroller was held in this case to be of the same efficacy as if it had been reduced to judgment, and which is allowed by way of damages and for the neglect to pay promptly is a mere incident of the debt, which falls when the debt itself is extinguished. It is well settled that in such a case, if the debt is paid, there can be no recovery afterward for the interest which might have been collected." Citing numerous cases. In Southern C. R. Co. v. Moravia, 61 Barb. 180, it is distinctly held that where there "is no agreement to pay interest, interest, when allowable, is allowed not as a part of the contract, but as an incident and by way of damages for the default, to make the creditor good for the loss he has sustained by reason of the breach or default." This case also holds that after the principal of the debt has been paid and received for in full, no action can be maintained to recover interest, for the reason that the interest, being a mere incident to the debt, cannot exist without it, and the debt being extinguished, the interest must necessarily be extinguished also. This case also makes a clear distinction between those cases where interest is made payable by the terms of the contract, and the case we have here, and holds in the former case that the interest is as much a part of the contract as the principal, and not a mere incident to it. In support of these principles, see also Fake v. Eddy, 15 Wend. 76, and Milliken v. Southgate, 26 Me. 424. Interest, therefore, according to these decisions and many others, which may properly be said to be due by contract, and recoverable by separate and independent ac-in case it had been reduced to judgment, it would by statute have borne interest. The court treats the interest recoverable in such cases as damages for the detention of the debt, and holds, without a very extended discussion, that such damages may be recovered. On this theory, the case is in direct conflict with the later decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Stewart v. Barnes, 153 U. S. 456, 38 L. ed. 781, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 849.

And in Re John Osborn's Sons & Co. 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 887, 100 C. C. A. 392, 177 Fed. 184, an action by trustees in liquidation of a bankrupt corporation to require the trustee in bankruptcy to pay over to such trustees a balance of funds in his hands after the payment of the indebtedness in full, in which the trustee based his refusal to pay over the funds on the ground that he intended to collect enough out of the bankrupt's estate to pay interest on the said indebtedness, it was held that the claims, although arising out of ordinary debts for the purchase of goods, were entitled to be pleaded as judgments, and therefore interest might be collected upon them notwithstanding the principal sum had been paid.

But where the judgment creditor accepts payment of the principal of the judgment without interest, in full satisfaction of the judgment, and a satisfaction is executed under seal, there can be no separate action maintainable to recover the interest, although, a statute provides that the judgment shall bear interest from the time it is entered precisely as a debt bears interest from the time it is due. Brady v. New York, 14 App. Div. 152, 43 N. Y. Supp. 452.

And where a wife recovered judgment against her husband's estate for money held by him in trust for her, the amount of which judgment with simple interest thereon was paid to her, it was held that she could not recover the difference between such simple interest and annual interest in a subsequent action. Price v. Holman, 135 N. Y. 124, 32 N. E. 124, reversing a contrary holding in the same case on a former 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

hearing in the lower court, 17 N. Y. S. R. 572, 2 N. Y. Supp. 184.

In Florence v. Jennings, 3 Jur. N. S. 772, 2 C. B. N. S. 454, 26 L. J. C. P. N. S. 274, a recovery of interest was allowed after a judgment had been obtained on the principal sum for that amount alone, the judgment, however, in this case, does not appear to have been paid.

In McKay v. Fee, 20 U. C. Q. B. 268, recovery of interest due under a collateral agreement entered into in consideration of an extension of time on some promissory notes was denied after the payment of a judgment rendered in a suit on such notes, in which the payee sought to recover the additional interest, but abandoned the claim and took judgment merely for the amount of the notes and the interest provided for therein.

So, where the holder of a promissory note secured by mortgage brought an action thereon, but by mistake claimed less interest than was due, and recovered judgment, which judgment was paid, it was held in Darlow v. Cooper, 34 Beav. 281, that he could not thereafter maintain an action in equity to foreclose the mortgage, and thus collect the balance of the interest. See also Beer v. Foakes, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 221, s. c. on appeal L. R. 9 App. Cas. 605, 54 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 130, 51 L. T. N. S. 833, 33 Week. Rep. 233, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 370, and Pacific R. Co. v. United States, 158 U. S. 118, 39 L. ed. 918, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 766.

In some cases, a demand has been made for the interest, or a protest offered at its nonpayment. Such a demand or protest does not change the rule that payment of the principal sum due prevents recovery of the interest, if the obligee afterwards accepts the principal. The courts take the view that where there is no legal compulsion, the fact of protest can amount to nothing, in view of the other fact that the person knowingly accepts the principal sum without interest. Forschirm v. Mechanics'

tion, even after payment of principal, and as an integral part of the debt, is interest due by the specific terms of the contract. In that class of cases, as is said in 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1033, "there would be no more reason for holding that the payment of the original principal extinguished the claim for interest than that a part payment of such principal destroyed the right to the remainder."

But can the position of plaintiff's counsel be supported by the principles enunciated or the reasonings applied in the Virginia and West Virginia cases relied upon? The cases referred to are those already cited, of McVeigh v. Howard, 87 Va. 603, 13 S. E. 31; Roberts v. Cocke, 28 Gratt. 207; Kent v. Kent, 28 Gratt. 840, and Shipman v. Bailey, 20 W. Va. 140. It is argued that these cases regard interest, where the promise to pay interest is either express or implied, not in the nature of damages, but as an integral part of the debt. The proposition, so far as it is applicable to express promises, is correct, but we do not regard the language of the decisions, by implication or otherwise, as supporting the proposition respecting interest recoverable on an implied promise. McVeigh v. Howard was an action on the following contract:

$10,000. Richmond, Va., Jan'y 9th, 1878.

In consideration of professional services rendered to me by John Howard, Esq., I owe, and hereby promise to pay to him, ten thousand dollars. Witness my hand and seal this day, and year above written.

[Seal.]

W. N. McVeigh.

The only point for decision in that case was, from what time interest on the bond sued on should be allowed? It was held that the court below properly instructed the jury that interest should go from its date predicated its judgment on the decisions of Chapman v. Shepherd, 24 Gratt. 377; Roberts v. Cocke, 28 Gratt. 207, Cecil v. Hicks, 29 Gratt. 1, 26 Am. Rep. 391; Cecil v. Deyerle, 28 Gratt. 775, and Kent v. Kent, 28 Gratt. 840. The language of Judge Burks in Roberts v. Cocke, and of Moncure, President, in Kent v. Kent, quoted in that case, is especially relied on here. Judge Burks said: "It has always been lawful in Virginia for parties to contract for the payment of interest for the use and for-& T. Bank, 137 App. Div. 149, 122 N. Y. Supp. 168; Graveson v. Odd Fellows' Temple Co. 6 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 287; Tuttle v. Tuttle, 12 Met. 551, 46 Am. Dec. 701.

And even though the obligee claimed to have reserved his legal right, it was held not to change the rule, in Riley v. Maxwell, 4 Blatchf. 237, Fed. Cas. No. 11,838.

And in Graves v. Saline County, 43 C. C. A. 414, 104 Fed. 61, the fact that the principal of interest coupons was accepted under protest was held not to change the rule that the payment of the principal extinguishes the claim for interest.

So, in Cutter v. New York, 92 N. Y. 166, the fact that a protest was made at the time of accepting the principal was held to make no difference in the rule.

In Hobbs v. United States, 19 Ct. Cl. 220, where the claimant demanded interest, and was told that the appropriation was short, and then took the principal, he was allowed to recover, but on the ground that the interest provided by statute is contractual. So, in Devlin v. New York, 131 N. Y. 123, 30 N. E. 45, where there was a protest made at not receiving the interest, a recovery of the interest was afterwards allowed, but on the ground that it was contractual. And in National Bank v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 94 U. S. 437, 24 L. ed. 176, demand was made, but recovery of interest allowed on other grounds.

—effect of an express reservation as to interest.

But where there has been an express agreement between the parties that the question as to the right to recover interest should be reserved and determined by an action to be brought by the plaintiff therefor, the receipt of the principal sum does not bar the right to recover interest. Grote v. New York, 190 N. Y. 235, 82 N. E. 1088, reversing 117 App. Div. 768, 102 N. Y. Supp. 977.

Where the question of interest is expressly reserved for future litigation at the time of the receipt of the principal, such receipt is no bar to the recovery of the interest. Burr v. Burch, 5 Cranch, C. C. 506, Fed. Cas. No. 2,187 (payment of a legacy).

In Eames v. Cushman, 135 Mass. 573, the question of interest was agreed to be left open, and a recovery was allowed.

So, the court in Bronner Brick Co. v. M. M. Canda Co. 18 Misc. 681, 42 N. Y. Supp. 14, holds that if an express agreement is made reserving the question of interest, payment of principal does not bar right to recover interest.

However, in Moore v. Fuller, 47 N. C. (2 Jones, L.) 205, an agreement to submit the question of liability for interest on a bond to arbitration was held not to save the obligee's right to recover interest thereon, but it is suggested that there might be a remedy on the award.

bearance of money within the limits prescribed by statute; and in the absence of any express agreement for the payment of interest, in obligations for the payment of a certain sum of money on demand or on a given day, interest on the principal sum from the time it becomes payable is 'a legal incident of the debt, and the right to it is founded on the presumed intention of the parties.'" Judge Moncure said: "A bond payable on demand, . . . or on a certain day, bears interest from the time it is payable, according to the well-settled law of this state, unless there be some contract, express or implied, between the parties, or some extraordinary or peculiar circumstances, showing that such interest was not to be paid; and the burden of proving such contract or circumstances devolves on the party who seeks to avoid such payment. In the absence of such proof, the obligation for the payment of interest is as much a matter of contract in the case as the obligation for the payment of the principal." We see little in the language of either of these judges to support the contentions of counsel. Of course, interest is a legal incident of the debt; the text-books and decisions from other states, cited, so treat it. And it is true also, as said by Judge Moncure, absolutely, that when the contract is express, as it was in the case he then had under consideration, and in a certain sense when the contract to pay interest is implied, that "the obligation for the payment of interest is as much a matter of contract in the case as the obligation for the payment of the principal." But to say that the interest is a legal incident of the debt in either case, or is a matter of contract, is not equivalent to saying that the interest, where the contract is implied, is an integral part of the debt, recoverable by separate action after payment of principal. None of the Virginia decisions justify this conclusion. Quite the contrary we think.

We have only found one line of decisions noting any exceptions to the general rule. One instance is where interest is given by statute for delay in paying money for land taken by condemnation, as in Devlin v. New York, 131 N. Y. 123, 30 N. E. 45. Another instance is where a charter law of a city provided that warrants issued for repairing sewers should bear interest, supplemented by a resolution of council, as in Smith v. Buffalo (Sup.) 39 N. Y. Supp. 881, where it was held that the interest became thereby ingrafted in the debt itself. Another instance is where, pursuant to an act of the legislature, a railroad company by resolution ordered that subscribers to stock be allowed interest on instalments as paid, to be payable in stock, the interest to be carried to the credit of the stockholder annually, as in Ohio v. Cleveland & T. R. Co. 6 Ohio St. 489. A pertinent point of the syllabus in that case is: "Interest follows the principal as an incident to it, so long as it remains an incident; but where it is separated and set apart from the principal by actual payment, or by being carried, when due, to the credit of the owner of the principal, in his account with the debtor, and this in pursuance of a provision in the contract creating and defining the principal debt, it is so separated and disjoined from the principal as to cease to be an incident to, and does not follow, it." The case here cannot be brought within the principles of either of these exceptional cases.

Lastly, as to the effect of the receipt. On the theory that the interest sought to be recovered here, supposed to be due by the implied agreement to pay interest, is an integral part of the principal debt, and recoverable by separate action, plaintiff's counsel have argued that the receipt for the principal without interest, under protest, does not estop the plaintiff from recovery of the interest sued for in this action. They rely especially upon our recent case of Nixon v. Kiddy, 66 W. Va. 355, 66 S. E. 500, and cases there cited. This case holds that "payment by a debtor, and receipt by the creditor, of a less sum than is due upon an undisputed liquidated demand, is not satisfaction of the debt, although the creditor agrees to accept it as such, if there be no release under seal or no new consideration given as to the part left unpaid." Of course, if counsel's premises were well founded, their conclusion would follow and this decision would apply. But if, as we hold, interest on an implied promise to pay is only an incident to the debt, following it, as was said in Hatcher v. Lewis, 4 Rand. (Va.) 162, as the shadow the substance, and not an integral part of the debt, the argument wholly fails. The old common-law rule followed in Nixon v. Kiddy, long since abolished in Virginia (Va. Code, 1887, chap. 134, § 2858 [Code 1904, p. 1499]), has always been regarded a harsh one, and one that ought not to be extended by judicial interpretation beyond its present limits. Quoting from Brooks v. White, 2 Met. 283, 37 Am. Dec. 95, and other cases, Peck, Ch. J., in Wescott v. Waller, 47 Ala. 492, says: "This rule, which obviously may be urged in violation of good faith, is not to be extended beyond its precise import; and whenever the technical reason for its application does not exist, the rule itself is not to be applied." And in the case of Johnson v. Brannan, 5 Johns. 268, the court speaks of it as 'that rigid and rather unreasonable rule of the old law.' Being a rigid rule, and the reasons for it not altogether satisfactory, it might be expected that cases would arise that would constrain the courts, to prevent injustice and a violation of good faith, to treat as exceptions to it. This we find to be the case."

For these reasons we are not disposed to apply the rule to interest due by implied agreement, and where it is not carried in the contract as an integral part of the debt.

Does the fact that plaintiff may have received and receipted for the principal under protest, change the effect of his action? The authorities say, no. 22 Cyc. 1573, and cases cited in note 90.

We see no merit in the point that the item, "to one dump cart, $50," sued for, left a part of the principal of the debt unpaid, entitling plaintiff to sue for it, and for interest on the whole debt. At the time of the settlement defendant owed plaintiff nothing for the cart. He had not sold it to defendant; defendant had not bought it from him. The item was then no part of any debt defendant then owed plaintiff. Plaintiff had left the cart on defendant's premises; the latter was at most a mere bailee. No demand was ever made for the cart; if plaintiff had wanted it, he could have gone and gotten it no doubt, as he had gotten other carts left by him on the premises. It is plainly evident that the purpose of adding the item to the account sued for was to avoid the effect of the settlement and receipt of December 4, 1906. This is no such case as was presented in Walker v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 67 W. Va. 273, 67 S. E. 722.

Our conclusion is to affirm the judgment.

Poffenbarger, J., concurring:

Yielding to the weight of authority, I concur in this decision; but, to my mind, it involves a contradiction. An implied contract to pay money as interest or upon any other valid consideration is just as binding as an express contract. There is or is not an implied contract to pay interest for the use of money retained after it has become due and payable. Our decisions say there is, and money due is not satisfied by anything short of payment or a release in some form. The receipt is not conclusive, and the parol evidence shows the amount received was not accepted as payment in full. If the interest was due by contract, it could not be satisfied or its existence negatived by mere conduct affording ground for a contrary inference.

The rule here adopted will often work injustice, as it has done here. A debtor may refuse payment and threaten defenses, as a means of forcing a creditor who is not in a situation to suffer delay without great hardship, to accept the principal sum without the interest, and thus escape payment of a part of what he justly owes. Legal rules should make provision against such results.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Preston County to review an order affirming a report of the Commissioners in a condemnation proceeding, fixing the compensation to be paid to defendant for land owned by her, and investing plaintiffs with the title to said land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. R. Trotter for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. P. J. Crogan and A. Bliss McCrum, for defendant in error:

The sovereign right and power of eminent domain can be delegated to corporations or other agencies of the state; and when private corporations are so authorized to do, then private pecuniary interests do not preclude their being regarded as public agencies in respect to the public good sought to be accomplished.

It is the province of the legislature to declare the public uses for which private property may be taken. This power is only limited by constitutional provisions, and of these the courts take cognizance and eventually decide as to the constitutionality of the law.

Williams, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

Elizabeth Liston has obtained a writ of error to an order of the circuit court of Preston county, made in a condemnation proceeding against her by the Pittsburgh Hydro Electric Company, investing said company with the title to 15.45 acres of her land at the fork of Cheat river and Big Sandy creek, in Preston county, West Virginia, upon payment to her, by it, of the sum of $500, ascertained by commissioners appointed in the manner provided by law to be a just compensation therefor.

Condemnation proceedings were instituted by virtue of chapter 13, Acts [Ex Sess.] 1907, amending and re-enacting § 2 of chapter 42, Code 1899. That portion of the act applicable to this case is as follows, viz.: "Sec. 2. The public uses for which private property may be taken or damaged are as follows: . . . Sixth. For telegraph and telephone companies and electric power, heat, light, and traction companies, when for public use. That telephone and electric light, heat, traction, and power companies desiring to extend their lines in this state may place poles and wires along any county road, by and with the consent of the county court through which such lines may pass; provided, that all such poles and wires shall be placed and erected so as not in anyway to interfere with the public use of such road, or with any fruit or shade trees, or with any private property; and provided, further, that when any such company desires to erect its poles along any street of any incorporated city, town, or village, the consent of the council of such city, town, or village shall first be obtained. Provided, that any power company using or occupying any highway under this act shall furnish to any person, company, or corporation, along, upon, or near its line or lines, desiring the same, every kind of service at the minimum charge for like services charged to any other person, company, or corporation for like service, and upon the same terms, if amount of power consumed and conditions and expenses to such power company be the same; should at any time the power generated by any power company be insufficient to furnish all persons, companies, and corporations the amount of power desired, such power company shall first serve municipal corporations having contract therefor; second, persons, companies, or corporations engaged in manufacture or transportation; and third, individual customers. Any violation of any provisions of this clause shall work a forfeiture of all rights acquired under it."

The constitutionality of this statute is assailed by counsel for Mrs. Liston, on the ground that it authorizes the taking of private property for private use, which is in violation of the spirit of the Constitution. The authorities uniformly hold that the eminent domain exists only for the public welfare, and that private property cannot be lawfully taken for private uses. The exercise of the sovereign power for such a purpose would be a usurpation of power never delegated to the state by the people, an unwarranted invasion of the rights of private property, which has always been a right sacred in the eyes of the English common law, and still held sacred by the laws of all the states of the Union. An owner of property can only be compelled to surrender it to subserve the public good; and even then only when just compensation is paid to him, or secured to be paid. No court, so far as we know, has ever held that private property can be taken for private use. And, on the contrary, none of them hold that a state cannot lawfully take private property for public use.

Lewis, in his excellent work on Eminent Domain (§ 1), defines "eminent domain" to be "the right or power of a sovereign state to appropriate private property to particular uses, for the purpose of promoting the general welfare." It is an inherent, inalienable, sovereign right, and lies dormant in the state until the legislature sees fit to exercise it, either directly, or by investing some corporation or individual with the power to exercise it. It is interesting to note the various purposes for which the legislatures of the states have successively exercised the power of eminent domain, as discovery and invention would bring about new social and economic conditions calling for its exercise in relation to some matter not theretofore thought of. In the early history of our country the needs of the public were few, and the eminent domain was exercised in respect to a very limited number of subjects. Gristmills and highways were about the first, and for some time the only, material things in which the public had a common use. But since the advent of steam and electric power, many water mills which once flourished, served large communities, have passed into disuse. And while the old mill acts are still retained as part of the law of this state, they are seldom, if ever, invoked in condemnation proceedings. At first public roads, turnpikes, canals, and navigable streams furnished the only means for travel and commerce; but later on, when steam began to be used as a motive power, the eminent domain was applied in the promotion of railroad development, as another means of serving the public. The following are some of the many subjects which the legislatures of many of the states have deemed of sufficient public utility to justify the taking of private property, viz.: Gristmills, public roads and turnpikes, steam and street railroads, canals, pipe lines for carrying water, oil, and gas, sewers and drains, public buildings, including schoolhouses, mining privileges, irrigation of arid lands, and drainage of swamp lands. And the courts have uniformly held that the taking of private property for such purposes was a lawful exercise of the state's power. In more recent years the discovery of that hidden, magic force known as electricity, and all the varied uses to which it has been applied to serve the wants and conveniences of mankind, have again called forth the exercise, by the state, of the right of eminent domain, for a purpose not theretofore contemplated. Until the discovery of this new force, and the invention of means by which it could be transmitted, controlled, and applied, so as to give light, heat, and power, only a limited use could be made of the natural waterfalls which abound in this state. It is not practicable to transmit water power a very great distance, and, in order to utilize the waterfalls as a direct motive power at all, mills and factories would have to be erected near by, and very many of such waterfalls are found in sections remote from railroads. But these waterfalls, however remote from railroad development, may be utilized to develop electricity, and electricity possesses the quality of being separated and transmitted by means of wire over hill and valley for a long distance, without a very great diminution of its force. By this means water power can be converted into electric power, and transmitted over a wide area, and be made to serve the uses of a greater number of people, than any other physical force yet discovered. Moreover, electricity possesses the combined qualities of heat, light, and power, and is therefore capable of supplying more of man's wants and needs than any other natural force now known. For some, or all, of these different purposes, it is now in almost universal use in every civilized country on the globe. But electricity is not self-generating; some other force or power is necessary to produce it. Either steam or water power must be employed in the first instance before this subtle and indescribable force, known as electricity is developed. And the legislature, realizing that the numerous natural waterfalls in the state could be made to serve the public through the means of "electric power, heat, light, and traction companies," invested them with the right of eminent domain. They are authorized to take the lands of private persons upon making just compensation therefor, when their purpose is to serve the public. Is there such a general demand for electricity, for heating and lighting, and as a motive power, as to warrant the legislature in extending the right of eminent domain to companies created for the purpose of supplying it? This is a legislative, not a judicial, question, and the legislature has answered it affirmatively by the passage of the act in question. Its answer is conclusive on the court.

The expediency, or propriety, of extending the right of eminent domain to any particular subject, provided each member of the community is given equal right and privilege with respect thereto, is a question for the legislature only, and with it the courts have nothing to do. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Pittsburg, W. & K. R. Co. 17 W. Va. 812; Varner v. Martin, 21 W. Va. 534.

The only question which the courts are authorized to determine is whether or not the use intended is, in effect, a public use. This is conceded to be a judicial question. 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. 2d ed. § 251; Varner v. Martin, supra. But it is often a perplexing question. A public use has been variously described, but never comprehensively defined, by the courts and by text writers. Judge Cooley, in his excellent work on Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed. p. 766, says: "We find ourselves somewhat at sea, however, when we undertake to define, in the light of the judicial decisions, what constitutes a public use." It is not every kind of benefit that a community may derive from an enterprise which is proposed to be located in its midst that will justify the taking of private property. A merely indirect and collateral benefit is not sufficient. The public must have some direct and certain right or interest in it, or control over it. Each case, however, must be determined by the application of certain general and well-recognized principles.

Light, heat, and power are essential to the comfort and convenience of the people of a community, and electricity is capable of supplying them. It can be distributed to each member of a community in such quantity as he may need. It may not only be applied in operating street railways, and in the running of large factories, but the farmer can, if he wants to, utilize it in lighting his house, and in operating machinery to saw wood and grind grain for his family and cattle. He could also relieve his wife of much labor by using it to operate the washing machine, the sewing machine, and the churn. But it is not necessary that all the people of a community should take a portion of the electric current in order to constitute the use of a public one. It is sufficient if each member of the community has an equal right to a portion of it on equal terms with every other member. That some of the residents of a city do not use gas for lighting or heating, or that some elect not to have their houses supplied with water from the public reservoir, or that some refuse to avail themselves of the general convenience afforded by the telephone, affords no reason for holding telephone, gas, water, and electric power and light companies not to be public-service corporations. All the residents of the city have the right to these conveniences, on the same terms with those citizens who do enjoy them, and that is sufficient to determine the service to be a public, and not a private, use.

Many states have passed statutes similar to our own, conferring the right of eminent domain upon electric companies chartered for the purpose of furnishing light, heat, and power to the public, and these statutes have been generally upheld by the courts as constituting a proper exercise of the right of eminent domain. 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. § 268, and numerous cases cited in note 70. We have examined nearly all of those cases, and cite the following specially as supporting the constitutionality of such statutes: Jones v. North Georgia Electric Co. 125 Ga. 618, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 122, 54 S. E. 85, 5 Ann. Cas. 526; Rockingham County Light & P. Co. v. Hobbs, 72 N. H. 531, 66 L.R.A. 581, 58 Atl. 46; McMeekin v. Central Carolina Power Co. 80 S. C. 512, 128 Am. St. Rep. 885, 61 S. E. 1020; Ingleside Mfg. Co. v. Charleston Light & Water Co. 76 S. C. 95, 56 S. E. 664; Stoy v. Indiana Hydraulic Power Co. 166 Ind. 316, 76 N. E. 1057; Wisconsin River Improv. Co. v. Pier, 137 Wis. 325, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 538, 118 N. W. 857; Minnesota Canal & Power Co. v. Pratt, 101 Minn. 197, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 105, 112 N. W. 395; Re Niagara, L. & O. Power Co. 111 App. Div. 686, 97 N. Y. Supp. 853; Helena Power Transmission Co. v. Spratt, 35 Mont. 108, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 567, 88 Pac. 773, 10 Ann. Cas. 1055; Grande Ronde Electrical Co. v. Drake, 46 Or. 243, 78 Pac. 1031; Walker v. Shasta Power Co. 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 725, 87 C. C. A. 660, 160 Fed. 857. This last case involved the constitutionality of an act of California.

The provision in our statute granting electric power, heat, light, and traction companies, when for public use, the right to erect their poles and stretch their wires along public roads, by and with the consent of the county court, and if in a city, town, or village, by and with the consent of the authorities thereof, does not invalidate the act. Neither is the act invalidated by the provision which requires such companies to furnish service to persons along and near its line, when it occupies a public highway, and which classifies the public to be served into three classes, giving the preference: First, to municipal corporations; second, persons, companies, and corporations engaged in manufacture or transportation; and, third, individual customers, in the event there is not sufficient current developed to supply all. Such classification is clearly within the legislative jurisdiction, and does not constitute the use a private one.

We think the statute is constitutional, and shows wisdom on the part of the legislature. The recent discoveries and inventions by means of which electricity has been made to serve the wants of man have created a demand for much of the water power of this state, which heretofore could be of little use, was of comparatively small value, and which for ages past has been allowed to go to waste. It requires more capital to build electric plants and string wires for distributing the current to supply the needs of the people than is generally possessed by the individuals who happen to be the owners of much of the water power, now made valuable because of its new possible use, and, in order that it may be utilized to serve the public, the legislature has seen fit to clothe such corporations as are chartered for the purpose of supplying such current to the public with the right of eminent domain. A heretofore wasted natural power can thus be made to supply a public need, and the state still retain the right to prescribe reasonable regulations for the protection of the public. For no public-service corporation or company can escape this inherent sovereign power which is always reserved to the state. 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. § 246; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77; Charleston Natural Gas Co. v. Lowe, 52 W. Va. 662, 44 S. E. 410.

That there is now no statute regulating the charges which such companies may make for services to be rendered is immaterial. It is time to prescribe regulations when the company is ready to perform the services. Moreover, it would not be possible to determine, correctly, in advance of the erection of the company's plant, and the ascertainment of the cost of furnishing the light, power, heat, etc., what would be a fair and reasonable charge therefor to the public.

It is insisted that condemnor's petition is bad because it does not aver that it has a contract to supply any municipality or company. This omission is immaterial. It would certainly be reversing the usual order of things to require a company to obtain a franchise, or contract, to supply the public at a certain fixed rate, before it acquired the land on which to erect its plant, and before it could know whether it would ever be in a position to comply with its agreement. After the company obtains the necessary land on which to build its plant, and the easements necessary for erecting its poles, or towers, and stringing its wire, it may then be able to know at what price it will be able to serve the public. Before this is accomplished a contract as to price would be much a matter of speculation, and one in which the public would likely be the loser. State ex rel. Harlan v. Centralia-Chehalis Electric R. Power Co. 42 Wash. 634, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 198, 85 Pac. 344. The condemnor's right depends, not upon contract to supply at a certain price, made in advance, but upon the law, and the provisions of its charter. It is bound by law, being a public-service corporation invested with the right of eminent domain, to use the property taken for the purposes set forth in its petition, and the order of the court; any other use, when the public needs and demands the service, would be a perversion of its privilege and a violation of its right.

There is nothing in the condemnor's petition which would indicate that it desires to make private use of the electricity which it proposes to generate. It alleges that it wants the land "for the purpose of the supply, storage, and transportation of water and water power and electric power for commercial and manufacturing purposes, and for public purposes and public uses, for cities, towns, counties, and other municipal corporations, and for electric street and interurban railways, to be operated for public purposes, and for other internal improvement companies in Preston county and elsewhere in the state of West Virginia, and for all public purposes and public uses." And further, that it desires to proceed at once in Pleasant district in Preston county to erect and construct reservoirs and water power and electric power plants, for the storage and transportation and supply of water and water power and electric power for the aforesaid purposes. All of these purposes are certainly consistent with the public uses declared by the statute. It should not be presumed that it wants the land for a private use when it alleges that its purpose is to serve the public. It will be time enough for the state to interpose for the protection of the rights of the public when the company begins to pervert the use, if it should ever do so, to the neglect of the public which it proposes to serve. That the petition denominates one of the uses a commercial use does not necessarily mean that the commerce is private. A sale of electric light or power to the public, whether sold to the individual members composing it, or to a municipality for their benefit, is commerce.

The order shows that evidence was produced at the hearing, but the record contains none of it, not even a copy of condemnor's charter. We must therefore assume that the allegations of the petition were properly proven, and that the company is duly authorized by its charter to engage in the business proposed. It was chartered under the laws of the state of Pennsylvania; but the law of this state (§ 30, chap. 54, Code 1906) extends to it the same rights, powers, and privileges that are conferred upon a domestic corporation created for the same purpose, on compliance with the provisions of law relating to foreign corporations desiring to do business in this state, and subjects it to the same regulations, restrictions, and liabilities that are imposed upon like corporations created by this state. This gives it the right of eminent domain, to be exercised, however, for the public use of the citizens of West Virginia. 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. § 310. The legislature may confer the power of eminent domain upon a foreign public-service corporation. 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. § 374, and numerous cases cited under note 52.

It is insisted in brief of counsel for plaintiff in error that no general public necessity is shown to exist for exercising the eminent domain for the purpose in question. This is not a judicial question, but a legislative one. 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 255, 596. In undertaking to pass on this question is where a few of the courts of the country have fallen into error.

Whether the necessity for taking the land in question exists in favor of the condemnor is largely a matter for its own determination. Id. § 597.

The order of the lower court will be affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF WISCONSIN

v.

WADHAMS OIL COMPANY.

(— Wis. —, 134 N. W. 1121.)

Criminal law — injunction against enforcement of statute — effect.

The existence of a preliminary order enjoining the enforcement of a statute relating to the inspection of oil pending a suit to test the constitutionality of the statute does not relieve one who makes sales in violation of the terms of the statute from prosecution thereunder, if the statute is ultimately held to be valid.

(March 12, 1912.)

CERTIFICATION by the Circuit Court for Sheboygan County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of the question whether or not the pendency of a suit to test the constitutionality of an oil inspection law was a defense to the liability of one accused of making sales of oil without compliance with its terms.

Note — STATE v. WADHAMS OIL Co. seems to be a case of first impression, as a search has disclosed no other case upon the question as to criminal responsibility for violation of a statute pending an injunction against the enforcement thereof.

As to criminal responsibility for violation of a statute after a judicial ruling that it was unconstitutional, and before that ruling had been changed, see note to State v. O'Neil, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 788.

Statement by Siebecker, J.:

July 31, 1909, the defendant commenced an action in equity to enjoin the state supervisor of inspectors of illuminating oils from executing chapter 363 of the Laws of 1909, known as the oil inspection law. A temporary injunction was issued enjoining the state supervisor and the inspectors from executing a law as against the defendant. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained in circuit court on October 18, 1909, and the temporary injunction was dissolved. On appeal to this court, a decision was rendered, sustaining the law as constitutional, and affirming the orders of the circuit court sustaining the demurrer and dissolving the injunction.

After the decision of this court, an information containing numerous counts was filed by the district attorney of Sheboygan county, charging the defendant with repeated violations of the oil inspection law during the pendency of the injunction in the equity case. The defendant was found guilty upon twenty-six counts.

The trial court, being in doubt as to whether or not this injunctive order issued in the action by the defendant against the state supervisor of inspectors of illuminating oils constitutes a defense to this prosecution, certifies the following question to this court: "Is the injunctive order issued by court commissioner Ryan in said equity action a defense in this action to the criminal prosecution of the Wadhams Oil Company for the violation of said act, as charged in said information, for sales of petroleum products made by said company during the pendency of such injunctive order, and contrary to the provisions of said act?"

Messrs. L. H. Bancroft, Attorney General, and Russell Jackson for the State.

Mr. George P. Miller, with Messrs. Marshutz & Hoffman, for defendant.

Siebecker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Assuming, without deciding, that, upon the ground that the oil inspection law (chapter 363, Laws of 1909) was an invalid act, the circuit court commissioner had jurisdiction to make the injunctive order in the action brought by the defendant against Edward L. Tracy, as state supervisor of inspectors of illuminating oils, and thereby to enjoin him from enforcing the provisions of the law providing for such inspection against the defendant, and from interfering with the conduct of its business in selling such oils without having had them inspected, we then have the question presented; Is this order a defense to the prosecution of the defendant criminally for violations of this law through sales made by it of oils, not inspected, as required by such law, during the pendency of such injunctive order, since the law was challenged as invalid legislation in the action wherein the restraining order was made?

The contention of the defendant is that the defendant is protected against the incurring of the penalties for selling oils contrary to the mandate of the law during the pendency of such preliminary order. The injunctive order here involved restrained the oil inspectors from inspecting plaintiff's oils and from instituting civil and criminal suits during its pendency. The order was unquestionably made upon the ground that the court had jurisdiction within its equity powers to enjoin such prosecutions in order to protect the plaintiff's property rights, and because it deemed that such rights would be imperiled by the execution of a void statute through wrongfully subjecting the plaintiff to a multitude of civil and criminal suits, and through harassing it to an extent that would amount to a deprivation of the right which entitles every person to a certain remedy in the law for the redress of injuries he may receive in his person or property. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. v. Bradley, 108 Wis. 467, 84 N. W. 870; Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co. v. Superior, 117 Wis. 297, 93 N. W. 1120.

The argument is made that whatever protection the defendant would have under such an order, had the law been unconstitutional, must be given it during the pendency of the order, though it was finally adjudged that the legislative act was constitutional; and that it must result from this that the defendant, by force of the preliminary order, was exempted from the operation of the statute during the pendency of the order. This gives an effect to such a preliminary restraining order wholly beyond its purpose and function. It is well recognized that such orders have been used and employed to maintain the status quo of the rights of parties, and thus protect persons against irreparable injuries in the law. Its legal object is to preserve a person's property or rights in controversy, until a final adjudication is reached upon the merits of the controversy; but it does not, in a legal sense, conclude the rights of the parties. The very nature of the remedy suggests that it can have no other effect than to maintain the existing status of a party's personal and property rights until a court can finally adjudge whether they would be imperiled. The effect thereof is not to exempt a person from the operation of the law, or to suspend it as to him. It does no more than postpone the enforcement of the law until the rights of the persons under the law are declared by a final judgment of a court exercising jurisdiction in the matter. As declared in Consolidated Vinegar Works v. Brew, 112 Wis. 610, 88 N. W. 603: "The proper function of such an order (at least in ordinary cases) is simply to restrain the commission of some act or acts during the progress of the litigation, or, as otherwise expressed, to maintain the status quo." See also Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. v. Bradley, 108 Wis. 467, 84 N. W. 870; McCord v. Akeley, 132 Wis. 195, 122 Am. St. Rep. 956, 111 N. W. 1100; Leavenworth, L. & G. R. Co. v. Clemmans, 14 Kan. 82; Audenried v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 68 Pa. 370, 8 Am. Rep. 185.

It necessarily follows that the defendant was subject to the legislative act during the pendency of the preliminary restraining order, and during this time it acted at its peril in committing any act violating its provisions, if the act should finally be adjudged to be a valid legislative enactment. It therefore follows that the preliminary injunctive order in the equity action is no defense in this criminal prosecution against the defendant for violations of the law, as alleged in the information filed herein, for sales of petroleum products made by it during the pendency of such injunctive order.

References in defendant's brief to the litigation embraced in the equitable action brought by it against the supervisor of inspectors of illuminating oils as a prerogative cause are erroneous. The action was manifestly an ordinary suit in equity to restrain interference with rights and property under an invalid act, and hence without authority of law. State ex rel. Bolens v. Frear, 148 Wis. 456, 134 N. W. 673, 135 N. W. 164. The question submitted under the report of the case to this court, pursuant to § 4721, Stats., must be answered in the negative.

The question reported is answered: No.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SECOND CIRCUIT.

UNDERGROUND ELECTRIC RAILWAYS COMPANY OF LONDON, Limited,

v.

LOUIS S. OWSLEY, Exr., etc., of Charles T. Yerkes, Deceased, et al., Impleaded, etc., Appts.

(— C. C. A. —, 196 Fed. 278.)

Dower — Liability to pay accrued taxes.

1. Under a statute providing that a widow shall be endowed of a third part of the property whereof her husband died seised, taxes which accrued prior to assignment of the dower cannot, in favor of others entitled to share in the estate, be deducted from the cash value of her dower interest, which she agrees to take in lieu of dower upon sale of the property, whether they accrued before or after the death of the husband.

Same — effect of agreement.

2. A provision in an agreement of a widow to take cash in lieu of dower upon sale of the property that the dower shall be valued as of the date of admeasurement does not subject her interest to the lien of taxes which accrued before that date.

Same — occupancy before assignment — agreement as to charges.

3. Under an agreement that, in case a widow will take her dower interest in cash, her occupancy of the property before assignment of dower shall be without charge to her, it is not chargeable with taxes even though occupancy prior to assignment might, under some circumstances, render her interest so subject.

Same — purchase money mortgage — payment of taxes — priority.

4. Under a statute making a widow's dower interest subordinate to the lien of a purchase-money mortgage, it is also subordinate to the lien which the mortgage gives the mortgagee for taxes which he is compelled to pay upon the property, and she is not entitled to reimbursement for the amount of such lien by the heirs, who are not required to protect her dower interest against such taxes.

(April 9, 1912.)

Note. — Right to consider accrued taxes in assigning dower or fixing its cash value.

Earlier cases on this subject may be found in note to Defreeze v. Lake, 32 L.R.A. 748.

Generally, a widow should not be required to pay taxes assessed after her husband's death, and before assignment of her dower, unless she is in possession during such time, or unless it is otherwise provided by statute, 14 Cyc. 1016.

Thus taxes paid by the grantees of the husband before any demand is made by the widow for the assignment of her dower should not be taken into consideration in estimating the value of her dower estate. Felch v. Finch, 52 Iowa, 563, 3 N. W. 570. So, a widow's dower right is not to be diminished on account of taxes paid on her husband's real estate after his death and before setting off of dower. Wild v. Toms, 123 Iowa, 747, 99 N. W. 700.

Nor is the dower interest subject to be applied to payment of any part of the taxes. Smith v. Cornell, 19 Jones & S. 354.

And where a widow, without having dower assigned, remains in the mansion house with her infant children, whom she supports, and in order to save her estate pays the taxes, she is entitled to be subrogated to the lien

CROSS APPEALS by certain of the defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for the United States for the Southern District of New York dividing a certain reserve fund under a prior decree directing a sale of property of Charles T. Yerkes, deceased, and a division of the proceeds; executors of the widow appealing from so much of the decree as treated the taxes which had accumulated subsequent to the death of the husband as liens superior to the widow's dower; and the executor of the husband's estate appealing from so much as decreed that the taxes accumulating during his life were to be disregarded in estimating the cash value of the widow's dower. Modified and affirmed.

Statement by Noyes, Circuit Judge:

Cross appeals by Charles Sims and others, as executors of the will of Mary Adelaide Yerkes, deceased, and by Louis S. Owsley, as executor of the will of Charles T. Yerkes, deceased, from a decree of the circuit court, southern district of New York, entered November 11, 1911, dividing of the commonwealth, and as against the judgment creditors of her late husband, to have the amount of the taxes so paid refunded to her out of the property. Simmons v. Lyle, 32 Gratt. 752. It is contended in the above case that the widow is to be regarded as a tenant for life, and as such bound for the taxes, but the court regards the interest of the widow under the statute more analogous to a tenancy at will; remarking that it does not mean to say it is actually such a tenancy, because that, perhaps, could arise only under contract, but that it has most of the features of an estate at will. The court says that if, though the default of an heir, the widow, to save her estate, is compelled to pay what the law requires him to pay, she may compel him to refund the amount so paid for his benefit; that if the heir is unwilling to pay the taxes while the widow is in the occupation of the mansion house, all he has to do is to assign her dower and thus relieve himself of the taxes upon one third of the estate. Failing in this, it is fairly to be presumed he is content to bear the burden upon his inheritance, notwithstanding the widow may be in the possession and enjoyment of it. These views, says the court, are undoubtedly true as applied to an adult heir, whose duty it is to assign dower and who is delinquent in the performance of his duty. But the rule is by no means so clear as applied to an infant heir of tender years, without other guardian than the mother, and who continues to reside in the mansion house without applying for an assignment of dower. In this case, however, during all the period of the occupation of the mansion house by the widow, she has maintained and supported the two infant heirs out of her own a certain fund reserved under a prior decree of said court in said cause.

In April, 1909, the Underground Electric Railways Company, a creditor of the estate of Charles T. Yerkes, filed a bill in the circuit court, praying, among other things, for the appointment of a receiver to take possession of certain real and personal property of said estate situated in the city of New York, and a receiver was duly appointed. The opinion of the circuit court, with respect to the appointment of a receiver, is reported in 169 Fed. 671, and that of this court in affirmance in 99 C. C. A. 500, 176 Fed. 26.

At the time of the appointment of the receiver the property was in the possession of Mary Adelaide Yerkes, widow of Charles T. Yerkes, who claimed to own the greater part of it, both the real and personal.

In January, 1910, a decree was entered by the circuit court in said cause, directing, among other things, the sale by the receiver of the real estate aforesaid and the payment to said widow of the cash scanty means. If, therefore, they have sustained any loss by the widow's failure to have dower assigned to her by her occupation of their two thirds, they have been more than compensated by the support and maintenance furnished them.

So, a widow who, by virtue of statute, remains in the house of her husband after his death until dower is assigned, is not subject to the duties of a tenant for life to pay ordinary taxes. Spinning v. Spinning, 41 N. J. Eq. 427, 5 Atl. 278, affirmed in 43 N. J. Eq. 215, 10 Atl. 270.

And it is held in Anderson v. Fitzpatrick, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1617, 49 S. W. 786, that a widow of a vendor of land, who did not join in the mortgage executed by her husband, can recover, as damages for nonassignment of dower, one third of the reasonable rental value of the property less her proportion of taxes, insurance, and necessary repairs, from the institution of her suit.

But it is held in Peyton v. Jeffries, 50 Ill. 143, that a widow is liable for taxes assessed upon one third of the premises of her deceased husband, subsequent to the time of making demand and before allotment of dower. This decision rests upon the rule that the tenant in dower stands in the same position as a tenant for life, and as such is subject to the charges, duties, and services to which the estate may be liable, in proportion to her interest.

So, where the widow, before assignment of dower, occupies by virtue of statute the land of her deceased husband free from rent and without accounting for the profits and gains made from it, she must pay the taxes thereon. Wheeler v. Dawson, 63 Ill. 54; Lambert v. Hemler, 244 Ill. 254, 91 N. E. 435.

J. D. C.

value of her dower interest therein, in accordance with the provisions of a settlement agreement theretofore entered into by the parties in interest. This agreement provided that the widow should waive any claim of ownership, and should receive the cash value of her dower in the real estate in question estimated under a rule of the supreme court of New York. This amounted to 20.18 per cent of the cash value of the real estate. The widow had also waived the provisions of the will of her husband giving her the life use in certain of the New York real estate.

The settlement agreement further provided that during the pendency of the receivership cause and until a sale thereof, the widow should continue to occupy the real estate "without rent or other charge therefor for any period since the death of said Charles T. Yerkes."

The taxes assessed against said real estate during the lifetime of Charles T. Yerkes, and which were unpaid at his decease, amounted, with interest, to $81,266.08. The taxes assessed against said real estate after the death of Charles T. Yerkes and down to the time of the sale of the same in pursuance of said decree of January, 1910, amounted, with interest, to $110,113.49.

The parties in interest were unable to agree whether any or all of said unpaid taxes should be deducted from the sale price of said real estate before estimating the cash value of the widow's dower under the settlement, and, consequently, said decree of January, 1910, provided that the encumbrances, including taxes, should be paid by the receiver, and that after payment of 20.18 per cent of the residue to the widow there should be reserved a "further sum of 20.18 per cent of the amount paid for taxes on said property; it being left to the further determination and order of this court what portion thereof, if any, is payable to the widow in settlement of her dower in said property."

In accordance with the foregoing provision the sum of $38,620.40 was reserved by the receiver from the proceeds of the sale, and such sum is now in his hands.

The circuit court ruled that the taxes which had accumulated during the life of said Charles T. Yerkes were to be disregarded in estimating the cash value of the widow's dower, and, consequently, that the amount reserved as against the payment of such taxes should be paid over to the executors of the widow (she having died during the pendency of the proceedings), but that the taxes which had accumulated after the death of the husband were to be treated as liens upon the real 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) estate superior to the dower, and that the amount reserved against such taxes should be paid over to the executor of the husband.

The executor of the husband's estate and the executors of the widow's estate have taken cross appeals to this court.

Argued before Coxe and Noyes, Circuit Judges, and Holt, District Judge.

Mr. Carroll G. Walter, with Messrs. Kearny & Dickinson, for executors Sims et al.:

The dower right of a widow is a right to a third part of all the lands whereof her husband was seised of an estate of inheritance at any time during the marriage, and she is not chargeable with, nor is her right subject to, any deduction on account of, taxes.

The lower court erred in holding that the widow's dower interest was subject to the lien of the taxes assessed after her husband's death, and in awarding the percentage reserved on account of such taxes to the husband's executor.

Mr. Arthur H. Van Brunt, with Messrs. W. Orison Underwood and Joline, Larkin, & Rathbone, for executor Owsley:

Noyes, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The widow was entitled to dower. Both the settlement agreement and the decree recognized her right. The former stated that it existed and provided for the sale of the lands so that she should "receive the cash value of her dower." The latter provided for payments to the widow out of the proceeds of the sale "for her dower." The case is one of dower, and nothing else. The inquiry is whether the widow took her share free from, or burdened with, unpaid taxes.

Lord Bacon said as early as 1641¹ that it was then "the common byword in the law that the law favored three things,—(1) life, (2) liberty, (3) dower" (Bacon, Uses, p. 37). The Year Books and other early reports show the vigilance of the courts in watching over widows' interests. And from those times to these the right of dower has always been highly esteemed in the law. We must start with the proposition that the law will not favor deductions from the widow's thirds.

Upon the death of the husband the widow's right of dower in his realty becomes consummate. It has ceased to be a contingency. But still it remains a mere right in the nature of a chose in action. The widow has the right to have a freehold estate assigned to her, but she has no estate until it is assigned.

Presumably the tenant of the freehold is bound to pay the taxes until he assigns the dower. Heirs and devisees have the vested, existing estate. The widow, before dower assignment, is without estate. The law must be clear to prefer heirs or devisees to the widow, and to charge a tax on real estate upon her mere right of action. And if an heir or devisee will not be preferred, a creditor or a representative of creditors will stand in no better position. The claims of creditors, heirs, devisees, and legatees are subordinate to the widow's right of dower, and, with respect to it, they all stand upon the same plane.

We must, then, regard as settled as preliminary principles that the law will not look with favor upon deductions from the widow's dower, and that, before assignment, a widow has no interest to be taxed as an estate in the lands. And so we recur to the inquiry whether this widow was properly burdened with any of these taxes which all accrued before her dower was assigned. Stated more precisely, the question is whether under the laws of New York, in awarding to a widow a share of the proceeds of real estate in lieu of dower therein, unpaid taxes upon such real estate should first be deducted, or whether such share should be in the proceeds without deduction. But it must be observed that this inquiry does not involve any right of state or municipality, because the taxes have been paid. It is altogether between the widow and the other persons entitled to share in her husband's estate.

The right of dower in this state is fixed by statute, which provides (New York real property law, § 190): "A widow shall be endowed of the third part of all the lands whereof her husband was seised of an estate of inheritance at any time during the marriage."

This was the right which—as we have seen—the agreement and the decree recognized, and it was not changed in its essential nature by the provision for dividing the proceeds of the real estate, instead of the real estate itself. If the widow were entitled to a third part of the lands, and were not chargeable—as between the parties interested in the estate—with unpaid taxes, she was entitled to her agreed dower share in the proceeds of the real estate without deduction on account of such taxes.

Now, there is nothing in the language of the statute to indicate that a widow's right of dower is subject to any deductions whatsoever, and the underlying principles which we have examined tend to the conclusion that it is not so subject. If, in addition, we find the authorities in the state of New York, as well as those elsewhere, pointing in the same direction, there will be little difficulty in disposing of the case.

In Harrison v. Peck, 56 Barb. 251 (decided in 1870) the question was very similar to that arising here. In that case the contest was between a devisee and a doweress; the inquiry was whether the latter was bound to pay the taxes which had accrued upon the land assigned to her as dower before such assignment was made, and embracing taxes assessed both before and after the death of the husband. The New York supreme court held that the widow was not bound to pay the taxes, and, after quoting the dower statutes, said: "There is no qualification or condition in this section, and the sections of the statute relating to it and the admeasurement of dower indicate a clear intention of the legislature that, as between the widow and the heir or devisee, this provision shall be enforced unburthened, . . . if that may be, except from the time an assignment of the dower has been made."

In Taylor v. Bentley, 3 Redf. 34, 41 (decided by the New York surrogate's court in 1877), the decision in Harrison v. Peck, supra, was followed.

In Smith v. Cornell, 19 Jones & S. 354 (decided by the New York superior court in 1885), the court said: "The dower interest was, in law, not subject to be applied to payment of any part of the taxes." Citing Harrison v. Peck, supra.

In Vanderbeck v. Rochester, 122 N. Y. 285, 25 N. E. 408 (1890) the court of appeals, in considering whether an assessment paid by a wife upon land belonging to her husband could be recovered, said, in holding that the payment was voluntary: "The only interest she had in the lands was that of dower. And that interest was not in jeopardy, because, first, no steps had been taken by the respondent looking to a sale of the lands, and, second, as widow she was entitled to have her dower assigned to her unburthened with taxes and assessments payable out of her husband's estate." Citing Harrison v. Peck, supra.

The conclusions reached by the New York courts are those reached generally by the courts in this country.

Thus in Graves v. Cochran, 68 Mo. 74, the supreme court of Missouri said that a dower interest was not "to be diminished by the taxes, or any portion of the taxes assessed against the land, either in her husband's lifetime or in her quarantine."

In Branson v. Yancy, 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 77, it was held that a widow who, after the death of her husband, occupies 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

his residence, is under no obligation to pay the taxes accruing thereon between his death and the assignment of dower.

In Blodget v. Brent, 3 Cranch, C. C. 394, Fed. Cas. No. 1,553, it was held that a widow has no right to pay taxes assessed upon her husband's lands before the assignment of dower. The court said: "Before assignment of dower the widow has no right to pay the taxes or redeem. She looks to the tenant of the freehold, whoever he may be, and he is bound to pay the taxes until he assigns her dower."

In Felch v. Finch, 52 Iowa, 563, 3 N. W. 570, it was held that a widow was under no obligation to pay any portion of the taxes levied on the lands of her deceased husband before her dower had been assigned. And see Jonas v. Hunt, 40 N. J. Eq. 660, 5 Atl. 148; Spinning v. Spinning, 41 N. J. Eq. 427, 5 Atl. 278.

The rule thus well established by the authorities in this state and elsewhere, that a widow is under no obligation to pay taxes assessed against her husband's realty before the assignment of dower, seems decisive of the present case. The taxes in question were assessed before the dower was assigned, and, consequently, unless we find some special considerations controlling this case, no other conclusion is possible than that it was improper to hold back anything from the widow's share on account of taxes.

There is no distinction going to the result between the taxes assessed during the husband's lifetime and those assessed after his death but before the assignment of dower. In neither case was there any obligation to pay upon the part of the widow, and that is the question here. It is immaterial that as between executor and devisees or heirs, the statutes may specifically impose a duty in one case, and not in the other. Such statutes, by requiring the payment of taxes assessed during a decedent's lifetime out of personalty, may constitute an additional reason why such taxes should not be charged against the widow, but do not weaken her contention, upon the principles stated, that she is under no obligation to pay taxes accruing between the husband's death and the assignment of dower.

Some stress is laid in the opinion of the circuit court upon the provision in the settlement agreement that the dower should be valued as of the date of admeasurement which was after a lien for the taxes had come into existence in favor of the municipality. We think, however, that this provision merely gave the widow the right—which she would probably have had without it—to share in any increase in the value of the property after the husband's death. But it did not make—as between the persons interested in the estate—a claim for moneys paid to discharge the tax liens a charge against the widow's share. A provision for valuing property at a particular time has no especial bearing upon the question whether discharged municipal liens can be treated as existing against the right of dower. It does not follow that liens which exist in favor of the municipality create, when they are paid off, any charge in favor of or against other interests.

It must be distinctly borne in mind that the parties did not agree that the widow should receive a stated percentage of the husband's estate subject to liens existing at a particular time. As already pointed out, they agreed that she should have dower, which carried with it the rights and obligations attaching to dower. The right became consummate upon the husband's death. She had the right to share in the property then existing, which was in no way limited by the agreement that it should be valued as of the date when ad-measured.

The contention is made by the executor of the husband's estate, that it is "equitable" that, as this widow had the use of the real estate after the husband's death and before the assignment of dower, she should bear her share of the taxes assessed during such time. It would, perhaps, be a sufficient answer to this contention to say that the widow was entitled to dower as a matter of law, and that the amount of dower is determinable by law, and not by equitable considerations. Let us assume, however, that the amount of dower may depend upon equities, and that a widow who occupies lands of her husband's estate before assignment of dower should, as a matter of justice, pay the taxes assessed against such lands during her occupancy. Such obligation, if it exist, is obviously based upon those principles of fair dealing which would require the payment of compensation for value received. But if a widow relinquishes claims to the ownership of lands, and thereupon it is agreed that her occupancy thereof before assignment of dower shall be without charge to her, there is no more reason why she should pay the taxes assessed against the premises than that she should pay rent or any other consideration for the use. And we think that is substantially what was done in this case. The settlement agreement provided, as we have seen, that the widow should occupy the premises "without rent or other charge therefor for any period since the death of said Charles T. Yerkes." We fail to see how language could be better framed to absolve the widow from any obligation to meet the taxes or any other charge. In view of this provision, the widow's right of dower was unaffected by the fact of her occupancy. In view of this provision, also, the question whether, in case the widow occupied for a time as life tenant under the will and subsequently renounced the will, she would be liable for use and occupation, is unimportant. Any such liability was discharged in the settlement agreement, and affords no basis for a diminution of dower.

We have thus far considered the case as relating to lands to which the general dower statute is applicable. It appears, however, that a portion of the real estate was subject to a mortgage executed by the husband, Charles T. Yerkes, to the grantor for unpaid purchase money. This purchase-money mortgage contained a provision authorizing, upon default, the mortgagee to pay taxes and assessments, and providing that the obligation to repay the same should constitute a lien upon the premises and be secured by the mortgage. The mortgagee in fact paid $35,574.66 for taxes, and, in accordance with an express provision of the decree of January, 1910, such amount, with interest, was repaid by the receiver as a part of the mortgage debt.

This land, subject to the purchase-money mortgage, stood, with respect to dower, in a position very different from the other lands of the husband's estate. A purchase-money mortgage is always superior to the wife's right of dower. Indeed, it is generally stated that a purchaser who executes a mortgage for the purchase money acquires no such seisin, as against the holder of the mortgage, as will entitle his widow to dower. And this is substantially that which is provided by statutory enactment in New York. There is a statute here which particularly relates to dower in lands mortgaged for purchase money, and which provides, in substance, that a widow is not entitled to dower in such lands "as against the mortgagee or those claiming under him," but is entitled to dower in such lands as against every other person. New York real property law, § 193.

Under this statute the only dower interest which this widow obtained in the land mortgaged for the purchase money was in the equity of redemption. The lien of the mortgage was paramount to the dower, and we think it the better view that the amounts paid for taxes secured by the mortgage were paramount also. The statute says, in effect, that a purchase-money mortgage takes precedence of dower, and we perceive no ground upon which a disinction can be drawn between the demand for the purchase money itself which is secured by the mortgage, and the demand for the incident thereto—the amount paid for taxes to protect the mortgage debt—which was likewise secured by the mortgage.

Of course it does not necessarily follow from the fact that the mortgagee's right to reimbursement for taxes paid was paramount to dower, that the amount paid to the mortgagee must be charged against the dower interest in favor of heir, devisee, or creditor. If the persons interested in the estate owed the widow an obligation to keep down the amount secured by the purchase-money mortgage, there would be ground for claiming that her dower in the equity of redemption should not be diminished by the taxes. But no such obligation is pointed out to us. Indeed it is held in the state of New York, with respect to mortgages in general, that a husband owes the wife "no duty enforced in law or equity to pay mortgages to relieve her dower." Dunharr v. Rau, 135 N. Y. 219, 222, 32 N. E. 49, 50. See also Hawley v. Bradford, 9 Paige, 200, 37 Am. Dec. 390.

Upon the whole we think it the better view that the widow was entitled to dower in the proceeds of this particular land only to the extent that the sale price thereof exceeded the amount paid to the mortgagee for the mortgage debt and for reimbursement of taxes paid. In other words, the widow's estate is not entitled to the moneys reserved as representing a percentage of the taxes paid to the holder of the purchase-money mortgage.

The decree appealed from must be modified—but without costs—so as to provide that the entire amount in the hands of the receiver, with the exception stated in the preceding paragraph, shall be paid to the executors of the will of the widow, Mary Adelaide Yerkes, and that the remainder only shall be paid to the executors of the will of the husband, Charles T. Yerkes. And it is so ordered.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF IOWA, Appt.,

v.

C. A. MORGAN.

(— Iowa, —, 136 N. W. 521.)

Criminal law — refusal to maintain wife — former jeopardy.

Conviction of failure to maintain one's wife, contrary to the provisions of the statute, is not a bar to a prosecution for continued failure to maintain her after serving the sentence on the former conviction.

(June 6, 1912.)

A PPEAL by the State from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County

Note. — Conviction or acquittal of marital offense as bar to a subsequent prosecution.

The question whether a conviction or acquittal of a marital offense is a bar to a subsequent prosecution depends upon the act or acts which, under the statute involved, constitute the offense. Where the gist of the offense is abandonment or desertion of one's wife, the offense is complete with the act of separation by the husband from the wife, and a conviction or acquittal is a bar to a subsequent prosecution. But where, as in Iowa, the statute is against failure to maintain one's wife, such failure for distinct periods of time constitutes distinct offenses, and a conviction is no bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same failure to provide during a distinct period of time.

Thus, under a statute denouncing as an offense the neglect of a person to provide for the support of his wife and minor children, in necessitous circumstances, a conviction is no bar to a subsequent prosecution for a like neglect and failure during a period of time not covered by the prior conviction, as the neglect and failure during each of the two distinct periods constitute distinct offenses under the statute. Re Baurens, 117 La. 136, 41 So. 442.

And where one has been convicted, under a statute, of being a disorderly person, in that he neglected to provide support for his wife according to his means, and, upon giving an undertaking, has been discharged from imprisonment pending an appeal from the conviction, such proceedings are no bar to a subsequent prosecution, pending the appeal, upon a new complaint for the same cause, as the defendant's continued neglect to provide for his wife's support according to his means constitutes a new offense,—though "if he had been imprisoned in pursuance of the first conviction, or had given an undertaking for the support of his wife, as was required by the statute and the decision of the police justice, he could not, during the pendency of his imprisonment, or the life of the undertaking, have been proceeded against again for not supporting his wife." People ex rel. Lichtenstein v. Hodgson, 126 N. Y. 647, 27 N. E. 378.

On the other hand, under a statute against wife abandonment or desertion, and neglect or refusal to provide for her, which makes the gist of the offense the act of separation by the husband from the wife, and his refusal, in connection therewith, to provide for her, and not merely his remaining away, a conviction of abandonment of one's wife is a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same offense, alleged to have been committed at a subsequent period, acquitting defendant of the charge of failure to furnish support for his wife. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George Cosson, Attorney General, and John Fletcher, Assistant Attorney General, for the State:

One conviction is not a bar.

State v. Dvoracek, 140 Iowa, 266, 118 N. W. 399; State v. Witham, 70 Wis. 473, 35 N. W. 934.

Mr. W. T. Maxey for appellee.

Sherwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is now, and has been since January, 1906, the husband of Martha E. Morgan. In May, 1909, he was indicted for refusing and neglecting to maintain and provide for his wife; and he was later convicted under said indictment and sentenced to the penitentiary, where he served his term. After his discharge therefrom, where the defendant has never returned to his wife since the filing of the original complaint against him, but merely continues to refuse to live with her or to furnish her means to live on. State v. Miller, 90 Mo. App. 131.

And under a statute making it a misdemeanor for any husband to "wilfully abandon his wife without providing adequate support for such wife and the child or children which he has begotten upon her," a conviction of a husband abandoning his wife is a bar to a subsequent prosecution, where he has not lived with her since the first abandonment, but has simply continued to fail to provide adequate support for her and their child,—the gist of the offense being the act of separation, and not merely its continuance without providing adequate support. State v. Dunston, 78 N. C. 418.

So, a conviction of wife desertion and a subsequent conviction of deserting one's wife and child are a bar to a third prosecution for a desertion of wife and child which was a complete offense before either of the former convictions was had. Com. v. Bowman, 6 Kulp, 176.

And a conviction of desertion and non-support of one's wife is a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same desertion after the expiration of the defendant's sentence, where nothing has occurred since the former trial to change the situation and to make the defendant's subsequent refusal to live with and support his wife a new offense as desertion is a single act and a complete offense when it takes place. Com. v. Markley, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. 254.

And likewise, the dismissal of a prosecution for wife desertion, after a full hearing, is a bar to a subsequent prosecution for a desertion alleged to have taken place prior to the first prosecution, where nothing has occurred since the dismissal of that case to change the situation and make the dehe returned to Des Moines, his former home, and the home of his wife, and has since said time, without good cause, wilfully neglected and refused to maintain and provide for his wife, although she has been and is in a destitute condition. On the 20th day of March, 1911, the indictment in this case was returned against the defendant, charging that on or about the 1st day of May, 1910, and up to the time of filing the indictment, the defendant did wilfully, and without good cause, desert and refuse to maintain and provide for his said wife; she being then in a destitute condition. Pleas of not guilty and of a former adjudication were entered by the defendant, and at the close of the evidence the court, on the defendant's motion, directed a verdict of not guilty, on the ground alone of former conviction. The state appeals.

The only question presented on this appeal is whether a person, who has once been convicted and punished for wilfully neg-defendant's subsequent refusal to live with and support his wife a new offense. Com. v. Cawley, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 69.

But the dismissal of a prosecution for wife desertion, without a hearing upon the merits, on account of the failure of the wife to appear in court to sustain her charge, which failure was induced by defendant's promise to maintain and live with her, is not a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same offense. Com. v. Pickett, 10 Kulp, 68.

In this case, the court also said that, further, the defendant, by his promises, at the time his wife promised not to appear and prosecute, assumed his marital relations with her, and that thereafter a new offense began, for which the wife would be justified in maintaining a prosecution for desertion. Ibid.

As said, also, in Com. v. Bowman, 6 Kulp, 176: "The former convictions and imprisonment of the defendant did not dissolve the marriage tie, and we can conceive of a case where they would not be bar to a subsequent prosecution. For example, if after his release the defendant and his wife had come together, and he had subsequently deserted her again, it would seem that he might be prosecuted again for the new offense."

And in State v. Vollenweider, 94 Mo. App. 158, 67 S. W. 942, it was held that a conviction, under the Missouri statute, of abandonment of one's wife, is no bar to a subsequent prosecution for a repetition of the offense after the defendant has resumed conjugal relations with his wife; and a plea of former conviction of abandonment of one's wife at a date prior to the alleged date of the abandonment subsequently charged is demurrable, unless the defendant negatives the fact that he has resumed conjugal relations with his wife since the prior conviction. A. C. W.

lecting and refusing to maintain and provide for his wife, under § 4775a of the Code Supplement, can be again tried and punished for refusing and neglecting to maintain and provide for her, after the expiration of his former sentence. The question is not entirely free from doubt; but we reach the conclusion that the finding of the trial court is not in accord with the legislative intent, as the same is expressed in the entire act under consideration, nor in accord with the construction which this court has, in effect, heretofore given the statute.

So far as material here, § 4775a reads as follows: "Every person who shall, without good cause, wilfully neglect or refuse to maintain or provide for his wife, she being in a destitute condition, or who shall, without good cause, abandon his or her legitimate or legally adopted child or children under the age of sixteen years, leaving such child or children in a destitute condition, or shall, without good cause, wilfully neglect or refuse to provide for such child or children, they being in a destitute condition, shall be deemed guilty of desertion." This section clearly makes it a crime to neglect or refuse to maintain or provide for the wife, or to abandon the child or children, or to neglect or refuse to provide for such child or children. By neglecting or refusing to provide for or maintain his wife, the husband incurs the penalty; and by abandoning the child or children, or by neglecting to provide for such child or children, either the husband or wife, or both, incur the penalty. Three distinct cases are thus provided for and punished; and they are all named as "desertion" in the statute.

But this designation is not controlling in construing such statutes. The court should, and does, go beyond the mere name, and determine the acts that are made offenses against the statute and that incur the penalty. Mere desertion, or abandonment, the words being synonymous, of the wife, incurs no penalty. It is the wilful neglect or refusal, without good cause, to maintain or provide for her in her destitution that incurs the penalty. A husband, without any cause, and with ample means, may desert or abandon his wife, without bringing upon himself the punishment provided in this statute, unless it be shown that he left his wife in a destitute condition. In other words, a rich husband may desert a rich wife without violating this statute; and, if that be true, it is the neglect or refusal to maintain or provide for the wife that the statute punishes, and not the mere act of desertion; and as long as the condition named in the statute exists the husband band is, in our opinion, subject to the penalty. He cannot, of course, be twice punished for the same offense; but his neglect and refusal to provide for his wife, after he had served his former sentence, constitutes a new, separate, and distinct violation of this statute, for which he may be punished. Our conclusion as to the proper construction to be given the section under consideration is strengthened by § 4775c of the same act, which provides, in substance, that the defendant may be released upon giving a continuing bond, conditioned that he will furnish his wife with a "necessary and proper home, food, care, and clothing."

In State v. Dvoracek, 140 Iowa, 266, 118 N. W. 399, the defendant deserted his wife and children before § 4775a became a law, which was on the 28th day of March, 1907. In September, 1907, he was indicted for neglecting to maintain and provide for his wife and children, and we sustained the conviction that followed. The question presented in this case was not considered in that opinion; but it is manifest that the judgment could not have been sustained if this defendant's contention is right; for, if the statute punishes for mere desertion, that crime had been completed long before this statute was enacted.

There was a statute in Wisconsin that provided a penalty for abandoning the wife, or for the refusal or neglect to provide for her. And in State v. Witham, 70 Wis. 473, 35 N. W. 934, the court held that, while the abandonment occurred before the law took effect, still the wilful refusal to provide for the wife continued to the time of the trial; and that the defendant was liable, under the statute, for the penalty imposed for such neglect. The decision supports our conclusion in this case.

The judgment should be, and it is, reversed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

V. MURRAY et al., Appts.,

v.

W. T. COWHERD.

(148 Ky. 591, 147 S. W. 6.)

Master and servant — Liability of servant for nonfeasance.

1. A servant whose duty is to maintain telephone poles in safe condition cannot avoid liability for injury to a stranger through the fall of a pole, because of his negligence, on the theory that he was guilty merely of nonfeasance.

Trial — definiteness of verdict — sufficiency.

2. A mere finding for plaintiff for a certain amount, in an action against two to recover damages for personal injuries, is sufficiently definite if the jury were instructed that they might find against either or both, or might find one sum against one and another different one against the other, in which case they must state how much was found against each.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Taylor County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs Helm Bruce, John A. Wolford, and Bruce & Bullitt for appellants.

Mr. W. M. Jackson, with W. C. McChord, for appellee:

Servant who undertakes to discharge a duty to the public for the master, and enters upon the discharge of such duty, owes the same duty to the public and stands in the same relation thereto as the master; and the servant is jointly liable with the master to an individual who is injured, while in the exercise of a legal right, by the negligence or nonfeasance of the servant as to such duty.

Banks, 144 Ky. 137, 137 S. W. 1066.

Winn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Campbellsville & Greensburg Telephone Company is a corporation with its poles and line extending along the turnpike between the two towns. G. V. Murray is its president and general manager. On April 1, 1911, W. T. Cowherd was knocked from his farm wagon, which he was driving along the road, by a telephone pole which fell over upon him. He was partially paralyzed by the accident and suffered no little, both bodily and pecuniarily. He brought his action against the appellants for damage, and upon a trial recovered a judgment of $2,875, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

The petition charges the negligence of the company in maintaining the decayed pole; that Murray had charge of, and direct supervision over, the construction and maintenance of these poles and wires; that it was his duty to keep and maintain them in good repair and safe condition; that the defendant's negligence permitted this particular pole to become out of repair and unsafe, and to remain so for an unreasonable length of time. There is then a specific charge that Murray inspected the pole which fell upon Cowherd, but that he was negligent and careless in his inspection, and approved the pole as being safe when it was not so. The evidence discloses that Murray customarily discharged the duties of inspection and maintenance, and when an inspection disclosed the unsound condition of a pole he would cause it to be broken out and reset. He was the president and general manager of the company, and doubtless had at command its supplies without the formality of application to any superior to furnish them. There was further evidence before the jury that he inspected that particular pole one week before it fell; that the decayed condition could have been seen had he gone to it and looked at the foot of it; that on the day when he did inspect it his presence there was occasioned by the fact that the pole next in line to it, and across the turnpike from it, had fallen, and he had gone there to reset that pole; that after resetting it he inspected the poles immediately on both sides of it in the line to see whether or not they had been affected by the falling and resetting of that pole.

No substantial complaint of the verdict and judgment is made by the telephone company. The reversal is urged in behalf of Murray. He takes the position that at the most his negligence was that of nonfeasance, the failure to inspect the pole properly; and that a servant is not liable for an injury resulting alone from his non-activity; that his duty was a duty which he owed alone to his employer, the telephone company; and that if he failed to perform this duty of inspection he is answerable alone to the company, his superior and employer.

The distinction sought to be drawn between a servant's acts of misfeasance and those of nonfeasance, resulting in an injury to another, with his consequent liability in the one case and his nonliability in the other, does not obtain in Kentucky, when the negligence, whether of misfeasance or nonfeasance, involves some breach of the servant's duty. It is not his position of service, but his relation as an individual wrongdoer to the party injured, which fixes his liability. Haynes v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 145 Ky. 209, 140 S. W. 176. Certainly under the particular facts of the case at bar the distinction is immaterial; for, under the evidence, supra, the pole was decayed and a menace to the travelers upon the highway. The defect could have been discovered by an inspection. It was the duty of Murray to inspect and maintain the line. He owed such travelers an affirmative duty in the exercise of reasonable care to inspect and maintain this pole in safety. For his negligent failure to discharge this duty, whether it be called misfeasance or nonfeasance, liability attaches to him in favor of one injured by it.

While, as remarked above, the doctrine is settled in this state that the servant is personally liable, whether his act be that of misfeasance or nonfeasance, when the injury flows from some breach of a duty owed by him, there are none the less certain points made in the able brief for the appellants which need to be answered, and certain authorities cited which need to be discussed and differentiated, in order that no misapprehension of our position may grow up.

The first case cited by appellants is that of Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Robertson, 115 Ky. 858, 74 S. W. 1061, a removal case. In this case Brown, the resident defendant, according to the allegation of the petition, was required by the railway company to see that mechanical appliances of a certain nature were supplied on the engines. Those supplied were not of that nature. It was not charged that the master had supplied Brown with different or better appliances. The engineer was injured by a defect in such an appliance. Upon the trial it was developed that Brown furnished to the engineer precisely the same appliances that were supplied to him by the railway company; and the case turned upon the question as to whether a servant can be made liable to an inferior servant because of the master's failure to provide safe and suitable machinery, although it was the superior servant's duty to look after the machinery. It was answered that such a liability would attach; but that where the injury resulted to some third person because the servant failed to act, the servant, upon general authority, was not personally liable. The court added, as to this general doctrine, that it was not prepared to say that it could be sustained in sound reason to its fullest extent, and that the facts in that case relieved the court from considering whether mere nonfeasance upon the part of Brown would have rendered him liable. When the court came at a later time to try the Haynes Case, it departed from the suggestion made in the Robertson Case, and held that where the injury resulted from a failure to discharge a duty, whether of misfeasance or nonfeasance, the servant himself would be liable. In the Robertson Case it is to be noted that Brown was an inferior servant of the company, and though charged with the duty of inspection, was supplied with no other or different or better appliances than those which caused the injury; while in the case at bar there is a pregnant difference, in that Murray himself testifies that whenever his inspection disclosed a bad pole, he would have it taken out and the pole reset. In other words, he had good appliances at command to supplant the defective ones which his inspection might discover.

The next case cited is that of Dudley v. Illinois C. R. Co. 127 Ky. 221, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1186, 128 Am. St. Rep. 335, 96 S. W. 835, another removal case. A brakeman on the railroad was struck by a waterspout leading from a supply tank out over the track to supply locomotives with water. He sued the company and joined with it as a defendant one Mitchell, charging that he was its superintendent or supervisor of pumps, tanks, and water appliances, and that he was directly in charge and control of the particular tank and spout which caused the injury. This court held that the petition stated a good cause of action against him, and that the trial court properly overruled the petition for removal at the beginning of the action. The evidence, however, disclosed that Mitchell was a subordinate employee of the railroad company, working under the superintendent, who had charge of the pumps and tanks. The court remarked that though it be assumed that it was Mitchell's duty to keep the tanks and appliances in repair, he could not be held liable, unless such a servant as he was is liable for nonfeasance, or for his failure affirmatively to take some action to remedy defects or dangerous appliances to which his attention might be called. This language is misleading, standing alone; and it must be read in connection with the further facts in the case, that Mitchell had nothing to do with erecting the tank, or adjusting any of the parts or appliances thereon, and that the evidence wholly failed to make out any case against Mitchell. We undertake to say that the case would have been ruled otherwise had the evidence disclosed that it was Mitchell's duty to inspect and maintain these appliances, and to take out defective, and from a store at his command supply sound, apparatus. Undoubtedly, had he failed in such a duty, though his failure were purely nonfeasance, he would have been personally liable—just as, in the case at bar, it was the duty of Murray to maintain sound poles and to take out defective ones, replacing them with sound ones, as he was in the habit of doing.

The next case is that of Ward v. Pullman Car Corp. 131 Ky. 142, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 343, 114 S. W. 754, which is cited by the appellants, not by way of sustaining their position, but for the purpose of endeavoring to explain away statements in its text which are against their position. This case, as well, was a removal case. In it we have before us alone the allegations of the petition. The lower court sustained the removal petition and removed the case to the Federal court; and the case that came to us was on appeal from that order. The case was decided here upon the allegations of the petition as to the individual defendants, Drayman and Glenn. It was charged that they were car inspectors in the employment of the Cincinnati, New Orleans, & Texas Pacific Railway Company, and that as such it was their duty to examine and inspect freight cars to ascertain whether, they were safe to be operated by the train men in the employment of the railroad. It was further charged that they had carelessly inspected a particular car and approved it, when, as a matter of fact, it was defective, and injured the plaintiff. The question was whether a cause of action was stated against the individuals. The opinion remarks the above set-out excerpt from the case of Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Robertson, 115 Ky. 861, 74 S. W. 1061, and that from Dudley v. Illinois C. R. Co. 127 Ky. 221, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1186, 128 Am. St. Rep. 335, 96 S. W. 835. The opinion then added that "there is a sharp conflict in the authorities as to whether a servant is liable to a third person for nonfeasance, and as to what is nonfeasance within the meaning of the rule." It was added that it was not necessary in the Ward Case to decide the true rule, because the acts of Drayman and Glenn were more than those of mere nonfeasance; that their approval sent the car out on the road, an affirmative act for which they were liable, as the car was defective in a way which could have been discovered by ordinary care.

The cases of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Coley, 121 Ky. 385, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 370, 89 S. W. 234, and Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Banks, 144 Ky. 137, 137 S. W. 1066, were both cases of affirmative or active negligence wherein servants of the railroad company were operating their engines without the due precaution to the traveling public. Both of these cases are cited by the appellants, but they are not especially in point here.

The next case cited by appellants is that of Haynes v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 145 Ky. 209, 140 S. W. 176. This also was a removal case. In it, for the first time, this court met and answered directly the supposed distinction between negligence of misfeasance and negligence of nonfeasance of a servant in the discharge of an imposed duty, as affecting his liability for injury resulting from his negligence. We quote at length from the opinion in the Haynes Case, because it is a clear statement of an established view of the court to which we desire to adhere: "Misfeasance is the performance of an act which might lawfully be done in an improper manner, by which another person receives an injury," while 'nonfeasance is the nonperformance of some act which ought to be performed.'—Bouvier's Law Dict. If the accident had been caused by either misfeasance or nonfeasance amounting to a breach of duty on the part of the engineer, we would hold him liable. In some jurisdictions the servant is not held accountable to third persons for nonfeasance, but is for misfeasance; but a contrary rule and one that is in accord with the weight of modern authority prevails in this state. We do not recognize any distinction so far as the accountability of the servant is concerned between acts of misfeasance and nonfeasance. Ward v. Pullman Car Corp. 131 Ky. 142, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 343, 114 S. W. 754; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Banks, 144 Ky. 137, 137 S. W. 1066; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Coley, 121 Ky. 385, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 370, 89 S. W. 234. If a servant performs in an unlawful manner an act that results in injury to a third person, or if a servant fails to observe a duty that he owes to third persons, and injury results from his fault of commission or omission, he is liable in damages. There is no reason for making a distinction between acts of commission and omission, when each involves a breach of duty. The servant is not personally liable in either case because the breach of duty was committed by him while acting in the capacity of servant; but responsibility attaches to him as an individual wrongdoer without respect to the position in which he acts or the relation he bears to some other person. It is the fact that the servant is guilty of a wrongful or negligent act amounting to a breach of duty that he owes to the injured person that makes him liable. It is not at all material whether his wrongful or negligent act is committed in an affirmative or wilful manner, or results from mere nonattention to a duty that he owes to third persons, and that it is entirely within his power to perform or omit to perform. There are innumerable situations and conditions presented in the everyday affairs of life that make it the duty of persons to so act as not to harm others, and when any person, whatever his position or relation in life may be, fails, from negligence, inattention, or wilfulness to perform the duty imposed, he will be liable."

It is true that in the Haynes Case the engineer was held not liable; but it was because the injury there was the result of defective machinery supplied by the master, in the selection of which the engineer had neither the right nor the duty to dictate to the master. It was very well said that when such things are furnished by the master and prove defective or unsafe, the liability attaches to the master, and not to the servant; and that it would be a most unreasonable doctrine to hold a person responsible for defects in machinery that he was merely employed to use under the direction of a superior, who possessed the exclusive right to furnish the tools or machinery used by him. This is a just and wise statement of what reason and justice would suggest as the fair rule. The negro man, for instance, who accompanied Murray in his inspection trips and assisted in taking out and putting in poles and other repair work with material and tools furnished alone by the master, would not be liable, because of defects in either, for injuries occurring because of the defects. Murray, however, stands in an altogether different position. He was the president and general manager of the telephone company. He therefore had control of its supplies. It was his duty to inspect and to maintain the poles in a sound condition, a duty which, according to some of the evidence, he did not discharge in this particular instance. He says as well that when he found a pole unsafe he would break it off and reset it, a course which he undoubtedly could have followed with this particular pole, whether or not he had a new one at command to replace it. Under the facts stated, the quotation from the Haynes Case clearly fixes the personal liability of Murray.

Some effort is made in the brief of appellants to weaken as authority here these removal cases, because their discussion of the servant's liability is only in their aspect toward the right of removal to the Federal court. It is difficult to conceive any manner of case which would present a more clear-cut opportunity to pass on such liability. If there was such liability of the resident servant, there was no right of removal in the nonresident corporations. If the resident servant were not liable, the nonresident corporation had the right of removal. In the determination, therefore, of the right of removal, it was necessary to consider in each case most carefully the rules fixing or denying the servant's liability; and these removal cases are therefore entitled to the highest consideration.

The only other point suggested by the appellants is that the verdict of the jury is not sufficiently definite and certain, in that it merely found for the plaintiff, without stating as to whether it found against both or some particular one of the defendants. There is not much force, we think, in this position. The court instructed the jury that they might find against either or both the defendants, and that if they found against both they might find one sum against one and a different sum against the other, "in which event they must state in their verdict how much they find against one and how much against the other." The jury obviously did not find in favor of one and against the other, nor a part of the damage against the one and a part against the other, because they made no such statement in their verdict. Interpreted in the light of the record, there is no difficulty in ascertaining what the jury meant.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied, September 27, 1912.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.
(Division No. 2.)

EX PARTE FORREST E. KNEEDLER.

(— Mo. —, 147 S. W. 983.)

Witness — incriminating evidence — motor car accident — leaving identification.

Making it a felony for one who has caused injury by the operation of a motor vehicle, to leave the place of accident without leaving his name, address, and license number, does not violate the constitutional protection against giving self-incriminating evidence.

(June 1, 1912.)

Note. — Power to require one who has caused an injury to identify himself.

The point involved in EX PARTE KNEEDLER is another example of the new questions constantly arising from the use and operation of motor vehicles, which the courts are called upon to decide. In that case it was held that an act making it a felony for one who had caused an injury by the operation of a motor vehicle, to leave the place of accident without leaving his name, address, and license number, did not violate the constitutional provision against giving self-incriminating evidence. A search has disclosed but one other case in which this point has been considered, and the result there reached is in conflict with the decision in EX PARTE KNEEDLER.

In the case referred to, People v. Rosenheimer, 70 Misc. 433, 128 N. Y. Supp. 1093, affirmed by appellate division on opinion below, in 146 App. Div. 875, 130 N. Y. Supp. 544, Ingraham, P. J., dissenting, a statute providing that "any person operating a motor vehicle who, knowing that injury has been caused to a person or property due to the culpability of the said operator, or to accident, leaves the place of said injury or accident without stopping and giving his name, residence, including street and street number, and operator's license number, to the injured party or to a police officer, or in case no police officer is in the vicinity of the place of said injury or accident, then reporting the same to the nearest police station or judicial officer, shall be guilty of a felony," was held violative of the constitutional provision that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself. The court said: "As a test of the constitutionality of a law requiring a person to save or produce something, considered in the light of the provision exempting from self-accusation, is whether that something required to be said or produced is receivable in evidence, it is immaterial whether that demanded is an oral statement provable as an admission against interest, or a document

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to secure petitioner's release from the custody of the sheriff of the city of St. Louis, to which he had been committed under an information charging him with the commission of felony, in violation of an act in relation to motor vehicles. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kent Koerner and Glendy B. Arnold, for petitioner:

Section 12 of the motor vehicle act of 1911 is unconstitutional and void, because it requires the operator of an automobile, in violation of § 23 of article 2 of our Constitution, to give information which may lead to his being charged with or convicted of a crime.

State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Simmons Hardreceivable in evidence for like reason. In the statute now under consideration, a person, after the happening of an event, is required, as stated, to make an oral unsworn statement. The event is one upon which the criminal liability of such person may be predicated. Such person is one in whose presence and under whose observation a fact occurred. He is therefore prima facie competent to testify to the same, and for this reason one described by the word 'witness' as used in the Constitution. The statement is required to be made in either one of two contingencies, namely, (a) where the occurrence is due to the culpability of the one required to make the statement; and (b), contrastively where it is due to accident. It not being required when the injury is unconsciously, as distinguished from knowingly, inflicted, the making of it imports knowledge of the occurrence and consciousness of its culpability where culpable, and, but for the provision requiring such statement to be made as well when the injury is accidental as when culpable, the mere making of the statement would import an admission of culpability. The circumstance that the statute also requires the statement to be made where the injury inflicted is due to accident,—that is to say, without conscious culpability,—and that, therefore, it may conceivably be required where no criminal liability attaches to the defendant from the occurrence, does not make the statute constitutional, for it is sufficient to render it obnoxious to the constitutional provision that the statement required to be made may under some circumstances be self-accusatory, or tend to establish a criminal liability, or subject the maker to criminal prosecution. It is not necessary to its unconstitutionality that it should inevitably have this effect. The first count in the indictment alleges that the injuries inflicted by the occurrence respecting which the defendant's statement was required were occasioned by the defendant's culpability. As the demurrer admits this, among other facts competently alleged, it follows that in the case at bar the state-ware Co. 109 Mo. 118, 15 L.R.A. 676, 18 S. W. 1125; People v. Rosenheimer, 70 Misc. 433, 128 N. Y. Supp. 1095, 146 App. Div. 875, 130 N. Y. Supp. 544.

The phrase "that no person shall be compelled to testify against himself in a criminal cause," as used in article 2, § 23, of our Constitution, "means that no person shall be compelled to give utterance to any fact, by word or pen, which utterance might then or afterwards be used as evidence against him in a proceeding then pending or afterwards to be brought."

State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Simmons Hardware Co. supra; People v. Rosenheimer, 70 Misc. 433, 128 N. Y. Supp. 1095.

The legislature has no power to pass a law which requires a person to disclose evidence which might lead to his being charged with or convicted of a crime.

State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Simmons Hardware Co. supra.

Messrs. Seebert G. Jones and Forrest G. Ferris, for respondent:

The chief purposes of the statute is to protect those using the streets and highways of the state,—to prevent and ameliorate accidents; and it is a valid exercise of the police power of the state.

People v. Rosenheimer, 146 App. Div. 875, 130 N. Y. Supp. 544 (dissenting opinion).

Statutes regulating the registration, licensing, operating, and speed of motor vehicles, constitute a proper exercise of the police power of the state. One purpose of ment would have been required from the defendant because of his conscious culpability, and therefore the making of the statement would have furnished, not merely evidence of the defendant's identity with the operator of the vehicle, and in that connection a link in the chain of evidence against him in the event of his criminal prosecution, but also evidence of admitted culpability. It is elementary that, when a person is injured in person or property, and such injury appears to have been caused by the act or omission of another, the circumstances as ascertained attending the infliction of such injury may indicate a civil, and possibly also a criminal, liability on the part of such other, because of such other's apparent connection with its infliction. Where, for the reason that they indicate criminal liability, a criminal action is begun, the public prosecutor must prove as prerequisites to a lawful conviction, first, the identity of the person prosecuted with the person causing the injury; and, second, the latter's criminal culpability with respect to the same. The first, like any other relevant fact, may be proved by the admission of the person prosecuted. When so proved, such fact becomes a link in the chain of evidence against him. Thus, a person is injured upon a public highway, and thereafter dies from the effects of such injury. The injury causing death results from the violent contact of a motor vehicle, either directly or indirectly, with the body of the person killed. The circumstances discovered by the public authorities indicate that such contact was due either to some act or some culpable negligence on the part of the person operating the motor vehicle. The question arises, Who was that person? and it thereupon transpires that, under the penalties of the challenged statute, such person has said to a police officer in the vicinity of the place where the injury was inflicted, not an eyewitness to the occurrence: 'I am the man. I operated the motor vehicle which caused the injury. My address is such a street and such a number, and this is my operator's license number.' The admission so made as an evidentiary fact is testified to by such officer before a grand jury, and, in conjunction with other evidence, it produces an indictment. That indictment conceivably charges murder in the first degree (People v. Darragh, 141 App. Div. 408, 126 N. Y. Supp. 522), possibly manslaughter in its first degree, and, if not, manslaughter in its second degree. A trial of the one indicted follows, and there again such person's statement to the officer, to the effect that he was the man who operated the motor vehicle upon the occasion stated in the indictment, becomes a link in the chain of evidence against him, connecting him with the occurrence as therein alleged. It follows that the man making the statement, whether such statement import conscious culpability or merely his connection with the occurrence, has been compelled, in the absence of any statutory immunity against prosecution, to be a witness against himself in a criminal case. Such was the nature of the statement required from this demurrant under penalty of conviction of felony should he omit to make it. He has omitted to accuse himself, and the indictment assailed is the pleading initiating the criminal action for his conviction of felony for such omission. These considerations lead to the conclusion that, while the facts in the case at bar are dissimilar from those in the cases cited, they show, if anything, a more obvious infraction of the constitutional provision. In reaching this conclusion, the extent of the police power of the state is recognized. The right under it to enact, as well-considered regulations for the public safety in connection with the operation of motor vehicles upon public highways, license and other requirements which have for their object the identification of those violating the motor vehicle law, is conceded. People v. MacWilliams, 91 App. Div. 176, 86 N. Y. Supp. 357. It is one thing to require operators of motor vehicles to carry identifying indicia before such persons have broken the law, and quite another to demand either that they make self-accusation in case of infringement, or furnish in such case a link in a chain of crimina-such regulations is to make known the identity of the operator in case of his failure to observe the statutory regulations.

Whoever accepts the privilege of operating an automobile assumes the obligation imposed by the state, of either remaining at the place of accident or reporting the accident.

State v. Davis, 108 Mo. 666, 32 Am. St. Rep. 640, 18 S. W. 894.

Ferriss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Habeas corpus to discharge petitioner from the custody of the sheriff of the city of St. Louis who holds petitioner under a capias issued on an information based upon the evidence against themselves. The former can be lawfully done. The latter violates the Constitution."

In his dissenting opinion in the appellate division, Ingraham, P. J., said: "The court below held that this statute violated § 6 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state, which provides that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself. With that conclusion I do not agree. The statute does not relate to a criminal prosecution. It does not make it a crime for a person operating an automobile to cause an injury to person or property, nor does it make the declaration of the person operating the automobile admissible in evidence in any criminal proceeding which may follow the happening of the accident. Whether a person causing an injury to person or property is guilty of crime depends upon other provisions of law, and they have no connection with the statute under review. If no crime was committed when the accident occurred,—and it is not alleged that there was,—the constitutional provision could have no application, and the defendant's constitutional privilege was not infringed. A general provision of law compelling a party to be a witness generally would not violate this provision of the Constitution, because, if a crime was committed, it would be a violation of the Constitution to apply the statute to a criminal prosecution. In the recent development of motor vehicles, it appears that they have largely increased the danger to persons using the streets and highways; that it has become necessary in many cases, to save life, to provide prompt assistance to those injured; and, if such a vehicle at once leaves the place of the accident without waiting to see the result of the injury, it is impossible to ascertain the identity of the person causing the injury. It was to meet this condition that the act was passed. It was for the protection of those using the streets and highways of the state, and it seems to me a valid exercise of the police power of the state to protect its citizens. If, as before stated, no crime has been committed, then the constitutional provision did not apply. If a crime had been committed, and the defendant was justified in refusing to give his name and address or any information which could be used to identify him, it was for the defendant to assert his privilege, and show that his compliance with the statute would compel him to give testimony against himself. . . . The use of these motor vehicles has created a new condition in which those using the streets and highways in the state are subjected to serious damage. The legislature, to protect the citizens of the state, and to insure that prompt relief be supplied to those injured, and that those causing the injuries could be ascertained, has made it the duty of the one causing the accident to remain and notify the police or a judicial officer. He is not required to give evidence or be a witness, but to stay at the place of the accident or give notice of the accident to the police. Certainly common humanity would impose such a duty, and I cannot believe that a statute which imposes and enforces it would violate the Constitution of this state."

In Rex v. Hankey, 93 L. T. N. S. 107, an act similar to those under consideration was involved, but its validity was not questioned or passed upon. In that case one section of the act provided: "If the driver of any car who commits an offense under this section refuses to give his name or address, or gives a false name or address, he shall be guilty of an offense under this act," and another section provided: "And it shall be the duty of the owner of the car, if required, to give any information which it is within his power to give, and which may lead to the identification and apprehension of the driver, and if the owner fails to do so, he also shall be guilty of an offense under this act." In construing these provisions it was held that the owner might be convicted, although the driver had not first been asked to give his name and address. It was held, however, that no conviction could be had unless the complaint alleged that an offense had been committed by the driver; and it was held that the allegations in that case were insufficient.

In State v. Smith, 29 R. I. 513, 72 Atl. 710, a statute provided that "every driver of a motor vehicle, after knowingly causing an accident by collision or otherwise, or knowingly injuring any person, horse, or vehicle, shall forthwith bring his motor vehicle to a full stop, return to the scene of the accident, and give to any proper person demanding the same, the number of his driver's license, the registration number of the motor vehicle, and the names and residences of each and every male occupant of said motor vehicle." Its validity was not passed upon, in that case, however, the question under consideration being as to the sufficiency of the complaint. J. T. W.

on the following statute: "Whoever operates a motor vehicle while in an intoxicated condition shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Any person operating a motor vehicle who, knowing that injury has been caused to a person or property due to the culpability of the said operator, or to accident, leaves the place of said injury or accident without stopping and giving his name, residence, including street and street number, and operator's license number, to the injured party or to a police officer, or in case no police officer is in the vicinity of place of said injury or accident, then reporting the same to the nearest police station or judicial officer, shall be guilty of a felony punishable by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment for a term of two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and if any person be convicted a second time of either of the foregoing offenses, he shall be guilty of a felony punishable by imprisonment for a term of not less than two years and not more than five years. A conviction of a violation of this subdivision shall be reported forthwith by the trial court or the clerk thereof to the secretary of state, who shall, upon recommendation of the trial court, suspend the license of the person so convicted, or if he be an owner, the certificate of registration of his motor vehicle; and, if no appeal therefrom be taken, or if an appeal duly taken be dismissed, or the judgment affirmed, and upon notice thereof by said clerk, the secretary of state shall revoke such license, or in the case of an owner the certificate of registration of his motor vehicle, and shall order the license or certificate of registration delivered to the secretary of state, and shall not reissue to him said license or certificate of registration, or any other license or certificate of registration, unless the secretary of state in his discretion, after an investigation or upon a hearing, decides to reissue or issue such license or certificate." Laws 1911, p. 328, § 12.

The information charges in the first count that one Ernest Combs was in charge and control of, and operating and managing, an automobile upon a street in the city of St. Louis, and then and there, by accident, struck, run, over, injured, and killed one Frank Farrar with such automobile, and that he, knowing that such injury had been caused, did then and there unlawfully and feloniously leave the place of such accident without stopping and giving his name, residence, and license number; and, further, that the petitioner, before said Combs left the place of the accident, did unlawfully, feloniously, and knowingly incite, procure, aid, counsel, hire, and command the said Combs to do and commit said felony of feloniously leaving the place of said accident in the manner and form aforesaid. The second count of the information contains the same charge, except that, instead of charging the injury to have been accidental, the information charges that said Combs did then and there "feloniously, carelessly, recklessly, and with culpable negligence," throw and cast the said Farrar to the pavement, and drive the automobile over him, causing his death, making the same charge against the petitioner as to inciting Combs to leave the place of injury. A demurrer was filed to this information in the circuit court and overruled, whereupon petitioner applied in this court for a writ of prohibition against Hon. James E. Withrow, judge of the circuit court before whom the cause was pending, which application was denied. He then sued out this writ of habeas corpus.

The only question involved is whether or not the act in question is constitutional. It is claimed by the petitioner that the statute violates § 23 of article 2 of the state Constitution, which provides that "no person shall be compelled to testify against himself in a criminal cause."

The statute in question is § 12 of an act of the legislature approved March 9, 1911 (Session Acts 1911, p. 322), and comprising in all sixteen sections, containing minute regulations and restrictions upon the use of motor vehicles on public streets and highways. Under the provisions of the act, every automobile must be registered with the secretary of state, with the name and address of its manufacturer and owner and the number of such vehicle. Such number must be conspicuously displayed on the vehicle. The character of the brakes, signaling devices, and lights is specified. The statute prescribes the rate of speed and other rules of the road. Every chauffeur must be licensed, and must also register his name and address. The highest degree of care is exacted in operating the vehicle. No such vehicle can be lawfully operated without a license from the state. The section in controversy was enacted for the purpose, doubtless, of preventing those controlling and operating automobiles from concealing their identity by immediate flight from the scene of accident, and also to secure necessary aid for the injured. Therefore it requires those in charge of the vehicle to remain at the place of accident, or give their names and addresses before leaving.

There can be no question but that this act, including § 12, is a reasonable exercise of the police power. The petitioner does not contend otherwise. His contention is that, whether reasonable or not as a police measure, it is invalid, because it violates the constitutional provision that "no person shall be compelled to testify against himself in a criminal cause." The argument is that the driver may be charged with the crime of culpable negligence, and that the information exacted by the statute in question may be used as evidence to establish his connection with the injury.

The statute is a simple police regulation. It does not make the accident a crime. If a crime is involved, it arises from some other statute. It does not attempt in terms to authorize the admission of the information as evidence in a criminal proceeding. The mere fact that the driver discloses his identity is no evidence of guilt, but rather of innocence. State v. Davis, 108 Mo. 666, 32 Am. St. Rep. 640, 18 S. W. 894. On the contrary, flight is regarded as evidence of guilt. In the large majority of cases, such accidents are free from culpability. If this objection to the statute is valid, it may as well be urged against the other provisions, which require the owner and chauffeur to register their names and number, and to display the number of the vehicle in a conspicuous place thereon, thus giving evidence of identity, which is the obvious purpose of the provisions. St. Louis v. Williams, 235 Mo. 503, 139 S. W. 340. We have several statutes which require persons to give information which would tend to support possible subsequent criminal charges, if introduced in evidence. Persons in charge are required to report accidents in mines and factories. Physicians must report deaths and their causes, giving their own names and addresses. Druggists must show their prescription lists. Dealers must deliver for inspection foods carried in stock. We held a law valid which required a pawnbroker to exhibit to an officer his book wherein were registered articles received by him, against his objection based on this same constitutional provision. We held this to be a mere police regulation, not invalid because there might be a possible criminal prosecution in which it might be attempted to use this evidence to show him to be a receiver of stolen goods. St. Joseph v. Levin, 128 Mo. 588, 49 Am. St. Rep. 577, 31 S. W. 101. If the law which exacts this information is invalid, because such information, although in itself no evidence of guilt, might possibly lead to a charge of crime against the informant, then all police regulations which involve identification may be questioned on the same ground. We are not aware of any constitutional provision designed to protect a man's conduct from judicial inquiry, or 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) aid him in fleeing from justice. But, even if a constitutional right be involved, it is not necessary to invalidate the statute to secure its protection. If, in this particular case, the constitutional privilege justified the refusal to give the information exacted by the statute, that question can be raised in the defense to the pending prosecution. Whether it would avail, we are not called upon to decide in this proceeding.

The petitioner relies upon State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Simmons Hardware Co. 109 Mo. 118, 15 L.R.A. 676, 18 S. W. 1125, wherein we held a statute invalid which required an officer of a corporation to answer, under oath, whether the corporation had violated the statute concerning trusts and combinations, and where the statute further made a violation of such trust statute a crime. The distinction between that case and this is obvious. There the information relates directly to a crime created by the same statute, and is necessarily incriminatory, if the answer is in the affirmative. Re Conrades, 112 Mo. App. loc. cit. 41, 85 S. W. 150. This distinction was pointed out, also, in the Levin Case, supra.

Our attention is called to the case of People v. Rosenheimer, 70 Misc. 433, 128 N. Y. Supp. 1093, wherein the court of general sessions held a similar act invalid. This decision was affirmed by a divided court, three to two, in the appellate division. 146 App. Div. 875, 130 N. Y. Supp. 544. We regard the dissenting opinion by Ingraham, P. J. as sustained by the better reasoning.

Similar statutes have been passed in Maine, New Jersey, Michigan, Florida, California, and other states. Our attention is called to no decision upon the question involved here by any court of last resort.

Common observation and experience show that unrestricted use of motor vehicles on public streets would be extremely dangerous to life and limb and the property of the public. Their use thus becomes a fit subject for state regulation. Every person who operates or uses a motor vehicle must be regarded as exercising a privilege, and not an unrestricted right. It being a privilege granted by the legislature, a person enjoying such privilege must take it subject to all proper restrictions.

We cannot hold invalid this statute imposing a proper restriction, because of its suggested possible relation to a possible criminal prosecution.

It is ordered that the petitioner be remanded.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

NATHANIEL LIPSOHN, Appt.,
v.

SAMUEL L. GOLDSTEIN et al., Respts.

(212 Mass. 144, 98 N. E. 703.)

Mortgage — foreclosure sale — insisting on cash — effect.

A sale under a power in a mortgage will not be set aside because the mortgagee insisted on cash and furnished the money to the buyer to comply with his bid, if he acted in good faith, the bid was reasonable, and the mortgagee did nothing to prevent the mortgagor from raising the money or bidding at the sale.

(May 24, 1912.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Superior Court for Suffolk County dismissing a bill filed to set aside a foreclosure sale. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James H. Duffy for appellant.

Mr. M. F. Cunningham for respondents.

Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant Goldstein, when as mortgagee he attempted to execute the power of sale upon default of the plaintiff, was bound to act in good faith, and to use every reasonable means to obtain the full value of the mortgaged personal property, and to protect the interests of the plaintiff, who was mortgagor. Montague v. Dawes, 14 Allen, 369; Clark v. Simmons, 150 Mass. 357, 23 N. E. 108. The master was not directed to report the evidence, and his findings of fact being final, it appears from the first report and the supplemental report, which are to be read together, that the sale was advertised in a local newspaper published in the place of the plaintiff's residence, who received notice of the time and place, and, if the record is silent as to the terms of the power of sale, no question is raised that they were not followed. The plaintiff did not request an adjournment of the sale, although there were few bidders, and the master finds that the price obtained was not disproportionate to the real value of the property.

Note. — Insisting on cash sale under a chattel mortgage.

There seems to be no case squarely in point with LIPSOHN v. GOLDSTEIN on the point indicated in the title, but it is held in Williams v. Hatch, 38 Ala. 338, that a provision in a chattel mortgage that the property should be sold for cash, being for the benefit of the mortgagee, may be waived by him; and where he sells and delivers the 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

It is conceded that the notice contained no reference to the terms of payment, and the plaintiff, who, up to the last moment, endeavored to raise enough money to prevent the sale of his household goods, was unable to obtain the money.

The power of sale, however, must be assumed to have been in the ordinary form, and the mortgagee could have sold, and arranged with the purchaser to give credit for the purchase money, and if the property had brought more than the sum secured by the mortgage, he would have been answerable to the plaintiff for the surplus. Bailey v. Aetna Ins. Co. 10 Allen, 286. The plaintiff's financial inability undoubtedly influenced the terms of sale, but if so, the master reports that under the circumstances the requirement that the purchaser must pay cash was not unreasonable, or insisted upon by the mortgagee in order to get the property at less than its value, or to deprive the plaintiff of further opportunity to redeem. The purchaser, who is joined as a defendant, was present during the negotiations, and when the property was struck off the mortgagee furnished the money to pay for it. If the mortgagee had previously hindered the plaintiff from raising the money, or sought to prevent him from bidding, the vendee would not have been an innocent purchaser for value and without notice of his conduct, and the foreclosure would have been invalid. Gilson v. Nesson, 208 Mass. 368, 371, 94 N. E. 471; Wenz v. Pastene, 209 Mass. 359, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 95 N. E. 793. But the master having found that the mortgagee did nothing to hinder or delay the plaintiff, who had a reasonable opportunity to arise the money, the sale cannot be vitiated on this ground. The price not having been grossly inadequate, and the mortgagee not being chargeable with bad faith, the plaintiff has failed to sustain the essential averments upon which he relied for relief, and the decrees of the superior court overruling the plaintiff's exceptions to the supplemental report, and confirming the report, and the final decree dismissing the bill, should be affirmed. Fennyery v. Ransom, 170 Mass. 303, 306, 307, 49 N. E. 620, and cases cited.

property to the purchaser without demanding payment, he waives that condition, and the title to the property passes to the purchaser as completely as if he had paid the price.

But it is held in Edwards v. Cottrell, 43 Iowa, 194, that a chattel mortgage with power of sale upon default in payment confers upon the mortgagee no right to dispose of the property otherwise than for cash.

Deed — privy examination of wife — revocation of authority.

If, after a wife has been privily examined as to her signature to a deed which has not been signed by her husband, and before the certificate of examination has been indorsed on the instrument, she obtains possession of it and erases her signature, the authority to attach the certificate is terminated, and the deed will be void if the husband subsequently affixes her signature and his own to the instrument, and causes the certificate of acknowledgment to be attached thereto.

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Overton County in plaintiffs' favor in a suit to set aside a deed of trust. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The execution of the deed to pass the married woman's estate and title is imperfect and incomplete until the official act of the clerk or other officer is made perfect and complete by meeting, in letter and spirit, every requirement of the statute.

Rhea v. Iseley, 1 Shannon, Cas. 228; Friedenwald v. Mullan, 10 Heisk. 231; Wester v. Hurt, 123 Tenn. 508, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 358, 130 S. W. 842, Ann. Cas. 1912 c, 329.

Shields, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Complainants, J. T. Eldridge and Amanda Eldridge, husband and wife, bring this bill to have a deed in trust upon their homestead, purporting to have been jointly executed by them, declared void for want of valid privy examination of Mrs. Eldridge, and the foreclosure of the same perpetually enjoined.

Complainants occupied the land in controversy as a homestead, the title being in the husband, worth less than $1,000, and the only real estate owned by them.

J. T. Eldridge purchased of the defendant certain personal property and agreed to pay therefor $400, for which he executed his note with personal security, and further agreed that he and his wife would secure the same by a deed in trust upon his land. The conveyance was prepared by a notary public and presented to Mrs. Eldridge at her home, in the absence of her husband, and she there signed it and was properly examined touching its execution for a valid privy examination. On the next day Mrs. Eldridge went to the home of the notary public, and upon request the conveyance was given to her that she might consult her brother concerning it, and while in her possession she erased her signature. Afterwards the notary public came to the home of J. T. Eldridge, and the latter, in the presence of Mrs. Eldridge, executed and acknowledged the conveyance, and also resigned the name of Mrs. Eldridge thereto. No privy examination of Mrs. Eldridge was then made. After this the notary public indorsed the acknowledgment of J. T. Eldridge and the privy examination of Mrs. Eldridge upon the conveyance, and it was delivered.

These facts are conceded. There is some controversy whether Mrs. Eldridge authorized her husband to resign the conveyance for her; but the preponderance of the evidence is that she refused to again sign it herself, or authorize her husband to do so for her.

We think that upon these facts there was no valid privy examination of Mrs. Eldridge, and that the certificate and deed in trust in question are fraudulent and void.

Note.—No other case has been found involving the withdrawal of one's signature to an instrument after acknowledgment on privy examination, but before the certificate of acknowledgment or examination has been indorsed on the instrument or attached thereto. It seems clear, however, as stated in ELDRIDGE v. HUNTER, that before the instrument has been completed or become binding on any of the parties thereto, any one of them has the right to withdraw, and decline to proceed with the execution of the instrument, and that the indorsement or attachment, after he has withdrawn his signature, of a certificate of his acknowledgment or examination, would be unauthorized and void.

As to the right to attach or correct a certificate of acknowledgment after the date of the acknowledgment, see note to Alford v. Doe, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 216.

As to the sufficiency of evidence to impeach a certificate of acknowledgment of a deed, see note to Ford v. Ford, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 442.

The homestead of the husband and wife can only be conveyed by their joint deed. They need not execute it at the same time, but it is not complete until executed by both of them, and there can be no delivery until this is done.

Married women cannot make a valid conveyance of real estate without privy examination, completed in the form and manner prescribed by the statutes. Signature is the least important part of the execution of a deed by them. Privy examination is the essential part, and until it is made and perfected, the deed is of no force. Mount v. Kesterson, 6 Coldw. 463; Wester v. Hurt, 123 Tenn. 508, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 358, 130 S. W. 842, Ann. Cas. 1912 c, 329.

The statutes providing for the privy examination of married women to conveyances of real estate require the officer taking the examination to examine them separately and apart from the husband in regard to the free execution of the conveyance, as there prescribed, and to make a certificate in a form also prescribed, showing the result of his examination, and to indorse on, annex, or attach the certificate to the conveyance, and contemplate that this shall be done contemporaneously with the manual execution by the married woman. The privy examination is not complete until these mandatory provisions of the statutes are complied with, and the certificate, so indorsed, attached, or annexed, is the only competent evidence of compliance. Code, §§ 2076-2078 (Shannon's ed. §§ 3753-3755); Rhea v. Iseley, 1 Shannon, Cas. 228; Mount v. Kesterson, 6 Coldw. 463; Currie v. Kerr, 11 Lea, 142.

The action of the officer taking the privy examination is quasi judicial, and can only be impeached for fraud, as is done in this case. Shields v. Netherland, 5 Lea, 193.

When Mrs. Eldridge obtained possession of the conveyance from the notary public, the privy examination had not been reduced to writing and indorsed on or attached to it. It had not been executed by her husband. It was not complete or binding upon either of them. Mrs. Eldridge then had the right to refuse to proceed with the execution of the conveyance, and she did so, and erased her signature. When it was executed by the husband, and her name signed thereto by him, no further privy examination was taken, and if she had authorized her husband's action, which she did not, this attempted execution would be imperfect and invalid for this reason.

It results that the certificate showing proper execution by Mrs. Eldridge is untrue and fraudulent, and the deed in trust void, in so far as it affects the homestead of the complainants in the land in controversy, and its foreclosure to that extent will be perpetually enjoined.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT. (Division No. 2.)

ARTHUR B. MOLER, Appt.,

v.

C. T. WHISMAN et al., Respts.

(— Mo. —, 147 S. W. 985.)

Barber — prescribing period of instruction — constitutionality.

1. Requiring a two-year period of instruction before practising the barber's trade does not unconstitutionally deprive one of his liberty or property, or the gains of his own industry, without due process of law, confer special privileges or immunities, abridge the privileges of citizenship, or deny him the equal protection of the laws.

Statute — regulation of barber college — sufficiency of title.

2. A title, An Act To Establish a Board of Examiners for Barbers, and To Regulate Note. — Constitutionality and effect of restrictions on right to practise trade of barber.

As to the validity and effect of an attempted imposition of license taxes or fees upon barbers, see note to Louisville v. Schnell, post, 637.

Questions relating to the closing of barber shops on Sunday are included in the notes in 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1259, and 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1190, on the validity of classification in Sunday laws; and the note in 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 646, relating to special penalties for the violation of Sunday closing act.

Constitutionality—generally.

It is said in 8 Cyc. 872, that the power to regulate business does not in all cases rest upon the existence of a nuisance, as many kinds of business so peculiarly and intimately affect the public interest that whoever engages in any one of them in effect grants to the public an interest in the methods and instrumentalities employed therein.

Prohibiting any person from following the occupation of a barber, without first obtaining a certificate of registration, is a valid exercise of legislative power in the interest of the public health and welfare (State v. Zeno, 79 Minn. 80, 48 L.R.A. 88, 79 Am. St. Rep. 422, 81 N. W. 748; Ex parte Lucas, 160 Mo. 218, 61 S. W. 218); and being such, it effects no unconstitutional abridgement of the liberty and natural rights of the citizens (State v. Walker, 48 Wash. 8, 92 Pac. 775, 15 Ann. Cas. 257).

No unconstitutional delegation of legislative authority is effected by the provision of a statute regulating barbers, which leaves its application to towns to be determined by the Occupation of Barbers, and To Prevent the Spreading of Contagious Diseases, is sufficient to cover matters regulating barber colleges and apprentices in barber shops.

Barber — apprentice — forbidding charge — constitutionality.

3. Prohibiting students in barber colleges from charging for their work during the two-year period which the instruction is required to cover violates a constitutional provision that all persons shall have a right to the enjoyment and gains of their own industry.

Same — regulation of sign — special legislation.

4. Forbidding a barber school or college to display any other sign than a mere announcement of "barber school" or "college" is invalid as a special law applying to an institution which is not a proper subject for classification.

Same — special privilege — monopoly.

5. So far as a statute regulating barber colleges forbids them to charge for the work of students and to display any sign except the mere announcement of the fact that it is a barber college tends to discourage persons from learning the trade, and creates a monopoly, it violates the constitutional prohibition of the granting of special rights, privileges, and immunities.

town councils, and not by the vote of electors. State v. Armeno, 29 R. I. 431, 72 Atl. 216.

And vesting authority in a state board of barber examiners to determine the qualifications of a barber does not render a statute making the board's authorization a prerequisite to the exercise of the trade, unconstitutional as a delegation of legislative authority, and as vesting in the board power to issue and withhold licenses arbitrarily, in that although the statute defines what shall constitute a barber, it does not prescribe the standard or degree of knowledge, learning, and experience which applicants must possess. State v. Briggs, 45 Or. 366, 77 Pac. 750, 78 Pac. 361, 2 Ann. Cas. 424.

A state statute which provides in one section that an unsanitary barber shop is a common nuisance, for which the proprietor is subject to prosecution and punishment, and, in another section, that the penalty for maintaining such a nuisance shall be a fine, is not open to the objection that it imposes two different punishments for the same offense in violation of the Federal Constitution. State v. Armeno, supra. The court placed its decision not only upon the ground that the 5th Amendment of the Federal Constitution did not apply to state government, but also upon the broader ground that the two sections in fact did not impose two different punishments.

And there is no interference with any constitutional right to a jury trial in a statute providing that the remedy of one aggrieved by the state board's revocation of his barber certificate shall be by an appeal to the state supreme court. Ibid. The court declared that the decision of the board to revoke a certificate was not a criminal prosecution within the constitutional provision that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy trial by an impartial jury; and it also declared that the constitutional provision that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate had no application to a case of this kind, and announced this conclusion upon the authority of State Bd. of Health v. Roy, 22 R. I. 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

538, 48 Atl. 802, which involved the issuance and revocation of a physician's certificate by the state board of health, and held that the constitutional provision last referred to applied only to such cases as were required to be tried by jury before the adoption of the Constitution, and that it therefore did not apply to cases of this kind which arose subsequently thereto.

The constitutional inhibition against unreasonable searches and seizures is not violated by a statute authorizing any member of the state board to enter and make reasonable examination of any barber shop during business hours, for the purpose of ascertaining the sanitary condition thereof, and with the ultimate purpose of revoking the offender's certificate of registration if the conditions are found to be unsanitary. State v. Armeno, supra.

No violation of the constitutional provision that no bill shall embrace more than one subject, and that that shall be expressed in the title, results from the enactment of provisions relating to the appointment of a board of examiners, or prescribing the duties of the board or the compensation of its members, and referring to apprentices of barbers, and to the subject of license fees, under the title: "An Act To Regulate the Practice of Barbering and Licensing of Persons To Carry on Such Practice, and Providing Punishment for Its Violation." State v. Sharpless, 31 Wash. 191, 96 Am. St. Rep. 893, 71 Pac. 737.

So, the matter of licensing a barber school is germane to and properly incorporated under the title: "An Act To Regulate the Pursuit, Business, Art, and Avocation of a Barber, the Licensing of Persons To Carry on Such Business, and To Insure the Better Qualification of Persons Following Such Business." State v. Briggs, supra.

Statement by Brown, J.:

Bill in equity in the circuit court of Jackson county to restrain the revocation of a barber's license. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

The plaintiff is proprietor of a barber college in Kansas City, Missouri, and has in his employ as manager and instructor one P. R. Hackney, a registered barber. The defendants compose the state board of barber examiners, and are threatening to revoke the license of plaintiff's said instructor, Hackney, for the alleged reason that he has displayed on plaintiff's said barber college the sign, "Free shaving and hair cutting;" that he has collected and permitted the students under his control to collect money for their services in the practice of the trade therein taught; and that he graduates students after a course of study of less than two years; all contrary to the provisions of § 1187, Rev. Stat. 1909.

The evidence shows that plaintiff's barber college is equipped with forty six chairs and other paraphernalia necessary for conducting a barber shop and teaching the barber's trade; that his instructor, Hackney, has caused to be displayed on said college the said sign, "Free shaving and hair cutting;" that, when students begin work in said college they charge nothing for their services, but after a few weeks' instruction they are permitted to charge for their services; and that the amount they receive is paid one half to the plain-nities in a classification of persons who are subjected to the operation of a statute requiring the registration of barbers, and the payment of a fee of $2 for a registration certificate, where the act excepts from its operation students of the state university and other schools who are making their way by serving as barbers, persons who are serving as barbers in an eleemosynary institutions, and persons following the occupation of a barber in towns of 1,000 or less. Jackson v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 557, 117 S. W. 818. The ground of this decision, however, is that the exaction of the fee for a registration certificate is to be regarded as a tax, and that there is not the required equality and uniformity. And while the court uses some language which may fairly be regarded as meaning that the classification cannot be upheld as a health measure, especially so far as regards schools and eleemosynary institutions—the apparent ground of the decision is, as before stated, that the rules governing taxation apply. However, in a dissenting opinion in this case, Ramsey, J., has this to say: "I am unable to agree to the opinion or judgment of the majority of the court. If it be conceded that the small sum required to be paid for certificates is a 'tax' in the sense in which that word is used in the Constitution, then it would follow logically that the law is invalid, since it contains numerous exceptions, not based on any reasonable or rational classification. However, I do not believe the $2 required to be paid under the terms of this act is, in any proper sense, a tax or any part or portion of the taxing system."

But in the cases hereinafter set out, statutes like that involved in the last case have been upheld as health measures; and it seems not to have been urged in such cases that the small registration fee constituted a tax; and the cases in no way involve the rules relating to taxation.

—classification on basis of experience or citizenship.

See Jackson v. State, supra.

statute providing for the examination and registration of barbers upon the payment of a registration fee results from excepting merely from the requirement of examination such barbers as are engaged in the trade at the time the act becomes effective (State v. Sharpless, and Ex parte Lucas, supra, or those who have been engaged in the business for three years (Com. v. Ward, 136 Ky. 146, 123 S. W. 673)).

But a provision making it a prerequisite to obtaining a certificate of registration that the applicant "has studied the trade for two years as an apprentice, under, or as a qualified and taxing barber," not being subject to justification as a health measure, is void as tending to create a monopoly in that it tends to destroy barber schools, and thus permits practising barbers to limit the number of applicants by refusing to receive apprentices. State v. Walker, 48 Wash. 8, 92 Pac. 775, 15 Ann. Cas. 257. The court held, however, that the invalidity of this provision did not pervade the whole act.

And a clause in a statute requiring the examination and licensing of barbers, which provides that no alien shall receive a certificate, violates the "due process of law" and "equal protection of the laws" clauses of the Constitution. Templar v. State Examiners, 131 Mich. 254, 100 Am. St. Rep. 610, 90 N. W. 1058.

—classification according to municipalities.

See Jackson v. State, supra.

A statute forbidding persons to exercise the calling of a barber without obtaining a certificate of registration from the state board, and annual renewal cards thereafter, is not rendered obnoxious as special legislation, merely because its operation is confined to cities of 50,000 or more inhabitants. Ex parte Lucas, 160 Mo. 218, 61 S. W. 218.

So, limiting the operation of a statute in respect of the examination and registration of barbers to cities of the first, second, and third class, does not offend the constitutional inhibition against class legislation (Com. v. Ward, supra); and this being so, the court will not inquire into the reatiff and one half to the student performing the service. It is also proven that the plaintiff graduates his students after a course of study of less than two years. The evidence also shows that the barber's trade can only be taught by having the students shave and cut the hair of other persons under the supervision of an instructor; that plaintiff, through his students, furnishes free shaves to about 1,500 persons per week. No evidence was introduced by either side to prove the length of time required to properly teach the barber's trade, nor was any proof offered to show the danger of spreading infectious or contagious disease by the operation of public barber shops.

Plaintiff does not deny the acts charged against him by defendants, but contends that the judgment ought to be reversed and a decree entered for him because chapter 13, Rev. Stat. 1909, entitled "Barbers," is in conflict with the following provisions of the Constitution of Missouri; Section 4 of article 2 of the Constitution of the state of Missouri, as follows: "That all constitutional government is intended to promote the general welfare of the people; that all persons have a natural right to life, liberty, and the enjoyment of the gains of their own industry; that to give security to these things is the principal office of government, and that when government does not confer this security, it fails of its chief design." Section 30 of article 2, as follows: "That no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Section 1 of article 4 as follows: "The legislative power, subject to the limitations herein contained, shall be vested in a senate and house of representatives, to be styled, 'the general assembly of the state of Missouri.'" Section 53 of article 4, as follows: "The general assembly shall not pass any local or special law, . . . granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive right, privilege, or immunity." Section 28 of article 4, as follows: "No bill . . . shall contain more than one subject which shall be clearly expressed in its title." That it is also in conflict with § 1 of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, as follows: "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Messrs. Gage, Ladd, & Small, for appellant:

The barber law in question (amendment sons which govern the legislature in passing the act (State v. Sharpless, 31 Wash. 191, 96 Am. St. Rep. 893, 71 Pac. 737).

There is no unconstitutional denial to the citizens of cities of the equal protection of the laws with the citizens of towns, by a statute which makes the application of its provisions prescribing the prerequisites to the exercise of the trade of barber compulsory in cities and optional in towns. State v. Armeno, 29 R. I. 431, 72 Atl. 216.

And there is no unconstitutional denial to the people of towns of the equal protection of the laws with the people of cities, by a provision in a statute prescribing the prerequisites to the exercise of the trade of barber, which provides that its provisions shall govern the cities of the state, and only such towns as shall, by their councils, adopt the provisions of the act. Ibid.

And a statute providing for the examination and registration of barbers upon the payment of the fee is not unconstitutional as local and class legislation, because it does not apply to barbers in unincorporated cities and towns; or because the conditions to the issuance of a certificate imposed upon barbers of municipalities ranking below cities of the third class are greater than those imposed upon barbers in cities of the first, second, and third class; or because the provision making it an offense to use soiled linen or unsterilized tools, or to practise without having obtained a certificate of registration, or to falsely pretend to practise under the statute, is confined to barbers in cities of the first, second, and third class. State v. Sharpless, supra.

Construction of statutes.

As to conformity of act to title, see State v. Sharpless, and State v. Briggs, supra, under "Constitutionality; generally."

An exception from a statute regulating barbers, of those persons exercising the trade in municipalities of less than 50,000 inhabitants, is not a continuing exception of all cities which come within it at the time the act goes into effect; but, on the other hand, it ceases to operate as an exception as soon as any municipality attains that population. Ex parte Lucas, 160 Mo. 218, 61 S. W. 218.

So, an act regulating barbers "in any incorporated city or town" in the state applies not merely to such municipalities as are incorporated at the time the act is passed, but also to those thereafter incorporated. State v. Sharpless, supra.

Power granted to the board to revoke "any certificate of registration" for enumerated causes applies to a "certificate" issued, without examination, to barbers engaged in the trade at the time the act went into effect, as well as "a certificate of registration" which other persons must obtain by submitting to an examination; of 1907, Acts 1907, p. 79), is void so far as it prohibits the students of a barber college or their teachers from charging for their services.

State v. Granneman, 132 Mo. 326, 33 S. W. 784; Woolley v. Mears, 228 Mo. 41, 136 Am. St. Rep. 637, 125 S. W. 1112; State v. Walsh, 136 Mo. 403, 35 L.R.A. 231, 37 S. W. 1112; State v. Thomas, 138 Mo. 100, 39 S. W. 481.

The legislature has no right to select out barbers and barber's schools by themselves, and limit their right to employ and teach apprentices and students and fix the number of teachers to students or apprentices.

Ashbrook*, 154 Mo. 375, 48 L.R.A. 265, 77 Am. St. Rep. 765, 55 S. W. 627; Ex parte Dickey, 144 Cal. 234, 66 L.R.A. 928, 103 Am. St. Rep. 82, 77 Pac. 924, 1 Ann. Cas. 428.

The right to employ apprentices and teach students is a fundamental right, which cannot, either by special or general legislation, be taken away so long as an American citizen is entitled to the protection of due process of law or the law of the land.

State v. Missouri Tie & Timber Co. 181 Mo. 536, 65 L.R.A. 588, 103 Am. St. Rep. 614, 80 S. W. 933, 2 Ann. Cas. 119.

Plaintiff has no plain, adequate, or complete remedy at law, and a permanent injunction restraining the enforcement of this unconstitutional barber's act is plainly the proper and only remedy of plaintiff in order to prevent his legitimate business from being destroyed.

Merchants' Exchange v. Knot, 212 Mo. 616, 111 S. W. 573; Robinson v. Galveston, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 292, 111 S. W. 1078.

A statute does not violate § 28 of article 4 of the Missouri Constitution, where all its provisions are germane to and naturally connected with the subject as stated in the title of the act.

there being no distinction between a certificate and a certificate of registration. State v. Chaney, 36 Wash. 350, 78 Pac. 915.

And the practice of the trade of barber after a certificate of registration has been revoked for cause is prohibited by a provision forbidding, under penalty, the practice of the occupation of barber "without first having obtained a certificate of registration." Ibid.

Only barbers who have conducted business in the state come within the meaning of the words "so engaged," used in a statute excepting persons "engaged in the business of a barber in this state," and who have been "so engaged" for two years, from a provision that barbers must be examined and obtain a certificate. Wass v. Board of Examiners, 123 Mich. 544, 82 N. W. 234.

It has been held that there is an irreconcilable conflict between a provision, on the one hand, that no person shall practise the occupation of barber in the state until he shall have obtained a certificate of qualification, and that every person "now engaged in the business of a barber in this state" shall comply with its provisions, and a proviso, on the other hand, that "this act shall not in any way apply to or affect any person who is now occupied or working as a barber in this state;" and that the statute does not apply to persons engaged in the occupation of barber at the time the act was passed. State v. Tag, 100 Md. 588, 60 Atl. 465.

But it was held in Com. v. Ward, supra, that barbers who had practised three years were excepted, not from the operation of the whole act, but only from the necessity of submitting to an examination, by a proviso that the act did not apply to persons who had practised for three years, which was appended to a provision forbidding persons to follow the trade without first obtaining a certificate of registration, since the act must be deemed a reasonable health measure intended to regulate all barbers. Section 7 of this act provided that "every person now engaged in the occupation of barber" might obtain a certificate of registration merely by filing an affidavit; and § 8 provided that any person desiring to obtain a certificate of registration should make application to the board, pay a fee, and submit to an examination, etc. The court held in effect that the proviso should be regarded as applying only to § 8 and the examination therein required, and that the inconsistency between the proviso and § 7 should be resolved in favor of the latter, so as to place barbers, even though they had practised for three years, under the jurisdiction of the board, though not requiring them to take an examination.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

No intention to suppress the operation of public barber shops having been expressed in the title to the bill under which chapter 13, Rev. Stat. 1909, was enacted, it will not be assumed that the general assembly deemed the continued operation of such shops so dangerous to the public health that it desired to terminate that avocation with the present generation, and make it necessary for our male posterity to shave themselves or allow their hair and whiskers to grow without let or hindrance from tonsorial artists; yet so complete is the power of the legislature to prescribe regulations affecting the public health, that it would hesitate to say it could not entirely suppress any occupation which is in fact wholly inimical to the public health.

Courts take judicial notice of those things which are common knowledge to the majority of mankind. Hobbs v. St. Louis, M. & S. R. Co. 113 Mo. App. 133, 87 S. W. 525; Greenl. Ev. 14th ed. § 6; Grimes v. Eddy, 126 Mo. 168, 26 L.R.A. 638, 47 Am. St. Rep. 653, 28 S. W. 756. But we do not judicially know how much time would be required to teach the average student to satisfactorily perform all the work required of a public barber in such a manner as to prevent the spread of disease.

The courts take judicial notice that some diseases are spread by diseased persons coming in contact with those who are healthy, and that barbers on account of their very close contact with their customers may contract diseases or allow their tools or soaps to become contaminated by the virus or germs of diseases, and thereby communicate such diseases to their patrons, therefore a prima facie presumption arises that barbers should be able to determine whether or not those who apply to them for shaves are afflicted with contagious or infectious diseases, particularly diseases of the skin. We have already determined that public barber shops are a proper subject of legislative control. Ex parte Lucas, 160 Mo. 218, loc. cit. 233, 234, 61 S. W. 218.

Therefore, as the legislature was proceeding within its proper sphere in enacting chapter 13, supra, we hold that its action in fixing the course in barber colleges at two years is not unconstitutional.

The state cannot convert to its own use the property or labor of a citizen, without compensation, under the pretext of preventing the spread of disease, but, because a law designed to protect public health requires a student to work two years before becoming a public barber, it does not for that reason violate § 4 of article 2 of the Constitution of Missouri guarantying to all persons the enjoyment of the gains of their own industry; nor does it conflict with § 30, art. 2, of said Constitution, nor with § 1 of the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, prohibiting the taking of property without due process of law. St. Louis v. Liessing, 190 Mo. 464, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 918, 109 Am. St. Rep. 774, 89 S. W. 611, 4 Ann. Cas. 112.

"The general right to engage person or property in any trade, profession, or business is subject to the power inherent in the state to make all rules and regulations respecting the use and enjoyment of property rights necessary for the preservation of the public health, morals, comfort, order, and safety; and such regulations do not deprive owners of property without due process of law." 8 Cyc. 1110.

It may be that the law under consideration, requiring a two years' course for barbers, places a needless restriction upon those who desire to learn the barber's trade (legislatures, like courts, sometimes make mistakes); if so, relief should be sought through the legislature. We have no general veto power, and cannot annul public laws simply because they are in some respects unwise or inexpedient. State ex rel. Scotland County v. Bacon, 107 Mo. 627, loc. cit. 633, 18 S. W. 19; O'Connor v. St. Louis Transit Co. 198 Mo. loc. cit. 642, 115 Am. St. Rep. 495, 8 Ann. Cas. 703, 97 S. W. 150.

2. Plaintiff assails the constitutionality of chapter 13, supra, because the title of the bill creating the law is not broad enough to embrace barber colleges, and the law therefore is obnoxious to § 28, art. 4. of the Constitution of Missouri, requiring the subject of each bill to be clearly expressed in its title. The title is as follows: "An Act to Establish a Board of Examiners for Barbers, and To Regulate the Occupation of a Barber, in This State, and To Prevent the Spreading of Contagious Disease."

The above title is amply sufficient to support that part of the law authorizing the regulation of barber colleges and apprentices in barber shops. No better way could be thought of to regulate a vocation or trade than to require those who desire to pursue the same to become learned in the trade by serving an apprenticeship or attending a school where the trade is taught. State v. Doerring, 194 Mo. 398, 92 S. W. 489.

3. Plaintiff further contends that said

§ 1187, supra, is class legislation in that it divides a natural class of persons into artificial classes contrary to § 53, art. 4, of our Constitution, by prohibiting students in barber colleges from charging for their services, while allowing apprentices in barber shops to charge for their work. This contention may be well founded, but, as we find that such parts of said section as prohibit apprentices receiving pay for their services are invalid on another ground, it is not necessary to consider this assignment.

4. It is earnestly insisted by plaintiff that § 1187, Rev. Stat. 1909, which prohibits students or apprentices in barber colleges from making any charge for their services while learning the barber's trade, deprives such students of the gains of their own industry, as prohibited by the aforesaid § 4, art. 2, of the Constitution of Missouri.

After twice hearing this cause and giving it most diligent consideration, we have arrived at the conclusion that this contention is correct. It is proven, and not denied, that practically everything a skilful barber should know is learned through physical labor in shaving, cutting, and dressing the hair and beard, with such observations as he may make while performing the physical labor under the suggestions and directions of a competent instructor.

Now if students of the barber's trade be compelled to labor two years without pay and without their instructor's receiving any remuneration for their services (as required by § 1187, supra), it is difficult to see why they would not thereby be deprived of the gains of their own industry, as prohibited by our organic law. If a barber college or the proprietor of a barber shop were allowed to receive pay for the labor performed by a student or apprentice, then such barber college or proprietor of a barber shop could afford to teach the barber's trade or aid the student or apprentice in learning the trade for a reasonable compensation, and the student would thereby indirectly receive some remuneration for his toil, but such is not the case under the law now in judgment.

The practice of boys or young men apprenticing themselves to skilful mechanics, artisans, or professional men in order to qualify themselves for useful trades and professions, is almost as old as civilization itself, but the barber's law is the first regulation which has ever come to our knowledge that prohibits both the apprentice and his master from receiving any remuneration whatever for services of the apprentice, thereby compelling the apprentice to waste two years of his time while qualifying for a public barber.

It is true, as announced in Ex parte Lucas, 160 Mo. 218, 61 S. W. 218, that the barber trade, because of its intimate relation to the public health, is a proper subject of legislative control under the general police power of the state, but it does not follow that the legislature may impose arbitrary or capricious exactions upon the students of that occupation which have no relation to the public health. The legislature, having recognized the legitimacy of this profession, cannot destroy it under the guise of "regulation."

The learned attorney for defendants has not assigned any reason or called our attention to any fact even remotely indicating that the public health will be promoted, protected, or safeguarded by requiring students of the barber's trade to work two years without compensation. On the contrary, the simplest application of the laws of reason and common sense demonstrates that an apprentice who receives compensation for his toil will take a deeper interest in his work, and learn more thoroughly those things which he needs to know about preventing the spread of disease, than if he be required to work without pay; hence that part of the law under consideration cannot be even said to tend to promote the public health, which is the pretended purpose for which it was enacted.

5. Plaintiff also attacks the constitutionality of said § 1187, Rev. Stat. 1909, because it prohibits barber colleges from displaying any other sign than "barber school" or "barber college," and is therefore a local or special law and in conflict with § 53, art. 4, of the Constitution of Missouri, prohibiting the enactment of any special law where a general law can be made applicable. One of the defendants' grounds for attempting to revoke the license of plaintiff's instructor is because he displayed on plaintiff's college signs not authorized by law. Therefore this point is squarely at issue in this case.

The sign of the college, like the sign used by any other institution, is but a means of advertising the character of its business. We can see no connection between safe guarding the public health, and denying the right of any person conducting a moral and legitimate business to advertise the same in any manner he sees fit, so long as his advertisements speak the truth and do not deceive the public.

Chapter 13, supra, expressly recognizes the right of barber colleges to teach the barber's occupation, consequently, so far as the sanction of the law is concerned, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

they are on an exact level with every college where other useful trades and professions are taught; and we can conceive of no reason why its right to advertise its business could not have been governed by a general law prohibiting all schools and colleges from displaying any sign or advertisement except the name of the occupation therein taught. In the case of State v. Granneman, 132 Mo. 326, 33 S. W. 784, we held a law unconstitutional which prohibits barbers from working on Sunday, because the act was special legislation and could have been covered by a general law.

Section 1187, supra, in so far as it prohibits barber schools and barber colleges from advertising their business the same as other schools, and in so far as it prevents barber colleges and students therein from charging or receiving pay for their services, seems to have been intended to discourage additional persons from learning the barber's trade, thereby creating a monopoly for those who have already become skilled in that vocation, and such a purpose would also render the law invalid under § 53, art. 4, of the Missouri Constitution, which prohibits the general assembly from "granting to any . . . association or individual any special or exclusive right, privilege, or immunity."

6. The plaintiff's resourceful attorneys have in their brief assailed the constitutionality of the barber's law on other grounds not within the issues presented in this case, but we will not consider these points until they are presented on facts which render it necessary and appropriate to investigate them. Defendants also contend that, if students of the barber's trade are permitted to charge for their services, they will become active competitors of licensed barbers. Such competition as comes from the labor of apprentices is a necessary and unavoidable incident of all trades and professions. Defendants' argument is unsound for another reason. If we concede that it is lawful to teach the barber's trade at all, then the work of apprentices will be less injurious to licensed barbers, if such apprentices charge for their services, than if they work without pay, for the same reason that the convict labor is more injurious to workmen than paid labor.

Possibly some barbers, like some lawyers and other persons who have attained successful and remunerative positions in professional and commercial life, become anxious to shut out competition by "burning the bridges behind them," so to speak; but such a scheme is entirely un-American, because it is the policy of a free commonwealth to encourage thrift and industry among its citizens, and to keep the door of opportunity ajar so that every qualified and deserving person who so desires may enter thereat.

While we find that those provisions of § 1187, supra, which prohibit barber colleges and barber schools from advertising their business, and prohibit such schools and students therein from charging for their services, are void because obnoxious to the Constitution, yet as we have seen that the provisions requiring a two-year course in such schools to entitle students to a barber's license is constitutional, and the plaintiff having violated the latter provision of said section by graduating or pretending to graduate students in less than two years, as charged by defendants, the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE, Appt.,

v.

AUGUST SCHNELL.

(131 Ky. 104, 114 S. W. 742.)

License — barber — classification — authority.

Under statutory authority to grade and classify callings and businesses and exact license fees based thereon within maximum

Note. — Validity and effect of license tax on barbers.

It is said in 25 Cyc. 598, that power to license, which, strictly speaking, is simply a power to sell a privilege, may be upheld when a special benefit is conferred at the expense of the general public, or the business imposes a special burden on the public, or where the business is injurious to or involves danger to the public.

Generally as to constitutionality and effect of restrictions on trade of barber, see the note to Moler v. Whisman, ante, 629. See also in that note references to notes on analogous questions. As shown in that note there are cases dealing with statutes requiring barbers to register with, and be examined by, a state board of examiners, and to obtain a certificate of registration upon the payment of a small fee. Most of these cases are not pertinent to the present inquiry, since they discuss the validity of such acts from the standpoint of police regulations, and seem not to involve any contention that the registration fee was a tax. In fact but one case has been found which was resolved upon the general principles relating to taxation. That case, Jackson v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 557, 117 S. W. 818, holds that there is an unconstitu-and minimum rates, a municipal corporation may, within these limits, fix a minimum license fee to be paid by all barbers, and an additional one for each chair used above a specified number.

Same — reasonableness.

2. A classification of barbers for the imposition of license taxes by the number of chairs in use, $2 being added to the minimum fee for each chair above two, is not unreasonable.

Same — statutory duty — license officers — common council.

3. A statute requiring the license officers to take the oath of the applicant, or other evidence, before issuing a license to a barber, and from it determine the amount of the tax, does not prevent the common council of the municipality from fixing the classes subject to the different license fees.

Tax — property — license.

4. Grading a barber's license fee according to the chairs in use does not make it a property tax.

APPEAL by the city from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County. Criminal Division, sustaining in part a demurrer to a warrant issued for violation of a city ordinance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. E. Richards and E. O. Underwood for appellant.

Messrs. Kohn, Baird, Sloss, & Kohn for appellee.

O'Rear, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In November, 1906, the general council of tional denial of equal privileges and immunities in a classification of persons who are subjected to the operation of a statute requiring the registration of barbers and the payment of a fee of $2 for a registration certificate, where the act excepts from its operation students of the state university and other schools who are making their way by serving as barbers, persons who are serving as barbers in eleemosynary institutions, and persons following the occupation of a barber in towns of 1,000 or less.

The only further cases found on this question are decisions holding that the trade of barber is a "mechanical pursuit" within the meaning of a constitutional exemption from license taxation (State v. Dielenschneider, 44 La. Ann. 1116, 11 So. 823); and that this applies to a barber who employs others in his business (State v. Hirn, 46 La. Ann. 1443, 16 So. 403); and La Porta v. Board of Health, 71 N. J. L. 88, 58 Atl. 115, which holds that a municipal license fee of $2 upon barbers is reasonable, and apparently justifies the ordinance imposing the fee, and also prescribing the rules to be observed in barber shops, under a statute giving the municipal officers authority to prevent the spreading of skin diseases.

the city of Louisville passed an ordinance out of which grows the present litigation. So much of the ordinance as is material to these cases is as follows:

"An ordinance providing for certain licenses, the fees thereof to be paid into the sinking fund of the city of Louisville.

"Be it ordained by the general council of the city of Louisville:

"Section 1. That hereafter the following licenses shall be paid into the sinking fund, of the city of Louisville for the purposes of the sinking fund for doing the business following the callings, occupations, and professions, or using or holding or exhibiting the articles hereinafter named, in the city of Louisville, in addition to the ad valorem taxes heretofore levied or hereafter to be levied on any species of property in the city of Louisville."

"Sec. 8 . . . Each barber shop shall pay a license of $5 per year and $2 additional for each chair, where more than two chairs are used."

"Sec. 108 . . . This ordinance shall take effect from and after its publication."

This ordinance was published and took effect December 1, 1906. A large number of barbers not having paid the license prescribed by this ordinance on March 22, 1907, the city had warrants issued before the judge of the police court to show cause why they should not be fined for plying their trade without the license required by the ordinance. A demurrer to the warrants was sustained in the police court, and the warrants were dismissed. This case was appealed to the circuit court, where a demurrer was sustained to so much of the warrant as based the prosecution upon the failure to pay the license fee of $2 for each chair where more than two chairs were used. The city refused to accept the construction thus placed upon the ordinance by the circuit court, which was in effect that the ordinance was invalid as to the $2 license tax, and from the judgment dismissing the warrant as to that charge this appeal is prosecuted.

The Constitution allows (§ 171) the legislature to provide for the imposition of taxes by cities based upon licenses. Section 181 of the same instrument reads:

" . . . The general assembly may, by general laws only, provide for the payment of license fees on franchises, stock used for breeding purposes, the various trades, occupations, and professions, or a special or excise tax. . . ." The legislature has exercised the privilege thus granted to it, and as to cities of the first class has empowered them to grade and classify certain callings and businesses, and to exact license fees based thereon, to be applied within the minimum and maximum rates named by the statute conferring the power. Ky. Stat. 1903, § 3011. The keeping of barber shops is included in this section. It is the contention of appellants that the authority is lacking to grade barber shops. But we think where the authority is given to license an occupation at say from $5 to $500, it means not alone that all who engage in that occupation may be licensed at the same rate anywhere between the lowest and highest figures allowed, but that those engaged in the particular occupation may be graded upon any reasonable, tangible basis, and the license fees applied according to the judgment of the taxing power to each class between the extremes indicated in the grant of power. All who engage in the business of keeping barber shops do not necessarily belong to the same class or may not. The purpose was to impose the tax upon the occupation. If no more than two chairs—that is, two persons plying that trade—were employed in a shop, then all shops of that character were put into one class, and all in that class taxed the uniform fee of $5. But, if more than two were so employed, then for each additional barber chair in use a new class was created, and all in such class were taxed $7, and so on for each additional chair $2 being added. This, we think, was not an unreasonable classification, and was such as was allowed by the statute. In addition, § 3017, Ky. Stat. 1903, expressly empowers the common council to grade such occupation. Appellant contends that as the statute (§ 3017, Ky. Stat. 1903) required the clerk and treasurer of the license board to take the oath of the licensee or other evidence before issuing the license, and were from it to determine the tax collectable, there was not authority for the city to directly classify this subject, but that it must be done, if at all, by these ministerial officers. The officers had nothing to do with fixing the classes. They were fixed by the common council. From the oath of the applicant, or other evidence, the clerk and treasurer were to determine whether the applicant belonged to one class or another, and exact the tax and issue the license accordingly.

Nor is this a property tax. The tax is not upon the chairs. It is upon the occupation. The chairs referred to are barber chairs, used by barbers in plying their trade. They are named not as a species of taxation, but as a basis of classification. The tax is upon the vocation, not upon the means of exercising it. The purpose for which the tax was levied was sufficiently specified when it was devoted to the use of the sinking fund of the city.

The ordinance is a valid one under the legislative grant, and the judgment holding to the contrary is reversed, and remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

OF APPEALS, SECOND CIRCUIT.

LAWRENCE E. SEXTON, Trustee, etc., of Alfred Kessler et al.,
v.

KESSLER & COMPANY, Limited, et al.,
Appts.

(97 C. C. A. 161, 172 Fed. 535.)

Bankruptcy — preference — effectuating pledge.

The taking possession by the creditor, within four months of the bankruptcy of the debtor of securities, either negotiable by delivery or indorsed in blank, which the debtor had, prior to the four months' period, set apart at the creditor's request in a package marked "escrow" for the creditor's ac-

Note. — Voidability of transfer within four months' period, pursuant to executory agreement antedating that period.

The early cases upon the question stated, and the principles deducible therefrom, are treated in the note to Godwin v. Murchison Nat. Bank, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 935, the present annotation merely supplementing that note by collation of the authorities decided subsequent to the compilation thereof.

A case somewhat similar in reasoning to SEXTON v. KESSLER & Co. is Re Automobile Livery Service Co. 176 Fed. 792, wherein, in holding that the surrender of property to a pledgee (pledge invalid in inception because of nondelivery) within four months of bankruptcy did not constitute an illegal preference except as against intervening claimants who had proved liens on the alleged property in the meantime, where made in accordance with a prior agreement, the court said: "In the absence of the prior agreement to give the pledge, the subsequent surrender of the property would, without doubt, have constituted a voidable preference. If possession had accompanied the agreement to give the pledge, the pledge would equally without doubt have been valid, though given within four months of the filing of the petition, because of the contemporaneous consideration moving to the bankrupt for the agreement to give the pledge. The pertinent inquiry then is as to whether the subsequent delivery of possession of the pledged property to the pledgee, though without a new consideration, relates back to the original agreement and is rescued from the infirmity it would otherwise be subject to by reason thereof . . . it seems to me that the exercise of the right to take possession of the pledged count, and deposited in his safe-deposit vaults to secure his drafts upon the creditor, notifying the creditor of the transaction and sending him a list of the securities, which were approved by the creditor, is not a voidable preference under the bankruptcy law; since, after taking possession, the creditor may be regarded as holding both by way of mortgage and by way of pledge, and his possession may be regarded as relating back to the time when his right to take it was created.

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York confirming a report of the master in an action brought by a trustee in bankruptcy to set aside the transfer of certain securities given for the payment of drafts. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Lacombe, Ward, and Noyes, Circuit Judges.

property, within the four months, did not constitute an illegal preference, because it was done pursuant to a valid agreement to pledge for which a present consideration had moved to the bankrupt, and therefore related back to such agreement, except as against intervening claimants who had perfected liens on the pledged property in the interim, of whom there were none."

And under an agreement such as that outlined in the SEXTON CASE it has been held that the substitution of new for old accounts which had been paid, for the purpose of keeping the security good, did not constitute voidable preferences, although made within four months of bankruptcy proceedings. Re Reese-Hammond Fire Brick Co. 104 C. C. A. 371, 181 Fed. 641.

SEXTON v. KESSLER & Co. is affirmed in 225 U. S. 90, 56 L. ed. 995, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 657; but the court placed the decision, not upon the ground that the creditor might be regarded as holding by way of mortgage and by way of pledge, but upon the ground that he had an equitable lien, and that taking the security was only an exercise of an equitable right created in good faith before the four months' period.

And the decisions in other recent cases have turned upon the fact that an equitable lien existed. Thus, in Hurley v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 213 U. S. 126, 53 L. ed. 729, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 466, it was held that advances made by the railroad company to enable a coal company under contract to supply coal, to meet its pay roll, amounted to an equitable lien or pledge, enforceable as a preferential claim against the assets of the bankrupt coal company, of such an amount of coal when mined as the moneys so advanced would pay for according to the terms of the original contract. And in Mills v. Virginia-Carolina Lumber Co.

Mr. Abram I. Elkus, with Messrs. McLaughlin, Russell, Coe, & Sprague, for appellants.

Messrs. John Larkin and J. Frankenhelmer for appellees.

Ward, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Kessler & Company, of New York, engaged in the business of banking and foreign exchange, had for a long time drawn upon Kessler & Company, Ltd., of Manchester, without giving any security for payment of its drafts. Early in 1903 the Manchester house wrote the New York house as follows:

"We beg to refer to the question of your providing security for the drawing credit which you have with us, which has already been privately touched upon. We understand from Mr. Edward Kessler that it would not be very convenient for you to 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 901, 90 C. C. A. 154, 164 Fed. 168, where a lumber-mill operator contracted for the mill output and secured advance payments thereon, the purchaser was held not to have secured a preference as a creditor, which he would be required to surrender before proving a secured debt, merely by insisting on and obtaining within four months of the bankruptcy delivery of sufficient lumber to cover the advances which had been made by him. So, in Goodnough Mercantile & Stock Co. v. Galloway, 171 Fed. 940, where advances were made in order to permit the carrying on of a lumber business, bills of sales of lumber made within four months of bankruptcy were held valid where made in carrying into effect a prior agreement for security for such advances, the ground being that the creditor had an equitable lien upon the product of the lumber business.

In Woods v. Klein, 223 Pa. 256, 72 Atl. 523, it was held that the taking possession of a boat under a mortgage giving the right to do so upon default, within four months of bankruptcy, did not amount to the taking of an unlawful preference, where the mortgage lien was valid, and was taken more than four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy.

A few recent cases have adhered to the rule that a mortgage or transfer of his property by an insolvent debtor within the four months' period, which otherwise constitutes a voidable preference, does not lose that character or become valid by the fact that it was executed in performance of a contract to do so, made prior to the four months' period. Thus in Vitzthum v. Large, 162 Fed. 685, it was held,—following Re Great Western Mfg. Co. 81 C. C. A. 341, 152 Fed. 123, and Long v. Farmers' State Bank, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 585, 77 C. C. A. 538, 147 Fed. 360, both of which are set out in the earlier note,—that the fact that property was transferred within four months prior to bankruptcy, to a creditor, to be applied on an antecedent debt pursuant to an agreement antedating that period, did not prevent the recovery of the property by the trustee in bankruptcy. And in Re Smith, 176 Fed. 426,—which also quoted from and relied upon Re Great Western Mfg. Co.,—it was held that the fact that a mortgage executed within four months of bankruptcy, to secure an existing debt, was executed pursuant to a prior oral agreement, did not prevent the transfer from being held a preference, especially 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

where there was no agreement to execute it at any particular time, and it was obvious that it was executed at the particular time chosen, for the purpose of giving a preference. And, relying upon the same authority, it was held in Tilt v. Citizens' Trust Co. 191 Fed. 441, that a transfer of assets to a creditor within the four months' period, which otherwise constituted a voidable preference, did not lose that character by the fact that it was made pursuant to an oral agreement to keep a certain amount of assets in the creditor's hands as security, made more than four months before the bankruptcy. And in Roy v. Salisbury, 134 N. Y. Supp. 733, the court relied upon the Great Western Mfg. Co. Case as authority for holding that a conveyance of real estate, although made in pursuance of an agreement made many years before, that the property should be so deeded in consideration of advancements of moneys for improvements,—constitutes an unlawful preference when made within four months of an act of bankruptcy.

And, of course, no weight is to be given to executory agreements which do not at least have the force of equitable liens. Page v. Rogers, 211 U. S. 575, 53 L. ed. 332, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159, holding that the avoidance, as an unlawful preference, of a conveyance by an insolvent debtor to a creditor in satisfaction of the debts due the latter, or those for which he is liable, cannot be defeated on the theory that such conveyance was in performance of an agreement between the parties, antedating the bankruptcy proceedings by more than four months, where the contract in fact was merely an agreement on the part of the bankrupt and his co-owner to sell, and on the part of the creditor and another, to buy, at a named price, and such contract and a deed drawn in pursuance of its terms were never delivered, but were deposited in escrow, and never became operative instruments; idem holding that a trust deed never delivered as a present, valid, and subsisting obligation cannot excuse a payment by the grantor on the indebtedness covered by such deed, which payment otherwise would be invalid under the bankruptcy law as an unlawful preference; Knapp v. Milwaukee Trust Co. 216 U. S. 545, 54 L. ed. 610, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 412, holding that the lien of a chattel mortgage cannot be established as a preference, where the mortgage under the state law was invalid for want of change of possession.

G. J. C.

provide this immediately, and as we in no way wish to incommode you, although from the altered circumstances of this firm it is a matter of some importance to us, we propose to give you until the 30th of June of this year, by which date the necessary securities should be set aside for us and a list sent to us. We do not propose to name a fixed amount of credit. Suffice it to say that what you are at present using seems large, and rather than an increase we should like to see it somewhat reduced.

"We trust that you may be able to give effect to our wishes even sooner than the date we stipulate for."

In accordance with this letter the New York house, on June 30th, wrote the Manchester house:

"In accordance with instructions from Mr. Alfred Kessler, we have to-day placed in a separate package in our safe-deposit vaults the following securities, package marked 'Escrow for account of Kessler & Co., Limited, Manchester:'"

1,484 shares Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co., at 25	$ 37,100
2,428 shares United Lighting & Heating Co., at 12	29,136
2,352 shares Daimler Manufacturing Co., at 50	117,600
$373,000 United Breweries Co. first 6's, at 65	242,245
	<hr/> $406,081

"This escrow is intended as a protection against our long drawings against your good selves."

July 8th the Manchester house replied as follows:

"We are in receipt of your favor of 30th ultimo, in which you advise us of the securities you have laid aside as security for your long drawings on us. We have noted the particulars as given up to us, and the matter goes in order. If at any time you have the opportunity of realizing these securities or any part of them, you are at liberty to take them and to replace them by others of equal value, though in that case we should of course like to see rather better quality."

December 23, 1903, the Manchester house wrote to the New York house as follows:

"For the purpose of the audit of our books for our yearly balance sheet, we should feel obliged if you would send us, in the form of a certificate, the particulars of the securities you have set aside against your drawing credit with us. We should like this done annually on the 31st December. We do not think the matter will present any difficulty for you. Something in the form of the inclosed is what we require. . . . We certify that we have specially set aside and hold for your acct. on this, the 31st day of December, '03, as security for the drawing credit which you accord us, the following securities: . . . Name secs. and market value."

The New York house not only conformed to these directions, but, in addition, entered the securities so set aside and all substitutions of them on their loan book, and notified the Manchester house of substitutions made from time to time. The securities were always either negotiable by delivery or indorsed in blank. The two houses did business in strict conformity with the foregoing arrangement until the fall of 1907, when a financial panic occurred in the city of New York. October 25th the stability of the New York house being in doubt, it delivered to an agent of the Manchester house then in New York city the escrow securities, which he deposited in a safe deposit company in the name of the Manchester house. November 8th a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the New York house, and November 27th it was adjudicated a bankrupt.

This is an action in equity brought by the trustee in bankruptcy to set aside the transfer of the securities, because made within four months prior to the filing of the petition; the New York house being insolvent, and the Manchester house knowing, or having reason to know, that fact, and the intention being to give it a preference. The matter was referred to a master, who found in accordance with the prayer of the bill, and his report was confirmed by the district judge, from whose decree this appeal is taken.

The master and the district judge both held the transaction in question to be a pledge or an agreement to pledge the escrow securities, and that the delivery of them under the circumstances stated in the bill within four months of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy constituted a voidable preference under the bankrupt act. It may be admitted that the conclusion so reached was entirely right if the arrangement is to be regarded as a pledge or a promise to pledge; possession being essential to the existence of a pledge. This relieves us from the necessity of examining authorities relating to pledges. A word, however, may be said as to the cases of Casey v. Cavaroc, 96 U. S. 467, 24 L. ed. 779, Casey v. National Park Bank, 96 U.

S. 492, 24 L. ed. 789, and Casey v. Schuchardt, 96 U. S. 494, 24 L. ed. 790, upon which the appellant especially relies. In the second case a receipt was given by the bank which might have been treated as a declaration of trust; but the defendant relied on its rights as a pledgee. What Mr. Justice Bradley said in the last case was undoubtedly true of all the cases: "As the only claim made by Schuchardt & Sons in their answer to the securities in question is by way of pledge, and as there was no such delivery and retention of possession by them or their agents or trustees as the law requires to constitute the privilege of a pledge as to third persons, their claim cannot be sustained."

The intention to secure is plain; but this could have been accomplished not only by a pledge, which is the usual course of business in case of choses in action, but by a mortgage or by a trust. It can hardly be doubted that a formally executed declaration of trust as to the specific securities by the New York house in favor of the Manchester house would have been good. The New York house, although the maker of the trust, could have properly acted as the trustee (Locke v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 140 N. Y. 135, 35 N. E. 578), to the extent of the trust, viz., the protection of the Manchester house for its acceptances.

As the transaction was a perfectly honest one, a construction should be adopted to give it effect, if that is possible. In their correspondence the parties used neither the words "mortgage" nor "pledge" nor "trust," but the inapt word "escrow," which they probably did not understand. What they did, however, clearly evidences their intention. The credit to be given to the New York house was not to depend alone upon its strength, but also upon additional security to be given to the Manchester house. The New York house, being the absolute owner of certain specified securities, agreed, in accordance with the requirement of the Manchester house, to hold them for its account, and to that end both segregated them from their other securities and entered them upon their books as so appropriated. The Manchester house as the equitable owners authorized the New York house to withdraw the specified securities, from time to time, for their own purposes, not absolutely, but upon condition that they should substitute securities of equal value, which was always done. There were, accordingly, during the whole period of this credit, specified earmarked or traceable securities held by the New York house for account of the Manchester house. The use of the word "collateral" does not necessarily indicate a pledge. It is important only as showing that the Manchester house's ownership of or interest in the securities was only for the purpose of protecting it for accepting the drafts of the New York house.

Considering the family relation and the long business dealing between the two houses, and the fact that they were dealing 3,000 miles apart, and that they had entire confidence in each other, the arrangement made was natural and reasonable. It was sufficiently precise to protect the Manchester house, and elastic enough to meet the ordinary requirements of the business of the New York house.

If the transaction had been a mortgage of the securities, the delivery of them October 25, 1907, would have been good as against the trustee in bankruptcy, because under the law of the state of New York mortgages of choses in action need not be filed. Lien law (Laws 1897, p. 536, chap. 418) § 90; Humphrey v. Tatman, 198 U. S. 91, 49 L. ed. 956, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 567. Doubtless a court of equity would not intervene to enforce or perfect an imperfect mortgage as against the other creditors of the mortgagor; but no such assistance would have been needed, the mortgagor having voluntarily carried out the purpose of the mortgage by delivering the securities to the mortgagee. This would have been legal, notwithstanding the insolvency of the mortgagor and the knowledge of that fact by the mortgagees. Hauselt v. Harrison, 105 U. S. 401, 26 L. ed. 1075; Wood v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. (D. C.) 143 Fed. 424.

So, in the case of trust receipts, the courts of New York have been astute to carry out the intention of the parties. The course of business is as follows: A banker gives a letter of credit to the purchaser of goods to enable him to pay for them upon condition that bills of lading to the banker's order for the goods shall be delivered to him, accompanied by a draft upon the purchaser. Upon arrival of the goods the banker delivers the bill of lading to the borrower; he executing a trust receipt to hold or sell the goods as the property of the banker for his benefit. Without defining exactly what the relation between the lender and the borrower is as to the goods,—that is, whether it is that of mortgagor and mortgagee or of pledgeor and pledgee, or a conditional sale,—the courts have steadily protected the right of the lender in the goods so delivered. Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank v. Logan, 74 N. Y. 568; Moors v. Kidder, 106 N. Y. 32, 12 N. E. 818; Drexel v. Pease, 133 N. Y. 129, 30 N. E. 732.

We regard the transaction in question as a declaration of trust in respect to the escrow securities by the New York house in favor of the Manchester house. Being the absolute owner of the securities, it declared in consideration of its right to draw, that it held and would hold the same and all securities subsequently substituted therefor for the benefit of the Manchester house. From that moment the legal title was in the New York house, but the equitable in the Manchester house; the New York house holding the securities in a fiduciary capacity. This was the condition on which the Manchester house gave the drawing credit which continued for several years, and it was because of its ownership that its authority to substitute securities was needed and was given.

We do not apprehend that this conclusion will result in the consequences foretold by the appellee. The public was not giving credit to the New York house on the strength of its apparent ownership of these securities, because it knew nothing at all about them. The visible possession of chattels apparently owned by the possessor creates a wholly different situation. In respect to such property the law prohibits secret liens as against creditors. Yet ownership of chattels where there has been no change of possession will be protected if they are set apart and marked, and in this way notice given to the public. First Nat. Bank v. Pennsylvania Trust Co. 60 C. C. A. 100, 124 Fed. 968. There was, however, as to the securities under consideration, no secrecy which was not inherent in their nature. The public does not know what stocks, bonds, or notes a merchant has, and therefore does not give him credit because of them. There is no evidence that any exhibition of or statement as to these securities was made to anyone by the New York house for the purpose of obtaining credit. Their books, if examined, would have shown what the real dealing between them and the Manchester house was.

If there had been no insolvency, and the New York house had withdrawn securities without substituting others, a court of equity would have compelled it to do so, or at least would have enjoined it from making such withdrawals, at the suit of the Manchester house. If, having failed to cover its drafts, the New York house had refused to deliver the securities to the Manchester house, a court of equity would have compelled it to do so. In delivering the securities to the Manchester house October 25, 1907, the New York house acted without the compulsion of a court of equity in strict accordance with the trust it had declared four years before, when entirely solvent. For the first time in that course of dealing there was an expectation that the New York house would not cover its drafts; that the Manchester house would have to pay them and would need to realize upon the securities which the New York house held for its protection. No new right or privilege was then created voidable under the bankrupt act. The delivery of these earmarked securities was in strict pursuance of the agreement made long before on the strength of which the credit was given. Sabin v. Camp (C. C.) 98 Fed. 974, cited with approval in Thompson v. Fairbanks, 196 U. S. 516, 524, 49 L. ed. 577, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306. A liberal construction should be given to these transactions in aid of the obvious intention of the parties.

The decree of the court below is reversed, with costs.

Noyes, Circuit Judge, concurring:

While I concur in the result reached by Judge Ward, I am constrained to base my conclusions upon essentially different grounds; and the case is of such importance, both on account of the amount in controversy and the principles involved, that a separate opinion seems called for.

In considering the case from any point of view, one thing is apparent from the outset, and that is the good faith of the parties. Another thing is also apparent. The New York house intended that the securities in question should afford protection to the Manchester house for their acceptances, and the latter supposed that they were obtaining protection. Both parties acted upon the assumption that that which they did accomplished something. The New York house furnished security in the form desired by the Manchester house, and the latter accepted the former's drawings upon that security. The transaction, if invalid, is only so because it contravenes some statute or positive legal principle; and it cannot be declared invalid without inflicting great hardship upon the Manchester house.

In determining the validity of the transaction, it is necessary, in the first place, to ascertain what its legal nature was. Judge Ward has held that it amounted to a declaration of trust by the New York house in favor of the Manchester house; but I cannot accept this conclusion. It is an essential element in a declaration of trust that title pass from the declarant of the trust as an individual to himself as trustee. It must be shown that he intends to divest himself of the beneficial interest in the property, and to hold it thereafter as a trustee for the benefit of another. Now it is clear from the evidence that this is just what the New York house did not intend to do. They intended to set aside the obligations only as security for their indebtedness to the Manchester house. In case this indebtedness were paid, the latter were to have no interest in the security. The beneficial interest in the property, the equity of redemption, instead of passing to the Manchester house, as would be essential in a declaration of trust, was intended by both parties to remain in the New York house. The initial setting aside of the securities and the course of dealing between the two houses were, in my opinion, wholly inconsistent with the creation or existence of a declaration of trust. The transaction must stand, if at all, as one in which the Manchester house obtained security only.

Now security might have been afforded either by way of mortgage or pledge. The general distinction between a mortgage and a pledge is that in one the title passes, but not necessarily the possession; while in the other the title does not pass, but the possession must. A pledge is a mere lien and something less than a mortgage. As said by the master of the rolls in Jones v. Smith, 2 Ves. Jr. 372: "A mortgage is a pledge and more, for it is an absolute pledge to become an absolute interest if not redeemed at a certain time."

In this case, the bonds, certificates of stock, promissory notes, and other securities were duly indorsed and assigned so that when Kessler & Company, of Manchester, took possession of them shortly before the bankruptcy proceedings, the title to them passed even if it had not done so before. Under these conditions there is the highest authority for saying that, when the Manchester house received the securities so indorsed and assigned, it had a double title to them,—that of mortgagee and pledgee. In the very case principally relied upon by the defendants (Casey v. Cavaroc, 96 U. S. 467, 477, 24 L. ed. 779, 784), the Supreme Court of the United States, in speaking of a case where bills receivable had been both pledged and assigned to a creditor, said: "In such case they [the securities] are held by the creditor by way of mortgage as well as pledge, and a mortgage is valid notwithstanding the mortgagor has the possession. The difference ordinarily recognized between a mortgage and a pledge is that title is transferred by the former, and possession by the latter. Indeed, possession may be considered as of the very essence of a pledge (Pothier, Nantissement, 8); and, if possession be once given up, the pledge, as such, is extinguished. The possession need not be actual. It may be constructive, as where the key of a warehouse containing the goods pledged is delivered, or a bill of lading is assigned. In such case the act done will be considered as a token, standing for actual delivery of the goods. It puts the property under the power and control of the creditor. In some cases such constructive delivery cannot be effected without doing what amounts to a transfer of the property also. The assignment of a bill of lading is of that kind. Such an assignment is necessary, where a pledge is proposed, in order to give the constructive possession required to constitute a pledge; and yet it formally transfers the title also. In such a case there is a union of two distinct forms of security, that of mortgage and that of pledge; mortgage by virtue of the title, and pledge by virtue of the possession.

"This advantage exists when notes and bills are transferred to a creditor by way of collateral security. His possession of them gives them the character of a pledge. Their indorsement if payable to order, or their delivery if payable to bearer, gives him the title also, which is something more than a pledge. This double title existed in White v. Platt, 5 Denio, 269, and in Clark v. Iselin, 21 Wall. 360, 22 L. ed. 568. Hence the actual possession of the securities by the creditor was a matter of less importance in these cases."

I fully appreciate that this language of the supreme court seems in conflict with the generally accepted doctrine that a pledge of choses in action does not necessarily become a mortgage because the title is conveyed. In the case of a chose in action there cannot well be a pledge without an assignment. Thus, if negotiable paper does not require indorsement, title passes to the pledgee upon delivery; if indorsement is necessary, the fact that it is made does not, it is generally held, necessarily make the transaction a mortgage. In such a case it is necessary that the pledgee should have the title in order to obtain effectual security. Consequently, it has usually been said in the case of indorsed shares of stock and negotiable paper that whether a transaction should be regarded as a mortgage or a pledge must be determined from the agreement between the parties.

Accepting this latter view as correct, there is much to support the contention that the parties in this case intended something more than a pledge. They used the word "escrow," which has usually to do with the passing of title. The securities were delivered to the Manchester house as being its property, and they had previously been set aside and marked with its name. But I think it unnecessary to determine whether the transaction was a mortgage or a pledge. It is sufficient to say, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court, as well as in view of the facts shown in addition to the indorsements indicating a mortgage, that the Manchester house, after taking possession, may safely be regarded as holding both by way of mortgage and by way of pledge.

Indeed, the case of Casey v. Cavaroc, supra, would seem to afford authority for the conclusion that the transaction might be valid as a mortgage even if Kessler & Company, of Manchester, had not taken actual possession of the securities before the bankruptcy. As shown in the extract from the opinion already quoted, the matter of the physical possession of securities is of less importance when they are so indorsed that title will pass than when there is a mere attempted pledge. And in another part of the opinion the court said (96 U. S. 486): "It must not be overlooked that the Crédit Mobilier has no other claim to the securities in question but that of pledge. A pledge, and possession, which is its essential ingredient, must be made out, or their privilege fails. An agreement for a pledge raises no privilege. There is no mortgage, for the title of the securities was never transferred to them. The evidence of the cashier is that they were all stamped payable to the order of the bank, when discounted. They were not indorsed by the cashier until the day they were removed by Cavaroc, which was after the bank had failed."

Moreover, were the fact of taking possession absent in this case, it would probably be possible to sustain the claim of the Manchester house to the securities upon broader and more satisfactory lines than could be drawn from the distinction just referred to. The legal difference before delivery of indorsed and unindorsed securities, except in the case of special indorsements, would seem to be slight; but the equities of the case, coupled with what the parties did, aside from any technicality, make out a strong case in support of an equitable lien in the nature of a mortgage upon the securities in favor of the Manchester house, valid against the trustee in bankruptcy without a change of possession. It is unnecessary, however, to determine the case, nor to consider it at length, upon the theory that there was no change of possession, because, as we have seen, the Manchester house did take possession of the securities, and such act is a factor of importance; and, as already shown, after the Manchester house took possession it held the securities, both by way of mortgage and by way of pledge.

Now, there being no fraud in the transaction, and no rights of purchasers or attaching creditors having intervened, the taking possession of the securities by the Manchester house before the bankruptcy was, in the absence of a statute making it unlawful, entirely legal and proper. Re-40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

garded simply as a pledge, the pledgee had the right to take possession. Thus in Parshall v. Eggert, 54 N. Y. 18, the court said: "In the absence of any intermediate right, the parties could perfect a written contract of pledge by subsequent delivery. Even between successive pledgees, without any communication with each other, that one who lawfully obtains possession, at the time of the pledge or subsequently, is entitled to be preferred. . . . A creditor who acquires a specific right to or lien on the thing pledged may prevent the pledgee's interest in an undelivered chattel from attaching; but such is not the condition of the creditor at large. The only ground on which he can claim to prevent the perfecting of such a right in the pledgee is that it works a fraud upon him."

And in Jones on Pledges, 2d ed. § 38, it is said: "A pledge or contract for a pledge, ineffectual for want of delivery, may be rendered valid by a subsequent delivery, even as against an intermediate creditor at large of the pledgeor. Of course, such subsequent delivery would not prevail against a creditor who had, between the time of the making of the contract and taking possession under it, acquired a specific lien upon the thing pledged by attachment or levy of execution. The only other obstacle which could prevent such a transaction from being effectual would be the intervention of fraud."

When, therefore, the Manchester house obtained possession of the securities, it lawfully held them as pledgee and mortgagee, unless its rights were affected by some statute; and the only statute which it claimed to operate against it is the provision of the bankruptcy act (act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, § 60b, 30 Stat. at L. 562, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3445), making transfers of property made under certain conditions within four months of bankruptcy unlawful preferences. So the primary question whether the act applies in this case is whether, within its meaning, the securities in question were transferred within four months of the bankruptcy. If they were not so transferred, there was no preference, and the determination of the question of time will dispose of all questions concerning the securities constituting the general escrow.

Manifestly at some time there was a transfer of the securities. When did it take place? If it took place at the time the parties intended to charge the securities for the benefit and protection of the Manchester house, when they were put aside and indorsed, when the equities of the Manchester house were created, it took place more than four months prior to the bankruptcy. If, on the other hand, it took place only when the physical possession of the securities was taken, it was within the prescribed period.

Now, as bearing upon this question of time, it is clear that the Manchester house had the right at any time to demand and take possession of the securities set aside for its benefit. While the necessity for immediately taking possession was evidently not contemplated by the parties, I think that the very fact that the securities were set aside "in escrow" shows that the right of the Manchester house to take possession was recognized at the beginning. Delivery upon condition is the very essence of an escrow, and, while that term was improperly used by the parties here to describe their transaction, I think it still carries with it the idea of delivery; and, there being no agreement otherwise, delivery would take place when required by the Manchester house. I have no doubt that after demand the Manchester house could have enforced its rights to the possession of the securities in equity if not in law.

The possession having been actually taken within four months of the bankruptcy, we now reach the decisive question whether it can be held to relate back to the time when the right to take possession was created,—whether the act of taking possession created a lien, or merely enlarged and perfected an existing lien. And, in my opinion, in view of the equities between the parties and all the circumstances, such act should relate back to the creation of the right which it perfected, and the transfer be regarded as having taken place more than four months before the bankruptcy.

The case of Thompson v. Fairbanks, 196 U. S. 516, 49 L. ed. 577, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306, seems directly in point here. In that case a mortgagee took possession, with the consent of the mortgagor, of after-acquired property covered by a valid mortgage, within four months before bankruptcy proceedings against the mortgagor; but the Supreme Court held that this was done pursuant to a pre-existing right, and did not constitute a preference, and quoted with approval the following extract from Sabin v. Camp (C. C.) 98 Fed. 974, where it was held that a transaction which was consummated within the prescribed period was not a preference, because it had originated before: "What was done was in pursuance of the pre-existing contract, to which no objection was made. Camp furnished the money out of which the property, which is the subject of the sale to him, was created. He had good right, in equity and in law, to make provision for the security of the money so advanced, and the property purchased by his money is a legitimate security and one frequently employed. There is always a strong equity in favor of a lien by one who advances money upon the property which is the product of the money so advanced. This was what the parties intended at the time, and to this, as already stated, there is, and can be, no objection in law or in morals; and when, at a later date, but still prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, Camp exercised his rights under this valid and equitable arrangement to possess himself of the property and make sale of it in pursuance of his contract, he was not guilty of securing a preference under the bankruptcy law."

The Supreme Court then went on to say: "The principle that the taking possession may sometimes be held to relate back to the time when the right so to do was created is recognized in the above case. So in this case, although there was no actual existing lien upon this after-acquired property until the taking of possession, yet there was a positive agreement, as contained in the mortgage and existing of record, under which the inchoate lien might be asserted and enforced, and, when enforced by the taking of possession, that possession, under the facts of this case, related back to the time of the execution of the mortgage of April, 1891, as it was only by virtue of that mortgage that possession could be taken. The supreme court of Vermont has held that such a mortgage gives an existing lien by contract, which may be enforced by the actual taking of possession, and such lien can only be avoided by an execution or attachment creditor, whose lien actually attaches before the taking of possession by the mortgagee. Although this after-acquired property was subjected to the lien of an attaching or an execution creditor, if perfected before the mortgagee took possession under his mortgage, yet, if there were no such creditor, the enforcement of the lien by taking possession would be legal, even if within the four months provided in the act. There is a distinction between the bald creation of a lien within the four months, and the enforcement of one provided for in a mortgage executed years before the passage of the act, by virtue of which mortgage, and because of the condition broken, the title to the property becomes vested in the mortgagee, and the subsequent taking possession becomes valid, except as above stated."

See also Humphrey v. Tatman, 198 U. S. 91, 49 L. ed. 956, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 567; Wood v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. (D. C.) 143 Fed. 424.

I think these principles applicable here. While the Supreme Court in the cases referred to treats the validity of the mortgages and the rights of the mortgagees thereunder to be matters of local law, in my opinion it also states this underlying and controlling distinction: The exercise of a pre-existing right well founded in equity is not a preference, although occurring within the prescribed period. "The bald creation of a lien within four months" is a preference.

The application of the principle involved in this distinction is decisive here in favor of the Manchester house. It had an equitable right to the securities which were held "in escrow" for its benefit. Its rights and equities were created years before the bankruptcy. It could at any time have enforced its right to the possession of the securities. No element of fraud and no intervening rights of purchasers or attaching creditors appear. The securities were not property the possession of which would be visible to third persons and afford a basis of credit. It is my opinion that possession was taken pursuant to a pre-existing right, and that equitable principles support such right. I think that this is in no aspect a case of the bald creation of a lien within four months of bankruptcy.

The case of Zartman v. First Nat. Bank, 189 N. Y. 273, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1083, 82 N. E. 127, relied upon by the appellee as his principal case upon this point, is not in conflict with these views. In that case there was merely a contract to give a mortgage upon after-acquired property. There was no lien which could have been enlarged or perfected by taking possession.

Finally, I think it a serious question whether a mortgagee or pledgee taking possession of property in pursuance and in the enforcement of a pre-existing right of long standing can properly be said to have reasonable cause to believe that the mortgagor, in surrendering possession, is intending to give him a preference. He takes possession in his own right of that which he looks upon as his own special property. Instead of regarding the transaction as a preference, he would, as suggested in Thompson v. Fairbanks, 196 U. S. 516, 49 L. ed. 577, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306, rather take it as a recognition of his right under his mortgage or pledge. See also Humphrey v. Tatman, 198 U. S. 93, 49 L. ed. 956, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 567.

Upon principles similar to those already considered, I think that the taking of possession by the Manchester house of the securities embraced in the "special escrow" related back to its creation, and, consequently, that that transaction, although occurring within four months of the bankruptcy, was based upon a contemporaneous consideration, and did not constitute a preference.

The decree of the district court should be reversed, with costs.

Lacombe, Circuit Judge:

I concur in the conclusion that the decree should be reversed, for the reasons set forth in the opinion of Judge Noyes.

Affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, May 27, 1912, 225 U. S. 90, 56 L. ed. 995, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 657.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT. (Department No. 2.)

AGNES W. B. SHEPARD et al., Appts.,
v.

CITY OF SEATTLE, Resp't.

(59 Wash. 363, 109 Pac. 1067.)

Municipal corporation — power to declare nuisance — hospital.

1. Municipal authorities may declare an existing hospital within its limits for the treatment of insanity or other mental diseases to be a public nuisance, unless prop-

Note. — Insane asylum or hospital for insane as a nuisance.

The general question whether a hospital is a nuisance is treated in the note to Stotler v. Rochelle, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 49, and see later case, Everett v. Paschall, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 827. As to contagious disease hospital, see notes to Barry v. Smith, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1028, and Manhattan v. Hessin, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 228.

As shown in the notes referred to, the general rule is well established that a hospital is not a nuisance per se, though it may become such by reason of its location or because of the manner in which it is conducted, which presents a question of fact to be determined by the circumstances of each case.

And the rule is the same in cases of hospitals established for the treatment of contagious and infectious diseases as those established for the treatment of ordinary diseases.

And so a hospital established for the treatment of the insane is not a nuisance per se. Crawford v. Protestant Hospital, Montreal L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 57; Heaton v. Packer, 131 App. Div. 812, 116 N. Y. Supp. 46.

Accordingly it has been held that the establishment of a hospital for the insane will not be enjoined even though the location selected is in a residential section of a city, since such institutions may be so constructed and managed as not to unduly interfere with the rights of others. Heaton v. Packer and Crawford v. Protestant Hospital, supra.

erty owners situated within 200 feet of the buildings consent to its location and maintenance.

Same — requiring permit.

2. A municipal corporation may require a written permit from the city health commissioners for the location within its limits of a hospital for the treatment of insanity and other mental diseases.

Same — ordinance — power of court to consider reasons for passage.

3. The courts cannot declare invalid an ordinance prohibiting the location of a hospital within a certain distance of residences without the consent of their owners, because it was passed upon their solicitation.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County dismissing an action brought to restrain the enforcement of a city ordinance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Scott Calhoun, H. D. Hughes, and Peters & Powell, for respondent:

Neither the motives of the members of a city council nor the influences under which they act, can be shown to nullify an ordinance duly passed in legal form within the scope of their corporate powers.

Rudkin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted by the plaintiffs, as owners and lessees of certain property in the city of Seattle, to restrain the city from enforcing, as against the plaintiffs and their property, the provisions of an ordinance entitled, "An Ordinance Regulating the Location and Maintenance of Private Hospitals and Sanatoriums, and Providing for Penalties for the Violation of the Provisions hereof, and Declaring an Emergency." Section 1 of the ordinance reads as follows: "No private hospital or sanatorium shall be established or maintained within the city of Seattle in any building in which any of the sinks or water closets or other drainage are not connected with the public sewers of the city; nor shall any private hospital or sanatorium for the treatment of inebriates or persons suffering from insanity or other mental diseases be established or maintained in any buildings situated within two hundred (200) feet of any private property the owner of which has not consented in writing to the location and maintenance of such hospital or sanatorium, nor in any building without the written permit from the commissioners of health of the city of Seattle." Seattle Ordinance, No. 20,008. Section 2 provides a penalty for any violation of the provisions of § 1; section 3 declares any hospital or sanatorium established or maintained contrary to the provisions of § 1 to be a public nuisance, and provides for its abatement; and § 4 declares an emergency. The court below made findings of fact and conclusions of law, and entered judgment dismissing the action. From the judgment of dismissal the plaintiffs have appealed, and the case is brought here for review on the findings of the court without a statement of facts or bill of exceptions. The material findings made by the trial court are the following:

"The plaintiffs Shepard for more than five years last past have been and are the owners of certain real estate in the city of Seattle, described as lots one (1), two (2), three (3), ten (10), eleven (11), and twelve (12) on block nineteen (19) of John J. McGilvra's second addition to Seattle, upon which there is being conducted by the plaintiffs Loughary and Williamson, who hold said premises under a lease from the plaintiffs Shepard, bearing date the 10th day of December, 1908, a sanatorium for the treatment of persons suffering from nervous and mental diseases, including insane persons. About the year 1902 the plaintiffs Shepard erected on said premises, for residence purposes, the building now in use under said lease as the main sanatorium building, and subsequently the other two buildings thereon, which are small cottages; and about the time of making said lease they, in compliance with its terms, commenced to make sundry valuable improvements upon said buildings and premises, involving a total expense to them of about $4,000, but which improvements were not entirely completed at the time of the passage of the ordinance giving rise to this suit.

"(2) Said premises are situated at a distance of about 3 miles from the center of business in said city, and in a region suitable for residence purposes, and in which such residences as have been erected are of good character; but there is only one house upon the remainder of the block containing said premises (the same being a residence situated on the southwest one quarter of said block, about 60 feet south of said main sanatorium building, and the grounds whereof comprise said entire quarter block),—the plaintiffs' said premises comprising the entire north half of said block,—and there is only one house upon the block next west of that containing said premises (the grounds of which residence comprise said entire block); there are no houses on the block next west or the block diagonally northwest of that containing said single residence, only three on the block diagonally northwest of that containing the plaintiffs' said premises, only three on the block next north of that containing said premises, one on the block diagonally northeast of that containing said premises (on the corner thereof most distant from the plaintiffs' said premises), two or three on the easterly side of the block next east of that containing said premises, none on the block diagonally southeast of that containing said premises, two on the block next south of that containing said premises, and one on the block diagonally southwest of that containing said premises (the grounds of which residence comprise said entire block); each of said blocks consisting of twelve full-size lots of average dimensions of about 60 by 120 feet. A great many of the lots in said region are not yet cleared up, and have original forest growth upon them; and there is a large tract of practically unoccupied ground, with very few houses upon it, lying north of Madison street, between said street and Union bay, on the same hill as the plaintiffs' said premises.

"(3) Said premises are situated on a hillside sloping toward Lake Washington, having natural adaptation for drainage. All said buildings thereon are connected with septic tanks on said premises, built of concrete; the septic tank connected with said main sanatorium building, which was the earliest built of said tanks, was built according to plans and specifications furnished therefor to the plaintiffs Shepard by the city engineer of the defendant, of ample capacity to accommodate a building of that size, long prior to the use of said premises for sanatorium purposes; and prior to the occupation of said premises for sanatorium purposes the board of health of the defendant made an examination of the premises and found them to be in a sanitary condition.

"(4) The plaintiffs Laughary and Williamson are regularly licensed physicians and surgeons, and especially skilled in the treatment of nervous and mental diseases; and in said sanatorium they care for a number of patients who are thus afflicted, including some who are insane. It is not their purpose to harbor as inmates any violent or dangerous persons, but they claim and have the right under their said lease to harbor on said premises persons suffering from any and all kinds of insanity. The windows of said sanatorium are barred with iron screens, and there is a sufficient force of trained nurses, and attendants, and guards properly to care for the patients and inmates of said institution, and said windows are so barred for the purpose of preventing any of said patients from escaping, and attendants and guards are employed for the same purpose; but said premises are not fenced or otherwise inclosed. Said lessees have expended about $3,000 in furnishing and equipping said sanatorium.

"(5) Said lease was in full force and effect, and said lessees were in possession of said premises thereunder and using the same for the purposes of a sanatorium, prior to the passage of ordinance No. 20,008 of the city of Seattle, the passage of which ordinance gave rise to this suit.

"(6) Said sanatorium is not connected with the public sewers of said city, and consent to the location and maintenance thereof on said premises has not been obtained from the owners of any of the private property situate within 200 feet of the buildings in which it is maintained, and no permit for its maintenance in said buildings has been granted by the commissioners of health of the defendant; but there is no public sewer of said city within one thousand (1,000) feet nor within three blocks of said buildings, and ordinance No. 16,372 of said city provides that buildings which are put to ordinary uses must be connected with the public sewers of said city only when there is a sewer within one block of such buildings. There is no block exceeding three hundred (300) feet in length among those surrounding that in which said sanatorium is situated."

In support of their assignments of error the appellants contend that "a private sanatorium for the care of persons suffering from insanity or other mental diseases is not a public nuisance per se, and cannot be made a public nuisance, if not such in fact, by a mere declaration of a municipal legislature;" that "the findings of the trial court establish that the plaintiffs' sanatorium is not a public nuisance in fact," and that the ordinance deprives the appellants of their property without due process of law, and denies to them the equal protection of the law, in violation of the state and Federal Constitutions. The ordinance applies to different kinds of hospitals and sanatoriums, and prescribes different requirements with which those desiring to establish and maintain such institutions must comply. The provisions of the ordinance are severable, both as to the character of the institution and the requirements to be met or complied with. Some of these requirements may be valid and others invalid, or they may be valid as to one kind of an institution and invalid as to another. Seattle v. Pearson, 15 Wash. 575, 46 Pac. 1053; Eureka City v. Wilson, 15 Utah, 67, 62 Am. St. Rep. 904, 48 Pac. 150; Bailey v. State, 30 Neb. 855, 47 N. W. 208; Birmingham v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 98 Ala. 134, 13 So. 141; Ex parte Bizzell, 112 Ala. 210, 21 So. 371; State ex rel. Lamar v. Dillon, 42 Fla. 95, 28 So. 781; Baker v. Lexington, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 809, 53 S. W. 16; Rockville v. Merchant, 60 Mo. App. 365.

In the discussion of this case we will therefore limit ourselves as far as practicable to hospitals or sanatoriums for the treatment of persons suffering from insanity or other mental diseases, such as the lessees propose to establish and maintain on the premises in question. "It is a proper exercise of the police power of the state to prohibit the establishment of private hospitals in localities where, by reason of the crowded condition of the neighborhood or for other reasons, such location would tend to spread contagious diseases, and in the exercise of its police power a municipality may prescribe reasonable regulations for the draining of the premises of private hospitals within the city limits, for the purification and ventilation of the buildings, for the removal therefrom of any patients having infectious or contagious diseases, and for the general management of the hospital grounds and buildings. In Pennsylvania by statutory enactment it has been made unlawful 'hereafter to establish or maintain any additional hospital . . . in the built-up portions of cities; provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the maintenance of any hospital . . . now lawfully established and maintained.'" 21 Cyc. 1110; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 740 et seq.

S. 409, 16 Am. Dec. 189, an ordinance of the city of New Orleans prohibiting the erection of private hospitals within the city limits was upheld as a valid police regulation, but the decision was perhaps controlled in a measure by local sanitary conditions. In Com. v. Charity Hospital, 198 Pa. 270, 47 Atl. 980, an act prohibiting the establishment or maintenance of additional hospitals in the built-up portions of cities was sustained as a valid exercise of the police power.

In Bessones v. Indianapolis, 71 Ind. 189, cited by the appellants, it was held that an ordinance of the city of Indianapolis prohibiting the establishment or maintenance of hospitals within the city limits, without a license or a permit from the common council, was not within the powers conferred upon the city by the legislature of the state, but the power of the state itself was not involved or considered. And we might say in this connection that no question is here involved as to the power of the city of Seattle, as contradistinguished from the power of the state itself, for in all matters appertaining to the public health and public safety substantially the entire police power of the state is vested in municipal corporations of the first class. Smith v. Spokane, 55 Wash. 219, 104 Pac. 249, 19 Ann. Cas. 1220. But even in the Indianapolis case the court conceded that, "under its police power, the city, by its lawmaking authority, might, perhaps, prescribe reasonable rules and regulations for the drainage of the hospital grounds, the purification and proper ventilation of the buildings, for the removal therefrom of any person afflicted with infectious or contagious disease, and for the general management and government of the hospital grounds and buildings, both internally and with relation to adjacent and surrounding property; and such reasonable rules and regulations may doubtless be enforced by proper penalties." This authority would sustain the provision of the present ordinance, requiring hospitals to connect with the public sewers of the city,—at least such hospitals as harbor persons suffering from infectious or contagious diseases. Whether reasonable as to a hospital of the character here in question, we need not inquire, for we are convinced that the second requirement of the ordinance is both reasonable and valid. The ordinance in effect declares that any private hospital or sanatorium for the treatment of inebriates, or persons suffering from insanity or other mental diseases, is a public nuisance, and shall be abated as such, unless its location and maintenance are consented to in writing by the owners of private property situated within 200 feet of the hospital buildings. This, in our opinion, is a valid and reasonable police regulation. The presence of a private insane asylum, with its barred windows, and irresponsible inmates, would annoy, injure, and endanger the comfort, safety, and repose of any person of average sensibilities if located within 200 feet of his place of abode. In other words, it is a matter of common knowledge that the presence of such an institution in a residential portion of a city would practically destroy the value of all property within its immediate vicinity for residence purposes. If so, it was proper and competent for the municipal authorities to require the assent of the injured parties to its location and maintenance. Spokane v. Camp, 50 Wash. 554, 126 Am. St. Rep. 913, 97 Pac. 770.

In the argument before this court much stress was laid on the case of Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 19 L.R.A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152, 32 Pac. 870, but the two cases have little in common, aside from the fact that the two ordinances under consideration are directed against substantially the same business or occupation. The petitioner in that case had purchased 22 acres of land in San Mateo and constructed hospital buildings thereon at great expense. The ordinance directed against him and his property was extremely onerous in its terms. It prohibited the maintenance of such hospitals in any but fireproof buildings; it prohibited their location within 400 yards of any school or residence; it required the construction of a brick or stone wall, 18 inches thick and 12 feet high, around the hospital buildings and grounds, and contained other provisions of a like nature. While the supreme court of California held that the ordinance was unreasonable and void, it nevertheless conceded that "in the management of a hospital where insane persons are treated, it is necessary, and it must be presumed that there will be a sufficient number of competent attendants to prevent danger or damage from any unreasonable actions of such insane persons. Without such attendants no such asylum or hospital could be properly conducted." Again, the court said: "The board of supervisors of a county or the legislative department of any city or town, in which such an asylum is erected, may, undoubtedly, provide by ordinance that patients therein shall not be permitted to leave the grounds upon which it is erected, unless accompanied by an attendant, and may impose a proper penalty upon the superintendent or keeper of such asylum for a failure to conform to such regulation." The court here recognizes the self-evident fact that insane persons are dangerous, and if so, may not a city protect itself against them by excluding private insane asylums from its limits? May it not refuse to intrust the safe-keeping of this dangerous class to private parties, in whose selection it has no choice, and over whose conduct it has no direct control? "Generally it is for the legislature to determine what laws and regulations are needed to protect the public health and secure the public comfort and safety, and, while its measures are calculated, intended, convenient, and appropriate to accomplish these ends, the exercise of its discretion is not subject to review by the courts." Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 110, 50 Am. Rep. 636. "In the exercise of this power the legislature has the right, generally, to determine what laws are needed to preserve the public health and protect the public safety." People v. Havnor, 149 N. Y. 200, 31 L.R.A. 689, 52 Am. St. Rep. 707, 43 N. E. 542. "The judiciary can only arrest the execution of a statute when it conflicts with the Constitution. It cannot run a race of opinions upon points of right, reason, and expediency with the lawmaking power." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 201. Hospitals for the treatment of patients suffering from infectious and contagious diseases have often been adjudged nuisances, when located in the residential parts of cities and towns (Cherry v. Williams, 147 N. C. 452, 125 Am. St. Rep. 566, 15 Ann. Cas. 715, 61 S. E. 267; Deaconess Home & Hospital v. Bontjes, 207 Ill. 553, 64 L.R.A. 215, 69 N. E. 748); and danger from the immediate presence of a hospital of this kind differs in kind, rather than in degree.

The third requirement of the ordinance is a written permit from the city commissioners of health, but this requirement is apparently for the purpose of showing that the other provisions of the ordinance have been complied with. In any event the requirement is unobjectionable in itself. Wilson v. Eureka City, 173 U. S. 32, 43 L. ed. 603, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 317.

The appellants further contend that the ordinance is void because the answer admits that it was enacted "at the solicitation of persons residing in the vicinity of said premises, and solely in their behalf as a local and special regulation." We are not permitted to inquire into the motives of the city council. If the ordinance is valid on its face, the reasons or arguments that may have moved the city council to act are not pertinent here.

There are many unpleasant and annoying things that must be borne by those living in a state of organized society, in order that others may enjoy their equal rights under the law, but the preservation of the public health and public safety is one of the chief objects of local government, and every citizen holds his property subject to a reasonable exercise of the police power of the state.

In our opinion this ordinance is a reasonable and proper application of the time-honored maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, and is sustained by the maxim Salus populi suprema est lex, in which the police power of the state finds its chief support.

The judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

J. L. DAY, Trustee, etc., Appt.,
v.

HOME INSURANCE COMPANY.

(— Ala. —, 58 So. 549.)

Insurance — requirement of inventory — invoices.

1. The fact that a stock of merchandise has not been removed from the storehouse, and that it is covered by the original invoices, does not make inapplicable a provision in a fire insurance policy requiring an inventory.

Same — invoice and books.

2. The books of a merchant, together with the original invoices of his stock, cannot supply the requirements of a policy of insurance on the property requiring an inventory, where the policy requires both inventory and books.

Bankruptcy — insurance claim — non-waiver agreement.

3. A bankrupt and the receiver of his property may enter into a nonwaiver agreement for the purpose of securing an adjustment of a claim under an insurance policy which is claimed to have been forfeited because of failure to comply with the iron-safe clause.

Note. — As to what books and inventories are covered by the requirements of the "iron-safe clause" in an insurance policy, see Ætna Ins. Co. v. Mount, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 471.

For loss or destruction of books, inventory, etc., as excusing their nonproduction as required by policy, see notes to Connecticut F. Ins. Co. v. Jeary, 51 L.R.A. 706, and German Alliance Ins. Co. v. Newbern, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 337.

Insurance — transfer of policy — waiver of forfeiture.

4. A transfer of an insurance policy to cover the goods at a place other than that where they were located when it was originally written, with knowledge that an inventory has not been taken, waives a provision in the policy requiring such inventory.

(February 17, 1912.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Law and Equity Court for Morgan County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an insurance policy. Reversed.

The covenant referred to in the opinion was as follows: "The following covenant and warrant is hereby made a part of this policy: (1) The assured will take a complete itemized inventory of stock on hand at least once in each calendar year, and unless such inventory has been taken within twelve calendar months prior to the date of this policy, one shall be taken in detail within thirty days of issuance of this policy, or this policy shall be null and void from such date, and upon demand of the assured the unearned premium from such date shall be returned. (2) The assured will keep a set of books, which shall clearly and plainly present a complete record of the business transactions, including all purchases, sales, and shipments, both for cash and credit, from date of inventory, as provided for in the first section of this clause and during the continuance of this policy. (3) The assured will keep such books and inventory and also the last preceding inventory, if such has been taken, securely locked in a fireproof safe at night, and at all times when the building mentioned in this policy is not actually open for business, or, failing in this, the assured will keep such books and inventories in some place not exposed to fire which would destroy the aforesaid building. In the event of failure to produce such set of books and inventories for the inspection of this company, this policy shall become null and void, and such failure shall constitute a perpetual bar to any recovery thereon."

Further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Tidwell & Sample, and E. W. Godbey, for appellant:

Invoices may serve as an inventory, where the invoices show a complete list of all of the goods put into a new store a few days before the issuance of the policy.

Va. 432, 115 Am. St. Rep. 924, 53 S. E. 943, 8 Ann. Cas. 866.

The insurance company waived the provision of the policy requiring an inventory.

Goods in the warehouse were not subject to this provision of the "iron-safe clause."

Messrs. Steiner, Crum, & Weil and Callahan & Harris for appellee.

Sayre, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Day brought this action, as trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of W. C. Harmon, against the Home Insurance Company, on a policy insuring a stock of merchandise against loss by fire. Defense was interposed in the way of a plea setting up a breach of the covenant contained in the "iron-safe clause" of the policy. The covenant will be stated by the reporter. The plea was that the covenant had been broken in this: "That the insured had not taken a complete itemized inventory of stock on hand within twelve calendar months prior to the date of the policy, and failed to take such inventory thirty days after the issuance of said policy." Confessing this plea, plaintiff sought to avoid its effect in several special replications, which put forward the propositions, to state them generally in the language of appellant's brief, that where a merchant who has been in business for less than twelve months keeps a part of his stock of goods in a warehouse distant from the store in which he does business, the goods remaining unpacked and in the boxes in which they have been received from jobbers, and being removed from time to time as needed to replenish the active stock on his shelves, the iron-safe clause in a policy of insurance on the stock in the warehouse does not require that an inventory be kept, or, if it does, the requirement is substantially met when the insured keeps all original invoices and a detailed account of all sales.

The circumstances stated as conditions of appellant's first alternative contention are not sufficient to require or permit a declaration that the covenant for an inventory has no office to perform in the policy of insurance. The clause is a perfectly reasonable condition, and is binding on the assured, in the absence of fraud. Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Allen, 128 Ala. 451, 30 So. 537; Cooley, Briefs on Insurance, 1814. In general, contracts of insurance are construed most strongly against the insurer; but where there is no occasion for construction, such contracts must be enforced according to their clear and unambiguous meaning. There is no authority in the courts, on the supposition that the purposes which the parties intended to secure may have been unnecessary or as well secured by other means, to disregard the valid requirements and conditions of such contracts, or to construct, by implication or otherwise, a new agreement in place of that deliberately made by the parties. Dwight v. Germania L. Ins. Co. 103 N. Y. 348, 57 Am. Rep. 729, 8 N. E. 654. But appellant contends that his invoices, plus the books, constituted means of ascertaining the loss, and must be taken as a substantial compliance with the requirement of an inventory. Defendant company had stipulated for both inventory and books, and it is clear that both together constituted an important safeguard against fraud, so that the court has no authority to dispense with either. The contention amounts therefore to just this: That under the peculiar conditions the keeping of the invoices was a substantial compliance with the stipulation for an inventory. An "inventory" means a list made by a merchant of the goods in his store, and the requirement of the policy was that the insured should take a complete itemized inventory of stock on hand within thirty days. Such an inventory not only would furnish evidence of what the stock contained at the time, but provided a starting point for the estimate to be based upon the transactions shown by the inventory and the books. An "invoice" is also a list of goods, but it is prepared by the consignor at the point of shipment. It does not show that the goods therein listed have reached the consignee. Nor is it to be expected that any one invoice should ever be the equivalent of an inventory. Possibly we might concede that in exceptional cases invoices may serve the purpose of an inventory. Such was the case in Ruffner Bros. v. Dutchess Ins. Co. 59 W. Va. 432, 115 Am. St. Rep. 924, 53 S. E. 943, 8 Ann. Cas. 866, where it was held that the bills showing a complete list of all the goods put into a new store within a few days before the issuance of the policy constituted an inventory in substance. But the court said: "Of course, the invoices would not constitute an inventory in the case of a store which has been running for a considerable time. They would not afford any basis upon which to begin the estimate, but in the case of a new store starting simultaneously with the issuance of the policy, or practically so, the first bill constitutes as good a basis for the beginning of the estimate as an inventory could possibly afford." To the same effect is Queen v. Arkansas Ins. Co. v. Forlines, 94 Ark. 227, 126 S. W. 719, in which the language of the court was that "the plaintiff had been in business such a short time that the invoices of the goods first bought by him constituted in effect an itemized inventory of his stock." In McNutt v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co.—Tenn.—, 45 S. W. 61, cited by appellant, a different question was presented. In that case the inventory had been taken as provided by the policy. On the day before the fire the insured had been taking a new inventory, in the same book, which was not completed. Inadvertently the book was left out of the safe and destroyed. The court held that the accidental destruction of the inventory did not forfeit the insurance. The adjudications in these cases seem to take liberties with the contracts which the parties had made for themselves; but we need neither express nor withhold approval, since the cases may be substantially differentiated on their facts from the case at bar. Other cases cited by appellant are in point only to the extent that they hold in a general way that promissory warranties are often conditions subsequent, and courts should apply to them the doctrine that obtains in adjudging forfeitures, which means, we take it, that the court will hold such conditions satisfied by substantial compliance. No case that we have seen goes to the length of holding a series of separate invoices, covering a considerable period of time during which many transactions may have been had, may, by the insured, be made to do service for the itemized inventory demanded by the insurer as a condition of liability, and yielded by the insured in the beginning as a legitimate and reasonable stipulation. Now, appellant's replications were so framed that the invoices of which they speak, and upon which he relied as a substantial equivalent for the inventory which he agreed to take within thirty days, may have been strung along over a time largely in excess of the thirty-day period stipulated for the taking of an inventory in any event; and, if the policy sued on is to be taken as dated from the time when plaintiff's assignor began business, then the better part of a year. That was not a compliance with the contract on the part of the insured, and any liberality of construction which would dispense with its plain terms in favor of the insured would make a contract for the parties which they saw fit not to make for themselves. There was no error in sustaining demurrers to those replications going to the points discussed above. Southern F. Ins. Co. v. Knight, 111 Ga. 622, 52 L.R.A. 70, 78 Am. St. Rep. 216, 36 S. E. 821; Fire Asso. of Philadelphia v. Masterson, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 518, 61 S. W. 962; Roberts, W. & T. Co. v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co. 19 Tex. Civ. App. 338, 48 S. W. 559; St. Landry Wholesale Mercantile Co. v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 114 La. 146, 38 So. 87, 3 Ann. Cas. 821; 2 Cooley, Briefs on Insurance, 1820.

Several of the special replications set up a waiver of the alleged breach of the iron-safe clause in that defendant, after knowledge that the insured had not taken an inventory as required by the iron-safe clause of the policy, recognized and treated the policy as binding and entered into negotiations with plaintiff, as receiver in bankruptcy of the estate of the insured, for an adjustment of the loss, in consequence of which negotiations the said receiver incurred much trouble and expense. Defendant's special rejoinder as amended brought forward a nonwaiver agreement entered into between the insured and the insurer after the loss, and in view of a proposed investigation of the fire and a determination of the amount of the loss. The point taken against the rejoinder is that, after proceedings in bankruptcy have been commenced, the bankrupt can do nothing in derogation of the interests of the estate. If, at the time the nonwaiver agreement was entered into,—that is, at a time between the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings and the appointment of a receiver,—the power to make such agreement resided anywhere, it was with the parties to this suit. The amended rejoinder makes the receiver, plaintiff here, as effectually a party as if he had joined in the paper writing which witnessed the agreement as between the insurer and the insured bankrupt. There was no necessity that the agreement should be reduced to writing. The amended rejoinder avers:

"That the said agreement was signed by Harmon in the presence of the said J. L. Day, receiver, and under the advice of the said Day, and was so signed after the defendant's adjuster had stated to the said Harmon, in the presence of the said Day, that he would not proceed in the investigation of the loss until the defendant was protected against waivers of forfeiture by agreement." The defendant company had a right to investigate the loss without waiving forfeitures; but in view of the facility with which the courts have predicated waivers on the slightest inconvenience caused to the insured, prudence required the nonwaiver agreement if in fact there was no intent to waive. On the facts stated in the rejoinder we do not perceive that the nonwaiver agreement was in derogation of any just interest of the estate. The question of forfeiture was an open one. If there had been a forfeiture, the estate had no just claim to be prejudiced. If, on the contrary, there had been no forfeiture, the agreement operated for the benefit of the estate by expediting a just estimate of the loss. Of such an agreement we think it may be safely said that it estopped the estate and those representing it to subsequently deny its force and effect in a suit brought for the benefit of the estate.

On the first decision of this case it was held that demurrers to plaintiff's several special replications had been properly sustained. On rehearing, the other members of the court are of opinion that the demurrer to special replication C should have been overruled. They put their conclusion on the averment of the replication that, at the time of the transfer of the policy, defendant's agent had notice of the fact that no inventory would be kept. This, they hold, amounted to a modification of the original policy contract, effective to eliminate therefrom the stipulation for an inventory. On this point I am unable to agree, but refrain from any statement of my reasons. It results from the prevailing opinion that the judgment must be reversed.

LIZZIE O'KANE, Appt.,

v.

WALTER O'KANE.

(— Ark. —, 147 S. W. 73.)

Divorce — habitual drunkenness — definition.

To come within the operation of a statute allowing a divorce for habitual drunkenness, one need not be constantly drunk or incapacitated from transacting his business; it being sufficient if he has the fixed habit of frequently and repeatedly getting drunk when opportunity offers, or has lost the will power to resist temptation in that respect.

(April 29, 1912.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Franklin County dismissing a complaint filed to secure a divorce on the ground of habitual drunkenness. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. W. Cotton, R. J. White, and Sellers & Sellers, for appellant:

One may be an habitual drunkard, and still be able to attend to his usual business.

Brown v. Brown, 38 Ark. 324; Page v. Page, 43 Wash. 293, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 914, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1054, 86 Pac. 582; Walton v. Walton, 34 Kan. 195, 8 Pac. 110; Maga-

Note. — Who is an habitual drunkard within the meaning of divorce laws.

Being occasionally under the influence of intoxicants is not habitual drunkenness. Rapp v. Rapp, 149 Mich. 218, 112 N. W. 709; Lentz v. Lentz, — Mich. —, 137 N. W. 229; Smith v. Smith, — Mich. —, 137 N. W. 644; Donley v. Donley, 150 Mo. App. 660, 131 S. W. 356.

Nor is habitual drunkenness shown by habitual, but moderate, use of intoxicating liquors. Bain v. Bain, 79 Neb. 711, 113 N. W. 141.

In Tarrant v. Tarrant, 156 Mo. App. 725, 137 S. W. 56, it is held that habitual drunkenness is established by showing that the party has by frequent indulgence lost the power or will to control his appetite for intoxicating liquors. It is not necessary to show that he is continually intoxicated or that he has a habit of getting drunk during the usual business hours of the day or that his drunkenness incapacitates him from performing the duties of his profession or business.

Garrett v. Garrett, 252 Ill. 318, 96 N. E. 882, reversing 160 Ill. App. 321, defines habitual drunkenness as "an irresistible habit of getting drunk; . . . an involhay v. Magahay, 35 Mich. 210; Tarrant v. Tarrant, 156 Mo. App. 725, 137 S. W. 56; Sitton v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 84 Mo. App. 208; Richards v. Richards, 19 Ill. App. 465.

Mr. Sam. R. Chew, for appellee:

One is addicted to habitual drunkenness who has a fixed habit of frequently being drunk.

Brown v. Brown, 38 Ark. 324.

Habitual drunkenness alone would not be sufficient to warrant the courts of this state in severing the conjugal ties, but the drunkenness must be habitual for a space of one year, and be or become the cause of rendering the marital state of the complaining party intolerable.

Rose v. Rose, 9 Ark. 507.

Hart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, Lizzie O'Kane, instituted this action for divorce against the defendant, Walter O'Kane, in the chancery court, and for cause charged that the defendant had been addicted to habitual drunkenness for the period of one year prior to the commencement of the action. Subsequently she filed an amendment to her complaint, in which she charged him with adultery. The defendant answered and denied the allegations of the complaint, and for grounds of cross complaint charged his wife with adultery. The chancellor dismissed both the complaint and cross complaint for want of equity. They had one child, a girl about seven years of age, and the mother was awarded her custody, with the right of the father to visit the child on all proper occasions. The case is here on appeal.

Our statute provides that where either party shall be addicted to habitual drunkenness for the space of one year, it shall be a ground for divorce. Kirby's Dig. § 2672. Bouvier in his Law Dictionary defines an habitual drunkard to be a person given to inebriety or the excessive use of intoxicating drink, who has lost the power or will, by frequent indulgences, to control his appetite for it. In regard to this question in the case of Brown v. Brown, 38 Ark. 324, Mr. Justice Harrison, speaking for the court, said: "Habitual drunkenness or the degree or course of intemperance that amounts to it, cannot be exactly defined. We may, however, say in general terms that one is addicted to habitual drunkenness who has a fixed habit of frequently getting drunk, and he may be so addicted though he may not oftener be drunk than sober, and may be sober for weeks" (citing authorities).

In the case of Burns v. Burns, 13 Fla. 369, the court said that the charge of habitual intemperance or drunkenness within the meaning of the divorce laws evidently referred to a persistent habit of becoming intoxicated through the use of strong drinks, thus rendering the party's presence in the marital relation disgusting and intolerable. Rose v. Rose, 9 Ark. 507; Magahay v. Magahay, 35 Mich. 210.

In the latter case the court held that one who has the habit of indulging in intoxicating liquors so firmly fixed that he becomes intoxicated as often as the temptation is presented to him is an habitual drunkard within the meaning of the divorce laws. The court said: "He either makes no vigorous effort to resist and overcome the habit, or his will has become so enfeebled by indulgence that resistance is impossible."

To be an habitual drunkard within the meaning of the divorce laws, a person does not have to be constantly drunk, nor necessarily incapacitated from transacting his business. It is sufficient if he has a fixed habit of frequently and repeatedly getting drunk when the opportunity presents itself, or has lost the will power to resist temptation in that respect. The transcript in this case contains over 1,000 typewritten pages, and no useful purpose could be served by setting out the testimony in detail, and commenting at length upon it. We deem it sufficient to state that we have carefully read and considered the testimony, and have come to the conclusion that a clear preponderance of the evidence establishes the fact that the defendant was an habitual drunkard, having a strong and constant tendency to become intoxicated, which is acquired by frequent repetition,—such a frequent indulgence to excess as to show a formed habit and inability to control the appetite."

And Schaub v. Schaub, 117 La. 727, 42 So. 249, defines habitual intemperance as "the custom or habit of getting drunk; the constant indulgence in such stimulants as wine, brandy, and whisky, whereby intoxication is produced; not the ordinary use, but the habitual abuse of them. The habit should be actual and confirmed,"—and holds that such habitual intemperance is not proven by evidence that the party was a frequenter of barrooms during his leisure hours, and drank beer, but not to the degree of intoxication, though at times he was under its influence to the point of loquacity or ill humor, there being nothing to show that his usual mental condition was abnormal, or that he was incapacitated for his daily work.

In McMahon v. McMahon, 170 Ala. 338, 54 So. 165, it is held that a statute providing for divorce "for becoming addicted after marriage to habitual drunkenness" does not apply if a party overcomes the habit for a reasonable period before any steps are taken for a divorce. R. L. S.

On the question of the plaintiff's adultery, we have carefully examined and considered the evidence pertaining to that also, and are of the opinion that a preponderance of the evidence does not establish it. Hence the chancellor was right in dismissing the cross complaint for want of equity. We are also of the opinion that the chancellor did not err in awarding the custody of the little girl to the mother.

It follows that the decree of the chancellor, in so far as it dismissed the complaint of the plaintiff for want of equity, was erroneous, and the case will be remanded, with directions to grant the prayer of the complaint on the ground of drunkenness. The court will also proceed to set apart to plaintiff, in accordance with the terms of the statute governing in such cases, one third of her husband's property, and shall also allow a reasonable fee to plaintiff's solicitors for services in this cause, the same to be paid out of defendant's property before division as aforesaid. The chancellor's order for alimony will be continued until final decree is entered on remand of the cause.

In other respects the decree will be affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

CATHERINE BROWN, Appt.,
v.

PEOPLE'S NATIONAL BANK.

(— Mich. —, 136 N. W. 506.)

Bank — draft — forged indorsement by attorney.

1. A bank which cashes a draft upon indorsement of the payee's name by his attorney-at-law, who has it in his possession, is bound to make good the loss to the payee.

Note. — Delay in giving notice of forgery as estoppel of true owner to recover against party which has paid paper on a forged indorsement.

There are, of course, many cases on the duty of a depositor to notify the bank of the fact that checks paid by it and charged to his account were forgeries (as to which, see notes in 27 L.R.A. 426; 36 L.R.A. 539; 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 744; and 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 79); but comparatively little authority on the question presented in Brown v. People's Nat. Bank, as to estoppel of the true owner of paper to recover on the same against a bank which had previously paid it to another on a forged indorsement, because of delay in notifying the bank of the forgery.

Forgery — failure to notify bank — estoppel.

2. One having notice of facts sufficient to put him on inquiry as to the forged indorsement by his attorney of a draft in his favor, at a time when the bank has assets of the attorney in its possession sufficient to protect itself, and who attempts to collect the money from the attorney, and fails to notify the bank until after it has parted with the assets, is estopped to look to the bank for reimbursement.

Principal and agent — collection by forgery — knowledge — notice.

3. The knowledge as to the forgery of an indorsement on a draft gained by an agent with authority "to try and collect" the amount of it from the one perpetrating the forgery is that of the principal so as to estop him from looking to the bank which cashed the draft, if notice of the forgery is not given it until after it has parted with the securities from which it might otherwise have protected itself.

(May 31, 1912.)

APPEAL by plaintiff on a case-made from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the proceeds of a draft which had been cashed by defendant on a forged indorsement. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Grove H. Wolcott, for appellant:

Recovery in case of a forged indorsement depends upon common-law rules.

Defendant bank paid the money to Campbell at its peril.

52 Atl. 13, where a son as executor of his father's estate sent a draft to the order of his sister in payment of a legacy, believing her living when in fact she was dead, and the draft, coming into possession of deceased's sister, was cashed at a local bank on a forged indorsement, it was held that the executor could not recover from the bank the amount of the draft, where he waited nearly four years after discovering the fraud before notifying the bank that the draft had been paid on a forged indorsement, and had by his own act induced the bank to issue the draft to a dead person, thus paving the way for a perpetration of the fraud. "Both, it is of course conceded," said the court "are innocent victims; but the bank became so because it was induced to act by States [executor]. It did nothing of its own motion. . . . It is suf-cial, and he could not go beyond it and bind the plaintiff by failing to give defendant notice of the forgery.

Mechem, Agency, § 288.

Where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he who has enabled such person to occasion the loss must sustain it.

The defendant did not obtain the draft in good faith. Its loss and that of plaintiff was occasioned by its own negligence. There can, therefore, be no ground of estoppel against plaintiff in the absence of deceit or misrepresentation.

Mr. Thomas E. Barkworth for appellee.

Steere, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of assumpsit, in which plaintiff seeks to recover the sum of $608.37, with interest from the 4th of June, 1907, by reason of defendant having cashed a draft on that date, payable to her order, on which her name had been forged.

This draft was for plaintiff's distributive share of her father's estate, sent from Washington, District of Columbia, to her attorney, in Jackson, Michigan, who forged her indorsement, drew the money, and appropriated it.

sufficient to know that, after she was dead, he requested the bank to issue its draft payable to her order, as if she were living, and that, having allowed himself to be deceived, he continued, though not intending to do so, the deception upon the bank. But for this deception upon it, the bank can justly be heard to complain that its draft would not have been issued and the plaintiff would not now be suing it. If there were no other reason why he should not recover, he is confronted with the rule that, as between two innocent parties, he who, by first acting, makes loss possible by inducing the other to act, must bear it." It may be observed that the superior court (17 Pa. Super. Ct. 256) placed its decision in favor of the bank on the doctrine established by Land Title & T. Co. v. Northwestern Nat. Bank, 196 Pa. 230, 50 L.R.A. 75, 79 Am. St. Rep. 717, 46 Atl. 420, and other cases cited in notes in 50 L.R.A. 75, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 514, and 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1111, to the effect that a bank is protected in paying paper to the person to whom it was issued, although he was an impostor, and did not bear the name by which the payee or indorsee was described. The supreme court, however, did not deem it necessary to consider that ques-

Under a plea of the general issue, notice was given of special matters of defense, as follows:

"(1) That the said plaintiff, after having received due notice, and having knowledge, on or about May 1, 1908, that the check or draft mentioned in plaintiff's declaration had been paid by defendant bank to Robert Campbell, without notice that the signature, purporting to be that of plaintiff, indorsed thereon was not her true and genuine signature, did not give to said defendant bank notice of her claim with respect thereto, or of the fact that her purported signature thereto was not genuine, and that said bank had no notice thereof until August 2, 1909, and that in the meantime said bank had surrendered to said Campbell property in its possession out of which it might have saved itself from loss, had such notice of plaintiff's claim been had by it.

"(2) That said plaintiff, having knowledge or notice that said bank had cashed said draft bearing the purported signature of said plaintiff, elected to follow her claim against Robert Campbell, the party negotiating said draft, and to look to him for repayment therefor, and did not for a long time make any claim against said bank, or seek to hold said bank liable to her on account thereof; and said bank, without notice of said plaintiff's claims or of the false character of said plaintiff's purported signature, was prejudiced thereby by the surrender by it to said Campbell of certain property of value more than enough to have satisfied said obligation, which said sur-tion, but, as indicated, was of the opinion that the plaintiff had in any event lost his right to recover by his conduct after learning of the fraud and forgery. In Schnabel v. Hanover Nat. Bank, 137 N. Y. Supp. 727, an action by the owner of a check which had been paid to his employee on a forged indorsement, against the drawee for conversion, the court said that the duty to give the drawee bank notice that the plaintiffs' employee had been forging checks payable to plaintiffs' order, if it existed at all, could not under any circumstances arise until the plaintiffs had knowledge of the facts, or had been guilty of negligence so gross as to preclude them from asserting a lack of knowledge; and that the allegations in the answer, that plaintiffs had "knowledge, or means of ascertaining, or notice or knowledge of facts sufficient to put them on inquiry as to the facts," were insufficient and demurrable.

Generally, as to the right of drawee of forged check or draft to recover money paid thereon, including the question as to the effect of failure to give notice of the forgery, see notes in 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 49; 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1308; and 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 100.

render was made in ignorance of any claim asserted by said plaintiff against said defendant arising therefrom."

Defendant had judgment at the circuit, and the action is removed to this court on a case-made.

From the statement of facts found by the court, it appears that Robert Campbell, an attorney of Jackson, Michigan, having succeeded to the business of the law partnership of which he had previously been a member, and which had been dissolved pending this collection, by virtue of contract relations with plaintiff, in the latter part of May, 1907, received from the administrator of her father's estate a draft reading as follows, with indorsements subsequently made by him:

$608. Washington, D. C., May 27, 1907.

Pay to the order of Catherine Schilling \$608.37 six hundred eight and $\frac{37}{100}$ dollars.

Fred K. Echelberger, Trust Officer.

Thomas Parker, President.

To the Columbia National Bank, Washington, D. C.

Paid June 7th, 1907.

Indorsements: Catherine Schilling.

Robert Campbell.

This was for her one third of the money which said law firm had been employed to collect. Beside the plaintiff, whose name at that time was Catherine Schilling, were a brother and sister, who were each entitled to, and awarded, a like sum. By the terms of a written contract with the firm of which Campbell was a member, the attorney was entitled to retain thirty per cent as collection fees, upon the whole amount collected.

The plaintiff's brother and sister were residents of Michigan, and each duly received from Campbell the amount to which they were entitled,—$426,—being $608.37, less 30 per cent. The plaintiff, however, lived in North Dakota, and never received her share, although she had, in May, 1907, signed and acknowledged, before a notary, a receipt to the administrator for the same. About a year afterward, she wrote to her brother, Captain Charles J. Smith, in Jackson, that she had not yet received her share of the estate. Smith called upon Campbell for an explanation, and was assured by Campbell that the money had not yet been collected. Not satisfied with Campbell's conduct in the matter, Smith then wrote to the administrator, Washington Loan & Trust Company of Washington, District of Columbia, and learned from it that the money had been sent to Campbell by draft drawn payable to plaintiff's order. His further 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

inquiries in Jackson developed that the draft was paid by the People's National Bank, defendant herein, to Campbell on June 4, 1907. Shortly after receiving the letter from the administrator, Smith called upon Campbell, and told him that he had learned that he (Campbell) had received plaintiff's draft. Campbell then admitted that he had received the money, and intimated that if he had indorsed Mrs. Schilling's name upon the draft he had a right, as her attorney, to do so, but at the same time promised to settle the claim with Mr. Smith, which promise he never fulfilled. On June 1, 1908, Smith wrote his sister the following letter:

My Dear Sister:—

Yours at hand. I have a letter from the administrator stating full facts. Campbell has drawn your money from the bank here the 4th day of last June, 1907, and he has kept it. Now, sister, I have counsel here and they say to make him pay the full amount of $608.37. His contract calls for 30% of that amount. He has broken his contract, and we have him. Just leave that to me. Don't accept anything else. I have been under some expense and I know you will make it right with me. This man Campbell has done wrong. He wanted to bribe me this morning by offering me money, asking me how much he owed me. I will not accept anything from him. I want you to write just as soon as you get this and let me know just what you are doing. Have Winterer write me. You can make him pay the full amount, with interest. Katie, don't accept anything else. Have Winterer write him to that effect, for I have proof here to land him to prison, and he knows it. I saw him this morning, and he said he would pay over the money in one or two days. Now Katie, let me know just what you want me to do, for I am here and I will save you all the expense I can.

Your brother,

Capt. C. J. Smith,
235 E. Wesley.

P. S.—I hope you get this letter before you receive the money which he will try to settle for, about $400.25. Don't do it. If the bar association gets hold of him, it will be all off with him.

C. J. S.

In reply, plaintiff requested her brother to try and collect her money for her, and use his own judgment as to what proceedings to take.

By a letter of May 20, 1908, Smith had learned from the Trust Company of Washington, District of Columbia, that Campbell had requested the draft for Catherine Schilling's share to be made payable to his order; but the same had been previously sent to him, drawn payable to her order. On June 25, 1908, Campbell was arrested on Smith's complaint for embezzling the proceeds of said draft. While in jail, he sent for Smith, and an interview was had at which the sheriff, prosecuting attorney, and F. H. Helmer, cashier of defendant, were present. Helmer, in behalf of Campbell, offered to pay Smith the amount of the draft, less 30 per cent for attorney's fees specified in the contract for collection, proposing in that connection some kind of a paper for Smith to sign, the contents of which are not shown. Smith declined to sign the same, stating he had no counsel, and he was not paid the money. The prosecuting attorney stated at the time that Campbell would be put under bonds. The criminal prosecution is yet pending, and he is under recognizance for trial. After this interview, nothing further was done by Smith to effect a settlement with Campbell. At the time the draft was cashed, Campbell bore a fair reputation as a member of the bar and was a customer of defendant, which had in its possession, until June 27, 1908, personal property belonging to him, amounting to at least three times the amount of plaintiff's claim.

The indorsement of plaintiff's name on the draft was a careful imitation of her genuine signature, and was a forgery. No effort was made by the officers of the bank, when it was cashed, to ascertain whether or not it was genuine. Plaintiff never saw the draft until April 21, 1910, and first learned defendant had cashed it from her present attorney, Mr. Wolcott, who was employed for her by her brother, July 14, 1909. Wolcott was unable to obtain and examine desired papers, and inspect the draft, until about August 4, 1909, when he advised plaintiff of the proposed action, and made written demand on defendant for the amount of the draft, with interest, which was the first notice it received of her intent to hold it responsible on account of the forged indorsement. There was no evidence that any officer of the bank was aware the indorsement was a forgery, until that date.

So far as the record discloses, both parties to this suit were innocent of intentional wrong and honest in this matter; and both had misplaced confidence in Campbell. Plaintiff had employed and trusted him as her attorney. He was then an attorney in fair standing and a customer of the bank. When he presented to his bank the draft, fair on its face, apparently indorsed by the payee and indorsed by himself, the bank naturally cashed it without question on the strength of his indorsement and their acquaintance with him. As her attorney, he had no authority to indorse her name; and his letter to the administrator, requesting that it be made payable to his order, indicates that he well knew it. The power to indorse checks or bills must be expressly conferred; and his employment to collect her claim conferred no authority to indorse a check or draft received in payment of the claim, but made payable to her. Chatham Nat. Bank v. Hochstadter, 11 Daly, 343. The indorsement was an ingenious forgery, and conferred upon the bank no right to collect the money it represented, and no protection in cashing it for him. It was her draft, and could only be legally paid on her indorsement. The fact that Campbell was her attorney, and had it in his possession, made no difference. Prima facie the loss falls on defendant; for a forgery is a nullity, and no protection to anyone. It is manifest she is entitled to recover, unless she is precluded from relying upon the forgery by the defense of equitable estoppel, which is urged by defendant, based on the claim that, by delay and failure to notify the bank within a reasonable time after she knew of the fraud, and by making her claim against Campbell, and attempting to collect it from him, she has released the bank and lost her right against it.

The general rule is that estoppel arises against one who, with knowledge of the fact, fails to give notice until an opportunity of recovery on the forged instrument, which would have been available if prompt notification had been given, is lost. "If a man's name be forged, and after himself becoming aware of the fact he refrain from advising the holder of the document, and by reason of such inaction the holder's position is changed (by the death, escape, or bankruptcy of the forger, or otherwise), there will be estoppel of the man whose name was forged." Ewart, Estoppel, 135.

The forged draft was cashed by defendant June 4, 1907. Defendant had in its possession available personal property of Campbell, furnishing it opportunity to recover on the forged instrument, until June 27, 1908. Demand was first made upon it and notice first given, in her behalf, of the claim that the indorsement was a forgery on August 4, 1909; and it is conceded that there is no evidence that any officer of the bank knew, before that date, that the instrument was forged.

If plaintiff knew it, or her agent had knowledge of it imputable to her, before June 27, 1908, and defendant's opportunity to recover from Campbell on the forged instrument was lost through failure to give notice, she is estopped from asserting the forgery. She had no positive knowledge of the forgery of her indorsement until after that time, but did know of enough facts to put a reasonable person on inquiry. She knew that she had receipted to the administrator for the money in May, 1907. She was advised by letter from her brother, of June 1, 1908, of Campbell's dishonesty; that he had drawn her money from a bank in Jackson on June 4, 1907; that he had broken his contract and tried to bribe her brother. Following the suggestion in her brother's letter to "just leave that to me," she constituted him her agent, and authorized him to "try and collect her money, and use his own judgment as to what proceeding to take;" in fact, turned the whole matter over to him, with full power to act.

Being on the ground, knowing the "full facts," and vested with complete authority to represent her and act for her in the matter, he elected to proceed against Campbell, not by civil suit, but by criminal prosecution instituted in the public name, presumably for the public good and for the suppression of crime, seeking by criminal process to force the payment of a private debt in contravention of public policy. He made no demand on defendant, and gave it no notice of the forgery. His acts, if known to defendant, were an intimation that the grievance was Campbell's failure to pay her the money after he had obtained it, not in the manner of obtaining it. He at that time knew Campbell had drawn the money from the bank a year previous, on a draft payable to her order, not indorsed by her. He remained silent, and permitted defendant to part with the property of Campbell, by which both parties could have been protected, in ignorance of what he knew, which, if communicated, would have avoided the loss. It is the common voice of our authorities that notice of a forgery must be given and demand made without unreasonable delay after knowledge; and that this was not done by Smith is patent from the conceded facts. "He had opportunity to speak, it was his duty to speak, and he failed to speak."

It is claimed his agency was special, only for collection of the claim, and such agency did not require him to give the bank notice; nor did his knowledge of the forgery, if he had any, bind the plaintiff. The scope of his agency was to act for and represent her in collecting the money, to collect which this suit is brought. She left it to him to "try and collect it," and use his own judgment as to what proceeding to take. With that authority, his efforts were her efforts, his judgment was her judgment.

ment, and his knowledge was her knowledge, in all matters involving that transaction.

"Because of the identity of principal and agent in dealings by the agent within the scope of his authority, it is a well settled, general rule, that notice to an agent in the course of his employment, and in relation to a matter within the scope of his actual or apparent authority, is notice to his principal, whether the agent communicates his knowledge to the principal or not." Clarke & S. Agency, § 474; Mechem, Agency, §§ 718, 719.

In United States v. National Exch. Bank (C. C.) 45 Fed. 163, it was held that the neglect of the drawer of a check, for more than a month after discovery that it had been paid upon a forged indorsement, to notify a bank that it will hold it responsible therefor, releases the bank from liability. In the case at bar, defendant was not notified that it would be held responsible for over a year after the agent had discovered the full facts, and the principal, with knowledge of facts sufficient to put a person on inquiry, had commissioned the agent with full discretionary power.

In United States v. National Exch. Bank, supra, it was said: "So, in respect to two persons equally innocent, where one is bound to know and act upon his knowledge, and the other has no means of knowledge, there seems to be no reason for burdening the latter with loss in exoneration of the former; or, if both are equally innocent and equally ignorant, the loss should remain where the chance of business has placed it. Gloucester Bank v. Salem Bank, 17 Mass. 33; Bank of United States v. Bank of Georgia, 10 Wheat. 333, 6 L. ed. 334; Price v. Neal, 3 Burr. 1355, 1 W. Bl. 390."

We are agreed that an equitable estoppel arises in this case by reason of plaintiff's failure to give notice of the fraud to defendant within a reasonable time after it was known to her, or to her authorized agent; and therefore the loss must remain where the chance of business has placed it.

The judgment is affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

UNITED AMERICAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, Resp't,

v.

AMERICAN BONDING COMPANY OF BALTIMORE, Appt.

(146 Wis. 573, 131 N. W. 994.)

Evidence — suretyship — admissions of principal after termination of employment.

1. The O. K. by an insurance agent who is required to remit, for business done, within two months after the expiration of the month in which it is transacted, of a statement of amount due by him to the company within such time, after he has resigned from his position, is admissible in evidence against his surety in an action to hold him liable for a defalcation, since the duty to remit did not terminate with the resignation, and statement as to the amount due, made within the time during which his contract required him to make remittances, was part of the res gestæ.

Bonds — suretyship — statements superseding application.

2. A provision in a surety bond as to the frequency with which the principal's books shall be inspected, supersedes a statement in the application as to the frequency with which it shall be done.

Note. — Admissibility against sureties on bond of statements by principal after expiration of term of office or employment.

Under the general rule that the admissions of the principal can only be received as evidence against the surety when they are made during the transaction of the business for which the surety is bound, so as to become a part of the res gestæ, declarations or admissions made by an officer or agent when his term of office or employment has ceased are not competent to bind the surety. Smith v. Whittingham, 6 Car. & P. 78 (admission as to correctness of account); Evans v. State Bank, 13 Ala. 787; Dennis v. Chapman, 19 Ala. 29, 54 Am. Dec. 186; *Lewis v. Pleading — burden of establishing defense — failure to supervise agent.

3. The surety on the bond of an insurance agent must plead and prove the failure of the company to comply with its undertaking to exercise due and customary supervision over the agent, and notify the surety immediately of any default on the part of the agent, in order to make such failure available to defeat liability on the bond.

On the general question as to how near the main transaction must declarations be made in order to constitute part of the res gestæ, see note to Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Stein, 19 L.R.A. 753.

The following rule as stated by Greenleaf on Evidence, vol. 1, § 187, has been quoted and approved in numerous cases: "The surety is considered as bound only for the actual conduct of the party, and not for whatever he might say he had done; and therefore is entitled to proof of his conduct by original evidence, where it can be had, excluding all declarations of the principal made subsequent to the act to which they relate, and out of the course of his official duty."

In Lewis v. Lee County, supra, it was said: "The point of objection to the competency of the evidence of his declarations, as against his sureties, is not that they were made after his term of office had expired, but that they were not made while he was doing any act, transacting any business, or performing any duty for which the surety was bound. They were subsequent in point of time to all official acts or duties to which they refer, and are simple admissions that in his official capacity he had received money of the county. . . . As to his sureties, they were mere hearsay, creating no inference or presumption of liability for which they were bound to answer."

So, in Lee v. Brown, 21 Kan. 458, it was said: "This admission and settlement were after the default of Lee. These matters referred to past occurrences; they had no connection with the acts to which they related, except as a narrative or admission of what Lee had done at dates prior thereto, and ought not to have been received as evidence so as to bind his sureties; for it was the acts of Lee, and not his admissions or declarations, for which his sureties were bound."

To the same effect are the following cases, where it appeared the term of office or em-money alleged to have been received and collected by plaintiff's agent and converted by him to his own use. Affirmed.

Statement by Barnes, J.:

The plaintiff is a fire insurance company. One Greene was appointed as its agent to represent it in Chicago. Said Greene was employed under two contracts, one written and one oral. The written contract authorized the agent to write surplus lines of insurance in certain specified states. It ran for one year from March 1, 1908, and authorized the agent to receive proposals for insurance, fix rates of premium, receive moneys, countersign, issue, and renew, and consent to the transfer of, policies, subject to the regulations of the company. The compensation fixed was a stipulated percentage on the business written. The contract obligated the agent to furnish a monthly account of the business written each month, and not later than the 10th day of the following month, and provided that "remittances to cover the balances due to the party of the first part shall be forwarded not later than the end of the second month following in which the business is written."

The evidence as to the contents of the oral contract is somewhat indefinite. It permitted the agent to write local business in Chicago, and to write insurance on whiskey stored in bonded warehouses, wherever located, in the United States. The commission was the same as that stipulated in the written contract, but the evidence is silent as to how the business should be reported and when it should be remitted for. As a matter of fact, a daily report was sent to the company of each policy written, which was in effect an abstract of the so-called written portion of the policy. At the end of each month, a statement was made up, showing the number of each policy issued during the month, to whom issued, the rate of premium charged thereon, the amount of the insurance, and the aggregate amount of the premium on the policy. On the reverse side of this statement, the agent charged himself with the aggregate amount of the premiums, less the amount paid out for return premiums on cancellations, and credited himself with his commissions had not ceased, but the admissions were excluded because uttered subsequent in point of time to the duties to which they referred: Shelby v. The Governor, 2 Blackf. 289; Lee v. Brown, 21 Kan. 458; Cook County Liquor Co. v. Brown, 31 Okla. 614, 122 Pac. 167; State v. Randolph, 22 Mo. 474; Hatch v. Elkins, 65 N. Y. 489; Eichhold v. Tiffany, 20 Misc. 681, 46 N. Y. Supp. 534; Wieder v. Union Surety & G. Co. 42 Misc. 499, 86 N. Y. Supp. 105; Strobel & W. Co. v. Wiesen, 144 App. Div. 149, 128 N. Y. Supp. 798; *White v. German Nat. Dec. 129; Snell v. Allen, 1 Swan, 208; Cf. Bank of Brighton v. Smith, 12 Allen, 249, 90 Am. Dec. 144.

Of course, where the rendition of an account after the expiration of the term is one of the duties guaranteed by the surety, evidence concerning it is binding upon the surety. Townsend v. Everett, 4 Ala. 607 (holding account stated by officer after his resignation, showing amount in his hands as treasurer of county, evidence against surety); Jenness v. Black Hawk, 2 Colo. 578; Trustees of Schools v. Cowden, 240 Ill. 39, 88 N. E. 285, affirming 143 Ill. App. 241; Father Matthew Young Men's Total Abstinence Benev. Soc. v. Fitzwilliam, 12 Mo. App. 445, affirmed in 84 Mo. 406 (which is fully set out and discussed in both prevailing and dissenting opinions of the reported case).

Thus, in Lewis v. Lee County, supra, the court said: "In the case before us, we lay no particular stress upon the fact that, prior to the making of the declarations or admissions of Lewis, his term of office as county treasurer had expired. There remained the duty of stating his official account, and of delivering to his successor all the money, books, papers, and property of the county which had come to his possession, and his declarations or admissions accompanying either of these acts, and explanatory of them, would be competent original evidence against his sureties, though his official term had expired."

And in Paxton v. State, 59 Neb. 460, 80 Am. St. Rep. 689, 81 N. W. 383, where the retiring officer handed his successor a statement of the amounts for which he was accountable at the time the office was being turned over, on the day after the expiration of his term of office, it was said: "It was the duty of Bartley to account to his successor, and to turn over all moneys and securities with which he was chargeable. The sureties contracted that this should be done. It was an official duty, the performance of which was necessary to their exoneration. The accounting was made at the very time the law required it to be made; and we therefore think that, although Bartley had ceased to be the de jure treasurer by reason of Meserve's having qualified, his declaration as to the amount of the moneys and securities which he should turn over to his successor was admissible as evidence against the sureties. It was a declaration made during the transaction of business, for which they were liable and so became part of the res gestæ."

It is sometimes a question of doubt whether the rendition of an account after the employment has ceased is one of the duties guaranteed by the surety. See dissenting opinion in the reported case. A. L. R.

mission, postage, and taxes, if any. The balance represented the amount due to the company on the month's business. It was shown by the testimony in the case, however, that both of the parties understood that these monthly statements showed the amount of business written, and did not show what premiums had been collected and what had not been. The plaintiff applied to the defendant for a bond to indemnify it against default on the part of its agent. The application is dated April 2, 1908, but was for a bond to run for one year from February 1, 1908. The bond issued pursuant to the application was dated April 17, 1908, and covered the period specified in the application. It indemnified the plaintiff against loss sustained by larceny or embezzlement committed by its employee, but did not cover any losses that the agent might suffer by extending credit to policy holders of the plaintiff. The agent resigned his position about December 1, 1908, and the plaintiff contends that the agent embezzled money belonging to it in the sum of $2,904.80, to recover which amount this action is brought against the surety. The secretary of the plaintiff testified that the resignation took place about November 1st, but the monthly accounts rendered by the agent showed that he transacted the usual volume of business as agent during the month of November.

The defense rested substantially on two propositions: (1) That there was no proof of embezzlement made in the case; (2) that the plaintiff had forfeited its right to recover upon its bond by reason of having violated the representations contained in its application for the bond, and also by reason of its having violated the conditions of the bond itself. At the close of the testimony, the court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and from the judgment on such verdict the defendant appeals.

Messrs. Churchill, Bennett, & Churchill, for appellant:

The testimony of Frank A. Krehla, secretary of the plaintiff, as to conversations, statements, and declarations of Cornelius W. Greene, the plaintiff's agent, was hearsay, and was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial and prejudicial error.

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bond sued on obligated the surety to "make good to the employer, within sixty days, any loss sustained by the employer by larceny or embezzlement committed by the employee during a term" of one year from February 1, 1908. The appellant contends that no competent proof was offered to show that the agent, Greene, had collected, or at any time had in his hands, any money belonging to the plaintiff which had not been paid to it, and that the court erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff and in refusing to direct one for the defendant. The plaintiff insists that the required proof was presented.

The agent of the plaintiff admitted to its secretary on December 22, 1908, that he had collected and used $2,800 of money belonging to the plaintiff. The total amount due or to become due the plaintiff for collected and uncollected premiums at this time, according to statements rendered by the agent, was $3,604.80. Of this amount $700 was paid after December 22d. A statement of account was compiled by the plaintiff from the daily reports and monthly accounts rendered by the agent, which was submitted to the latter on May 17, 1910, and showed a balance of $2,904.80. The statement is Exhibit 29 of the record. The agent then admitted the correctness of the account, and that he had collected and retained the entire balance shown by the account. It is suggested that this evidence was modified by the witness on cross-examination; but such is not the fact. If this testimony was competent, a prima facie case of embezzlement was made by plaintiff, as the evidence showed the volume of business done by the agent, the amount of his principal's money which he received and converted to his own use, and repeated demands that he pay the money over.

It is conceded by both parties that any admission by the agent of the amount of money in his hands belonging to his principal, made prior to his resignation, would be competent evidence against the surety. Goldman v. Fidelity & D. Co. 125 Wis. 390, 396, 104 N. W. 80, and cases cited. It is contended by the defendant, however, that such admissions were made after the agency was terminated, and were therefore incompetent. There are many cases holding, generally, that declarations or admissions made by an agent when his employment has ceased are not competent in an action by the principal against the surety. Lee v. Brown, 21 Kan. 458; Knott v. Peterson, 125 Iowa, 404, 407, 101 N. W. 173; Wieder v. Union Surety & G. Co. 42 Misc. 499, 86 N. Y. Supp. 105; Chelmsford Co. v. Demarest, 7 Gray, 1, 7; *Lewis v. The cases in this court bearing on the question are Stone v. Northwestern Sleigh Co. 70 Wis. 585, 587, 36 N. W. 248; Coxe Bros. & Co. v. Milbrath, 110 Wis. 499, 505, 86 N. W. 174; Kamp v. Coxe Bros. & Co. 122 Wis. 206, 212, 99 N. W. 366; New Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Simon, 113 Wis. 267, 89 N. W. 144. None of these cases present the same facts as does the case before us.

It was the duty of the agent, under the written contract, to remit for the business written in October not later than December 31st, and for that written in November not later than the 31st of January following. The time for making remittances for business written under the oral contract does not appear. The agent tendered his resignation about December 1st, and after that time wrote no new business. It was still the duty of the agent after his resignation to make remittances during the months of December and January, according to the terms of his contract, and to collect any outstanding premiums that were unpaid, and to account for and remit such premiums to the plaintiff, less his commission and expenses. This much satisfactorily appears from the whole record. Even if the record were silent, the duty of an agent to account for moneys coming into his hands is well settled. See collection of cases found in 31 Cyc. 1470, note 90, and 2 Enc. L. & P. 2d ed. 1070 and 1057. Even after his resignation, it was contemplated that Greene would continue to perform his former duties of collecting premiums due to the company, and of remitting the same to it. The agent did not make up Exhibit 29, but it was compiled from statements which he had rendered, and the only thing in reference thereto which it was necessary for the plaintiff to be advised upon was whether or not the business reported as having been written had been paid for by the policy holders to the agent. When he stated that all of the moneys had been collected, he was not making a mere casual remark, but was discharging a duty that devolved upon him under his old contract.

The question we have before us therefore is, Where an agent renders an account or O. K.'s an account submitted to him after his employment has ceased, but which it is his duty under his contract to render or to O. K., as the case may be, is that act a part of the res gestæ, and admissible in evidence as such, in an action against the surety? There is no question but that, if the statement had been O. K.'d while he was still actively engaged as agent for the plaintiff, it would be receivable in evidence against the surety. Should that rule be extended beyond the term of employment? The case to which our attention has been called that bears most directly on the subject is Father Matthew Young Men's Total Abstinence Soc. v. Fitzwilliam, 12 Mo. App. 445, 449, which was affirmed in 84 Mo. 406. There the treasurer of the society had been removed for dishonesty. After his removal, he made a statement showing the amount of his defalcation, which was admitted in evidence in an action against the surety. The latter claimed that the evidence was incompetent, but the court held that it was the duty of the treasurer to make up a statement of his account, and, such being the case, what he did in this regard was as much a part of the res gestæ as if the work had been done before he had ceased to be treasurer. Some significance is given to the fact that the statement was made during the term of office for which the defaulting treasurer had been elected, but we fail to see how this fact can have very much weight in determining whether the evidence was admissible or not. He was not the treasurer when the statement was made. It has also been held that, where it is the duty of a public officer to render an account of the moneys in his hands as such officer, but he fails to do so before the expiration of his term, a performance of such duty thereafter renders the admissions made competent evidence against the surety. Townsend v. Everett, 4 Ala. 607, approved in Lewis v. Lee County, 73 Ala. 148; Jenness v. Black Hawk, 2 Colo. 578; Wyehe v. Myrick, 14 Ga. 584. These cases are quite analogous in principle to the one before us. Other authorities holding that the true test of admissibility is whether the admission is made in the course of official duty are 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, 16th ed. § 187; Douglass v. Howland, 24 Wend. 35, 59. See also 2 Wigmore, Ev. § 1077. We perceive no very good reason why, where an agent does an act which it is his duty under his contract to perform, evidence of that act, after his principal duty as agent has ceased, should not be admissible, as well as if made during the time he was actively performing his duties; and we think it would be the better rule to hold such testimony competent. We conclude, therefore, that a prima facie case of embezzlement was made; there being no evidence offered by the defendant upon the question.

In the application of the plaintiff for a surety bond, it was stated: (1) That the agent would remit on the 10th of each month; (2) that he would not be permitted to retain balances; (3) that his accounts and books would be inspected, audited, and verified at least once a month; and (4) that his outstanding accounts would be verified at least once a month. It was further stated that it was agreed that the answers of the applicant should be warranties, and form part of and be conditions precedent to the issuance, continuance, or renewal of the bond. The bond itself contained a statement that all "the representations made by the employer . . . to the surety are warranted to be true." This probably refers to the representations contained in the application for the bond.

The appellant claims that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove the truth of the representations made as a condition precedent to the right of recovery. The respondent contends that the representations were mere warranties or conditions subsequent, which should be pleaded and proven as a defense. The question whether the representations were conditions precedent or warranties is not very material, however, inasmuch as these conditions and the breach thereof were pleaded as a defense, and the proof showed that the agent did not remit on the 10th of each month; that he was permitted to retain balances; and that his books and accounts were not audited monthly; and that his outstanding accounts were not verified monthly. It is true that the plaintiff denied knowledge of the fact that the agent was withholding remittances, but it did not comply with its representations in endeavoring to ascertain what the fact was. There is hardly a pretense of having complied with the agreement to inspect and audit books and accounts, and to ascertain what accounts were unpaid. The question arising on the application, therefore, is not whether we are confronted with conditions precedent or warranties, but whether the representations made affect the plaintiff's right of recovery in any aspect of the case.

The bond provided that the employer should observe "all due and customary supervision over said employee for the prevention of default, and that there shall be a careful inspection of the accounts and books of said employee at least once in every twelve months from the date of this bond," etc. We think this provision of the bond determined what was required in the way of inspection and supervision, and superseded what was stated in the application, and waived any other or further requirement in reference thereto. The applicant was required to do certain specific things in the way of inspection, and to exercise due and customary supervision over the agent, by the terms of the bond. The surety substituted its own requirements for the things which the applicant said it would do. The bond provided that the employer should immediately notify the surety of any default on the part of the agent. The evidence does not disclose whether this notice was given or not. Neither is there any evidence on the question of whether the plaintiff exercised "due and customary supervision" over its agent. If it was incumbent on the plaintiff to show that notice of the default was given, or that it exercised due and customary supervision over its employee, as a condition precedent to its right of recovery, then a verdict should have been directed for the defendant. If these were defensive matters, the ruling of the court was right.

The bond in question was an indemnity contract entered into by the defendant for a money consideration. It has all the essential features of an insurance contract, and should be subject to the rules of construction applicable to such contracts. Champion Ice Mfg. & Cold Storage Co. v. American Bonding & T. Co. 115 Ky. 863, 103 Am. St. Rep. 356, 75 S. W. 197; Title Guaranty & S. Co. v. Bank of Fulton, 89 Ark. 471, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 676, 117 S. W. 537; Bank of Tarboro v. Fidelity & D. Co. 128 N. C. 366, 83 Am. St. Rep. 682, 38 S. E. 908. It being apparent that the bond sued on was prepared by the defendant, as to any ambiguity therein, the provisions, conditions, and exceptions of the bond which tend to work a forfeiture should be construed most strongly against the party preparing the contract. French v. Fidelity & C. Co. 135 Wis. 259, 265, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1011, 115 N. W. 869; American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 170 U. S. 133, 144, 42 L. ed. 977, 981, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 552.

We think the two provisos referred to should be held to be conditions subsequent, which the defendant must plead and prove as part of its defense, if it relies on them to defeat the plaintiff's cause of action. Redman v. Aetna Ins. Co. 49 Wis. 431, 435, 439, 4 N. W. 591; Johnston v. Northwestern Live Stock Ins. Co. 94 Wis. 117, 119, 68 N. W. 868; Goldman v. Fidelity & D. Co. 125 Wis. 390, 392, 395, 104 N. W. 80; French v. Fidelity & C. Co. supra. These cases, if not strictly in point in the case at bar, certainly establish a principle that is applicable to it. There is no recital in the bond declaring the clauses to be conditions precedent, and where two constructions are admissible the court should lean toward that which obviates a forfeiture. We deem it unnecessary to discuss the other point raised by appellant's counsel.

Kirwin, J., dissenting (June 21, 1911):

The majority opinion holds that there was evidence to warrant the court below in directing a verdict for the plaintiff. The correctness of this conclusion depends upon whether certain admissions of the agent, Greene, made after his resignation and when not in the employ of the plaintiff, were admissible against the defendant. On the 17th day of April, 1908, Greene, as principal, and the defendant, as surety, executed to the plaintiff a bond in the sum of $5,000, conditioned that said Greene would, in the position of state agent in the plaintiff's service, make good to the plaintiff within sixty days any loss sustained by plaintiff by "larceny or embezzlement committed by the employee [Greene] during a term commencing on the first day of February, 1908, at 12 o'clock noon, and ending upon the first day of February, 1909, at 12 o'clock noon." Greene remained in the employ of plaintiff until November 1, 1908, at which date he resigned and abandoned the employment.

The first question presented is, how far, if at all, the admissions were competent as against the defendant surety. Without this evidence, plaintiff was not entitled to a directed verdict. The general rule is well established that admissions of a principal are not binding upon the surety, unless made in the course of the employment covered by the undertaking of the surety. But it is held by the majority opinion that, since the principal was bound to account, even after his resignation and withdrawal from the employment covered by the bond, his admissions as to prior misappropriation of money were admissible. True the duty under a contract to perform always remains and can only be satisfied by performance. And it may be admitted that the duty of Greene to account and pay over what, under the contract, should be found due on such accounting continued after his resignation. But the amount of shortage, if any, or state of account, could not be proved by the statements of Greene, made without the sanction of an oath, detailing past transactions, after the term of his employment had ceased; such statements not being part of the res gestæ. The evidence relied upon in support of the majority opinion is an admission made by Greene in December, 1908, to the effect that he had, prior to that time, collected and used $2,800 of the money of plaintiff; also admissions made May 17, 1910, to the effect that a statement of account compiled and presented to him by the agent of plaintiff, showing a balance in favor of plaintiff, was correct; and, further, that he had collected and retained such balance. If these admissions be incompetent, it is clear that the plaintiff made no case, and the judgment below should have been reversed. I think that the overwhelming weight of authority establishes the incompetency of these admissions. They were made after Greene's term of employment had ceased, and were merely statements of past transactions or defalcations in the course of Greene's employment, before he had resigned, and whether he was still under obligation to account or not would not make his admissions relating to such past transactions, without the sanction of an oath, competent against the defendant.

The rule is well stated in Greenleaf on Evidence, 16th ed. vol. 1, § 187, as follows: "We are next to consider the admissions of a principal as evidence in an action against the surety upon his collateral undertaking. In the cases on this subject, the main inquiry has been whether the declarations of the principal were made during the transaction of the business for which the surety was bound, so as to become part of the res gestæ. If so, they have been held admissible; otherwise not. The surety is considered as bound only for the actual conduct of the party, and not for whatever he might say he had done, and therefore is entitled to proof of his conduct by original evidence, where it can be had, excluding all declarations of the principal made subsequent to the act to which they relate, and out of the course of his official duty. Thus, where one guaranteed the payment for such goods as the plaintiffs should send to another, in the way of their trade, it was held that the admissions of the principal debtor that he had received goods, made after the time of their supposed delivery, were not receivable in evidence against the surety. So, if one becomes surety in a bond conditioned for the faithful conduct of another as clerk or collector, it is held that, in an action on the bond against the surety, confessions of embezzlement, made by the principal after his dismissal, are not admissible in evidence, though, with regard to entries made in the course of his duty, it is otherwise." To the same effect is 1 Taylor, Ev. §§ 785, 786, and cases cited; 1 Phillips, Ev. 5th Am. ed. 436 (*526).

The rule laid down in Greenleaf and other text-books is supported by the authorities generally, English and American. The theory of the authorities seems to be that all evidence as to what the principal said he had done in the past should be excluded, and the only testimony admitted under this head, what the principal in fact did in the course of his employment, and such statements as were made in connection with the acts done in the course of his business, and constituting part of the res gestæ; therefore the surety cannot be bound by the mere statements of the principal made subsequently to the acts done and as a narrative of them. The reason of the rule seems obvious, when we consider the well-settled doctrine that hearsay evidence is not competent generally, and admissions by principal, not supported by the sanction of an oath, rarely admissible against the surety. 1 Taylor, Ev. § 786, and cases cited. A brief review of some of the leading cases quite analogous to the case at bar will illustrate the principle applicable to the instant case.

Smith v. Whittingham, 6 Car. & P. 78, was an action on bond to charge surety for failure to account by principal. After his discharge, admissions as to correctness of account were held incompetent against surety. The court said (page 80): "This is not an account current; it is only an admission made by Fisherwick after his discharge of what he had embezzled, and, though it would have been evidence against Fisherwick, it is not so against the defendant." This is a leading case, and cited with approval generally in this country.

Hatch v. Elkins, 65 N. Y. 489, was an action on a bond of indemnity. The accounts were offered in evidence and objected to, and the question was as to their competency. In other words, whether, since the relation of surety and principal existed, the admissions of the principal were competent against the surety. It was held that the declarations of the principal were admissible only when part of the res gestæ, and admissions made, not during the transaction of business, but subsequently, were not competent. Referring to cases cited, the court said (page 499, 65 N. Y.): "These cases all hold that the declarations of the principal bind the surety only when they are part of the res gestæ, in reference to which the surety has covenanted, but that his subsequent admissions, not part of the res gestæ, do not bind and are not competent evidence against the surety."

The following cases quoted from are quite similar in their facts to the instant case.

In Lee v. Brown, 21 Kan. 458, at page 461, the court said: "This admission and settlement were after the default of Lee. These matters referred to past occurrences; they had no connection with the acts to which they related, except as a narrative or admission of what Lee had done at dates prior thereto, and ought not to have been received as evidence, so as to bind his sureties; for it was the acts of Lee, and not his admissions or declarations, for which his sureties were bound."

In Knott v. Peterson, 125 Iowa, 404, at page 407, 101 N. W. 173, it is said: "The bond was not to be responsible for any declaration or admissions of the principal, but for his conduct only. Hence it is only his conduct in carrying on the business, or declarations accompanying his acts while so engaged, that are admissible in evidence against his surety."

Wieder v. Union Surety & G. Co. 42 Misc. 499, 86 N. Y. Supp. 105: "The rule seems to be well settled that a party holding an indemnity cannot prove the loss sustained by him, for which he seeks to hold the surety liable, by the mere admissions or statements of the principal. The declarations of the principal, made during the transaction of the business for which the surety is bound, so as to become part of the res gestæ, are competent evidence against the surety; but his declarations subsequently made are not competent."

Trousdale v. Phillips, 2 Swan, 384: "In order to make the declarations and statements of the principal good against the surety, in these kind of bonds, they must be made when the business is transacted, and in connection with it, so as to become a part of the res gestæ. They can be admitted on no other principle. The surety is bound for the acts and conduct of his principal, and not for what he may say he had done."

Shelby v. The Governor, 2 Blackf. 289, page 290: "On the trial, the plaintiff introduced a witness to prove that Weathers told him that he had collected the money in controversy. . . . If Weathers, while officially acting in relation to the receipt of this money, stated that he had received it, such statement would form a part of the res gestæ, and would be evidence to prove the act of receiving, and would therefore be admissible against his sureties. But declarations made by him at any subsequent period would have no connection with the act, and could not be introduced as evidence of the act, so as to bind his sureties; for it is his acts, and not his admissions or declarations, for which his sureties are bound."

Union Sav. Asso. v. Edwards, 47 Mo. 445, at page 449: "Had the suit been against the sureties alone, the evidence would have been clearly inadmissible. It is not within the power of the principal, after a transaction is past and gone, to make admissions to the detriment of his sureties." To the same effect are Blair v. Perpetual Ins. Co. 10 Mo. 559, 47 Am. Dec. 129; Eichhold v. Tiffany, 20 Misc. 681, 46 N. Y. Supp. 534; Ayer v. Getty, 46 Hun, 287; Wheeler v. State, 9 Heisk. 393; Dobbs v. Inferior Ct. Justices, 17 Ga. 624; Bo-card v. State, 79 Ind. 270; Lewis v. Lee County, 73 Ala. 148; Chelmsford Co. v. Demarest, 7 Gray, 1; Tenth Nat. Bank v. Darragh, 3 Thomp. & C. 138.

The majority opinion endeavors to distinguish the instant case from the authorities cited, upon the ground that the agent was obliged to account, and therefore his admissions as to correctness of the account presented to him by the agent of plaintiff, and his further admissions that he converted funds, were competent. It may well be that the reports and accounts made by the agent, Greene, before resignation and in the course of his employment, were competent, and that, if such reports and accounts had shown a misappropriation of funds, a prima facie case would have been made against the defendant. But I think it clear under the authorities that the admissions supplementing the account made after the reports and accounts had been made were no part of the res gestæ; hence not competent evidence against the defendant surety. Had the admissions as to correctness of account and conversion by the agent been made at or about the time the reports and accounts were made, and while the agent was in the discharge of such employment, doubtless such admissions would have been competent against the defendant as part of the res gestæ.

The admissions must be contemporaneous with the act, in order to constitute part of the res gestæ. 3 Wigmore, Ev. §§ 1757, 1772-1774, and 1776, and cases cited; Stetson v. City Bank, 2 Ohio St. 167, and cases cited; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 108, 110; Shelby v. The Governor, 2 Blackf. 289; Hotchkiss v. Lyon, 2 Blackf. 222; Ward v. Suffield, 5 Bing. N. C. 381, 7 Scott, 352, 2 Arnold, 4, 8 L. J. C. P. N. S. 207; Evans v. Beattie, 5 Esp. 26; Longenecker v. Hyde, 6 Binn. 1; Kamp v. Cox Bros. & Co. 122 Wis. 206, 99 N. W. 366.

With all the diligence of the distinguished counsel for respondent, and the court, but one case (Father Matthew Young Men's Total Abstinence Benev. Soc. v. Fitzwilliam, 12 Mo. App. 445) is cited which appears to support the majority opinion. I am not clear that that case is authority for the majority opinion here. It is true the report or statement was made after the removal from office of Fitzwilliam, but the statement included no time not covered by the bond, and the bond provided that such a statement should be made at the expiration of the term. Besides it does not appear clearly whether the statement was made from records properly kept. But, if the case is authority for the majority opinion in the instant case, in my opinion, it is unsupported by reason or authority, and should not be followed.

The other authorities cited in the majority opinion (Townsend v. Everett, 4 Ala. 607, approved in Lewis v. Lee County, 73 Ala. 148; Jenness v. Black Hawk, 2 Colo. 578; Wyche v. Myrick, 14 Ga. 584; Douglass v. Howland, 24 Wend. 35, and Wigmore, Ev. § 1077) do not appear to add strength to the opinion of the court. The point in Townsend v. Everett, supra, pertinent, is that the annual statement of the county treasurer, which by law he was bound to make, was evidence against his surety. On page 611, 4 Ala., the court says: "We do not consider it necessary in this case to go into the inquiry how far the surety is bound by the declarations of the principal, made in reference to his conduct as treasurer, whilst in office, as he certainly is bound by those acts which, as treasurer of the county, his principal was bound to perform, and for the performance of which he was surety. The statute requires the treasurer to account with the commissioners' court annually, and, upon his resignation or removal from office, to state the account, and deliver the money and other effects of the county to his successor, and these acts when done are as obligatory on the surety as on the principal."

Lewis v. Lee County, 73 Ala. 148, referred to in the majority opinion as approving Townsend v. Everett, 4 Ala. 607, is a strong case in support of this dissent, as I understand it.

Jenness v. Black Hawk, 2 Colo. 578, involved the question of declarations of a principal in an official bond as evidence against the sureties, when made in the performance of some official act or duty and in reference thereto. The court, at page 585, 2 Colo., referring to a case of declarations of the principal in an official bond, lays down the doctrine that the better rule limits the operation of such declarations against sureties to the case in which they are made, in the performance of some official act or duty and in reference thereto, and that they must be part of the res gestæ. The court further says (page 586, 2 Colo.): "The sureties obligate themselves to be answerable for what the principal does in his office; his official acts may therefore be shown to charge them; every declaration, accompanying and explanatory of the act, is part of it."

Wyche v. Myrick and Douglass v. Howland, supra, contain nothing contrary to the general rule stated in this dissent. 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1077, treats, among other subjects, of principal and surety, but I find nothing in it contrary to the rule laid down in the cases heretofore cited.

Conceding that the statement of account was competent, because the reports from which it was made up were made by the agent, Greene, during the discharge of his duties, such statement is clearly insufficient to charge Greene with larceny or embezzlement, because the evidence is undisputed that it is merely a report of the business done by the agent, Greene, and not of premiums collected. Under the conditions of the bond, the surety was only liable for larceny or embezzlement of the agent, and not for loss otherwise occurring; therefore the amount of premiums appearing upon the account stated was not sufficient to charge Greene with larceny or embezzlement. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 661, 32 L. ed. 308, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1360; Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Deckard, 3 Ind. App. 361, 28 N. E. 868; Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Schwenk, 95 Pa. 89, 40 Am. Rep. 629, 8 Mor. Min. Rep. 53; Gauch v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 88 Ill. 251, 30 Am. Rep. 554; Dupin v. Mutual Ins. Co. 5 La. Ann. 482; Weidner v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 130 Wis. 10, 110 N. W. 246.

Therefore, as conceded in the majority opinion, the admissions of Greene after his resignation, charging himself with conversion, were necessary to make a case, and these admissions being incompetent, no case was made. I think, therefore, the judgment should be reversed.

I am authorized to say that Mr. Justice Timlin concurs in the foregoing dissent.

PAUL PALERMO, Appt.,

v.

ORLEANS ICE MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

(130 La. 833, 58 So. 589.)

Negligence — child — parent.

1. A child four years old is incapable of committing negligence. A parent is not negligent in permitting his child, four years of age, to be on the sidewalk adjoining his residence.

Same — dangerous condition — injury to child.

2. Where a child four years old fell into a street gutter containing hot water which had flowed from the defendant's plant, and was painfully burned, the defendant will be held liable in damages, where the evidence showed that the water and steam attracted the curiosity of the children of the vicinity, and that the defendant's watchman at the gutter left his post before the accident happened to the child.

As to liability for turning steam or other

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries to plaintiff's minor son alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Foster, Milling, Brian, & Saal, for appellant:

Whoever does anything in or immediately adjacent to the public street, calculated to attract children of the vicinity into a danger which they cannot appreciate, owes the duty of protecting them by suitably guarding the source of danger.

Indianapolis v. Emmelman, 108 Ind. 530, 58 Am. Rep. 65, 9 N. E. 155.

Plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for the injury inflicted.

Westerfield v. Levis Bros. 43 La. Ann. 63, 9 So. 52.

Mr. Philip J. Patorno for appellee.

Land, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit brought by the father and natural tutor to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by his minor son, Pascal, a child four years of age at the time of the accident.

On March 25, 1909, Pascal fell into an open gutter on Hospital street, which at the time contained hot water which had flowed from the plant of the defendant company located on the same street. The boy was scalded and burned on the left side of his body from his neck downwards.

The first defense is that one of the bolts of the defendant's boiler blew out, and the hot water escaped through the opening and flowed into the gutter, without fault or negligence on the part of the defendant. The next defense is that the defendant used due diligence in warning children in the street of the presence of hot water in the gutters, and lastly contributory negligence is pleaded.

There was judgment in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed.

In his opinion the judge a quo said:

dangerous vapors or gases into sewer, see note to Smith v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 957.

"The proof is that defendants, in order to keep the hot water of their ice factory out of the street gutter, had installed a large underground pipe for the harmless escape of the hot water, long prior to this accident, and that on the day of the child's injury a tube of their boiler, without any negligence on defendant's part, had exploded, and from its broken or blown-out part the hot water ran into the street gutter. It also appears that at once defendants turned a stream of cold water into the escaping hot water to cool it, and make it harmless, and that defendants also put a dam across the gutter to force the water towards the swamp, and also stationed a man at the gutter to warn the children of a near-by school, who left his post after the children were called into the school-house, and also diligently went to work to repair the boiler and stop the escaping hot water. I find no negligence on defendant's part in all this; but, even if there had been, how could defendants, with the accident to the boiler happening all of a sudden, anticipate or expect that plaintiff's child of tender years would be allowed by its parents to wander on the streets, or that it would manage to get into the street gutter?"

The law of the case is thus stated by the judge a quo: "That doctrine is that in order to warrant the finding that negligence is the proximate cause of the injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural consequence of the negligence, and that the defendants ought to have anticipated or foreseen or expected it, in the light of the attending circumstances."

The statement of facts made by the judge a quo shows that, when the hot water commenced flowing into the gutter, the defendant's agents did anticipate or foresee that children in the street might be injured by coming in contact with the hot water, and stationed a man at the gutter to warn the children of a near-by school. The judge a quo found that this man left his post after giving said warning. As the hot water continued to flow for an hour or more, a guard should have been kept at the gutter until the danger had passed. If a man was stationed at the gutter to warn children, and he deserted his post, the defendant is liable for his negligence.

The hot water and steam in the gutter was a dangerous agency in a public place, forbidden by ordinance of the city of New Orleans; and defendant knew that it was likely to attract children. According to defense witnesses, the hot water and steam did attract children, who were warned and driven away. Defendant was negligent in not taking proper precautions to prevent other children from coming in contact with the hot water. A watchman at the gutter would have probably prevented the injury of plaintiff's son.

On principle there is no difference between hot water and a dangerous machine left unguarded in a public place. As to a dangerous machine, see Westerfield v. Levis Bros. 43 La. Ann. 63, 9 So. 52. In this case it was said: "The machine was in a public place, on a public street in close proximity to the yard of the plaintiffs. It was left exposed, unguarded, and unsecured. The child Richard was of that tender age [five years] when childish instincts are probably at their fullest intensity."

Practically no cases are found which hold that a child under six years of age can be charged with negligence. 29 Cyc. 538.

We are responsible for the damage caused by "the things we have in our custody." Civil Code, art. 2317. This rule has been applied to the explosion of a part of an electrical apparatus. Yates v. Southwestern Brush Electric Light & P. Co. 40 La. Ann. 467, 4 So. 250. In that case the owner was negligent in not keeping the apparatus in proper condition of repair.

In the case at bar, the defendant, if not negligent, quoad the blowing out of the bolt, or the flow of the hot water into the street, was negligent in not keeping a watchman at the gutter until the danger to children had ceased.

The child was painfully but not seriously burned, and recovered in a short time. We assess the damages at $300.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment below be reversed, and it is now ordered that the plaintiff do have and recover of the defendant the sum of $300, with legal interest thereon from this date, and costs in both courts.

Contract — rescission — undiscovered fraud — reparation.

2. One who, upon contracting to purchase real estate and assume payment of the vendor's liens thereon as part of the consideration, is misled by a false statement that a particular lien note has been paid, cannot avoid liability on his undertaking to pay such liens because of the misrepresentation, if, before he discovers it, the note has been canceled.

Statute of frauds — promise to pay lien notes — necessity of writing.

3. The promise to pay outstanding lien notes as part of the purchase price of real estate is not within the statute of frauds.

on the question as to the effect of a rescission of the purchase of real estate or the contract by the purchaser to assume and pay a mortgage, upon the assumption of the mortgage or lien. This conflict, as a general rule, arises from different views which the courts entertain as to the nature and character of a promise by a grantee of land who assumes and agrees to pay a mortgage thereon. In many jurisdictions such a promise is regarded as primarily for the benefit of the mortgagor, and the right of the mortgagee to claim thereunder is said to be an equitable right and subject to be defeated, prior to acceptance, by a bona fide rescission of the contract by the immediate parties thereto. The same result is reached in other jurisdictions by regarding the contract as a covenant, and applying the rule that any right of action thereon by a third person must be derived from the covenant. On the other hand, in other jurisdictions such a contract is regarded as directly for the benefit of the mortgagee, and, since it is for his benefit, his acceptance is assumed, and the right of the immediate parties by any subsequent agreement to affect the liability of the grantee under this contract is denied. In other jurisdictions the same result is reached, but by application of the rule of practice authorizing the person for whose benefit a promise is made to maintain an action directly against the promisor to enforce the same. This right of action is said to accrue upon the making of the promise, and hence not to be subject to rescission or alteration by any subsequent agreement between the immediate parties thereto.

Rule that contract is not subject to rescission.

In Bay v. Williams, 112 Ill. 91, 54 Am. Rep. 209, 1 N. E. 340, the doctrine is asserted that the assumption of a mortgage by the purchaser of land inures to the benefit of the mortgagee, for whose benefit it is made, and the right to sue is vested in him by force of the agreement itself, and his express assent to the agreement is not essential to his right to avail himself of its bene-

Vendor and purchaser — acceptance of 'promise to pay vendor's lien — right to rescind.

4. Acceptance by one holding a vendor's lien on real estate, of the promise of a second vendee to satisfy the lien as part of the consideration which he is to pay the original vendee for the property, deprives the parties to the second sale contract of the power to rescind it so as to relieve the second vendee of his liability, without the assent of the original vendor, although such vendee had no notice of the acceptance.

(January 24, 1912.)

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Sixth Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment reversing a judg-fits. The promise vests him with an immediate interest and right to the same extent as though the contract had been directly with him; hence the mortgagor who procures the promise has no legal right to release or discharge the grantee from his liability thereunder to the mortgagee.

This is also the doctrine of Starbird v. Cranston, 24 Colo. 20, 48 Pac. 652, which holds that since such an assumption clause in a deed imposes an obligation upon the grantee, primarily for the benefit of the mortgagee, and not for the indemnity of the grantor, by accepting the deed, the grantee becomes effectively bound by the obligation, and an immediate right to enforce it is vested in the mortgagee, and this right cannot be divested without his consent.

Although the case is not in point as to the facts it is asserted in Fanning v. Murphy, 126 Wis. 538, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 686, 110 Am. St. Rep. 946, 105 N. W. 1056, 5 Ann. Cas. 435, that such an agreement will create a privity enabling the mortgagee to enforce by an action at law the promise made for his benefit, and his status as regards the promisor cannot, after the happening of the transaction creating it, be changed without his consent; and the court cites with approval Tweeddale v. Tweeddale, 116 Wis. 517, 61 L.R.A. 509, 96 Am. St. Rep. 1003, 93 N. W. 440, which asserts and applies that doctrine to a case not in point as to the facts.

In Gifford v. Corrigan, 117 N. Y. 257, 6 L.R.A. 610, 15 Am. St. Rep. 508, 22 N. E. 756 (cited in the opinion in HALL v. HOELDTKE), it is asserted that this equitable right to hold the grantee upon his assumption is created and becomes vested in the holder of the encumbrance when the situation is created out of which equity is born. The court remarks that "if it be possible to adjourn it to a later period, it must certainly attach when the creditor asserts his right to it, and notifies the other party of his intention to rely upon it. As a right, founded upon the equity of the statute, it must have come into being before the foreclosure suit was commenced, for the permission reads, 'any person who is liable to the ment of the District court for Fannin County in favor of defendant Hill, but against the other defendants, in an action brought to foreclose a vendor's lien, and to recover on a note given for a part of the purchase price of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McGrady & McMahon, for plaintiff in error:

The assumption of liability having been on the false assurance that the prior lien was paid, no recovery can be had on it.

On petition for rehearing.

Not having been notified of the acceptance of the promise, and having rescinded the trade, and made a contract with McLeary for a valuable consideration, and parted with things of value, and changed his legal status with reference to the property, such release by McLeary operated to release and discharge Hill from any liability upon said notes.

plaintiff for the payment of the debt secured by the mortgage may be made a defendant in the action.' His liability must precede the commencement of the action. It must exist as a condition of his being sued at all; and so, assuming that this action can be maintained against him upon his promise, the right of action must have arisen at once upon the delivery of the deed, or, at the latest, when the promise came to the knowledge of the creditor, and he assented to and adopted it." The court, however, expressly reserves the question whether in the interval between the making of the contract and the acceptance and adoption of it by the mortgagee it was revocable without his assent, and it is pointed out that the case before the court involves only the question whether such a contract is revocable after it has come to the knowledge of the mortgagee and he has assented to it and adopted it as a security for his benefit." For other cases see infra, "right to rescind after acceptance."

Rule that contract is subject to rescission prior to actual acceptance by mortgagee.

In New Jersey the rule obtains that a covenant by a grantee of the mortgaged premises to pay the mortgage debt is a contract with his grantee for his indemnity only, and may be released and discharged by him, and the immediate parties to such a contract may abandon it and mutually release each other from its performance, regardless of the encumbrancer's interests, unless the grantor and grantee, with knowledge that he was relying on the contract, suffer the encumbrancer to put himself in a position from which he cannot retreat without loss in case the contract is not performed. Crowell v. Currier, 27 N. J. Eq. 152; Youngs v. Trustees of Public Schools, 31 N. J. Eq. 290; O'Neill v. Clark, 33 N. J. Eq. 444.

This doctrine is thus stated in Green v. Stone, 54 N. J. Eq. 387, 55 Am. St. Rep. 577, 34 Atl. 1099, "A deed inter partes whereby an estate is conveyed, if accepted by the grantee, is in legal effect the deed of 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

both parties, and a stipulation in such a deed by the grantee, that he will assume and pay a debt secured by a mortgage on the premises for the payment of which the grantor is personally liable, is a contract by the grantee with the grantor to pay the mortgage debt,—especially where the mortgage debt is computed as part of the consideration money for the conveyance. This contract is with the grantor for his indemnity, and the obligation of the grantee to pay the debt inures in equity for the benefit of the mortgagee, and he may enforce it against the grantee to the extent of the unpaid part of the mortgage debt remaining due after the proceeds of the mortgaged estate have been applied thereon. The principle on which the mortgagee in such cases is entitled to enforce the obligation of the grantee is that, by the acceptance of a deed containing an assumption of the mortgage debt, the grantee becomes the principal debtor; the liability of the grantor as between the parties being that of a surety only; and by a well-settled doctrine of equity the mortgagee as a creditor may, by way of subrogation, have the benefit of all collateral obligations which a person standing in the situation of a surety for another holds for his indemnity. The contract, being with the grantor for his indemnity, may be released or discharged by him at any time before the mortgagee proceeds to enforce his rights against the grantee; but if at the time suit is brought by him the obligation of the grantee to pay the mortgage debt is in existence undischarged, his remedy against the grantee is complete."

The doctrine asserted in the New Jersey decisions is also the rule in Kentucky, Jones v. Higgins, 80 Ky. 409, and Colvin v. Newell, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 959, holding that where the vendee as part consideration for land agrees to pay a mortgage thereon the promise is for the benefit of the mortgagee, but it may be rescinded by the parties who made it at any time before the mortgagee has asserted any rights thereunder.

This is also the rule in Indiana; Berkshire L. Ins. Co. v. Hutchings, 100 Ind. 496, holding that while the relation between the mortgagor and the grantee who has assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage debt remains unchanged by acceptance by the mortgagee, the relation between the mortgagor and grantee may be terminated by a bona fide rescission of their contract, and the case then becomes the same as if no such contract ever existed, and in such event the right of the mortgagee as against the grantee will no longer exist.

And see Huffman v. Western Mortg. & Invest. Co. 13 Tex. Civ. App. 169, 36 S. W. 306, holding that where the parties to a conveyance of land rescind the conveyance, a contemporaneous release by the grantor of the grantee upon his agreement to pay a mortgage upon the land is valid as against the mortgagee, who has not yet accepted the grantee as his debtor.

On the theory that it is a general rule of chancery that, as to strangers to a contract, parties may at their pleasure abandon it and mutually release each other from its performance, it has been held that the grantee of land is not liable upon his promise to assume and pay a mortgage upon the land, where the grantor and grantee thereafter rescind the conveyance, including such agreement, before any action by the mortgagee has been commenced to foreclose the mortgage. Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 354, 30 Pac. 609.

Effect of extrinsic circumstances or character of contract.

The assumption by the grantee, of a mortgage upon the land conveyed to him, although incorporated in the deed of conveyance, does not render him liable thereon to the mortgagee where by a collateral agreement the grantor agrees to pay a portion of the mortgage indebtedness, and it is further stipulated that if he fails to do so the grantee shall not be liable upon his contract of assumption, and the grantor in fact makes default in making the payment according to his contract. Flagg v. Munger, 9 N. Y. 483.

On this point, in Keller v. Ashford, 133 U. S. 610, 33 L. ed. 667, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The fraud was sufficient to warrant rescission, although the lien was subsequently removed.

Burnett, 102 Tex. 492, 132 Am. St. Rep. 900, 119 S. W. 1141; Thomas v. Coultas, 76 Ill. 493; Merritt v. Robinson, 35 Ark. 483;

694, the court quotes with approval from Crowell v. Hospital of St. Barnabas, 27 N. J. Eq. 650, that, although "the assumption of the mortgage debt by the subsequent purchaser is absolute and unqualified in the deed of conveyance, it will be controlled by a collateral contract made between him and his grantor which is not embodied in the deed." This doctrine seems also to be recognized in Elliott v. Sackett, 108 U. S. 132, 27 L. ed. 678, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 375, and Drury v. Hayden, 111 U. S. 223, 28 L. ed. 408, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 405, holding that a mortgagee has no greater right than has the mortgagor against the purchaser of the mortgaged premises who agrees to pay the mortgage, and therefore cannot object to the release by the mortgagor of such an agreement when inserted in the deed by mistake. The pertinency of these later decisions is made manifest by the reasoning of the court in Jones v. Higgins, 80 Ky. 409, wherein the court says that the law implies a promise in such a case by the purchaser to pay the mortgage debt, but since there is no actual privity of contract between the latter and the mortgagee the agreement may be canceled by the act of the parties making it before acceptance by the mortgagee for whose benefit it is made; hence there is no reason why the parties making the contract should not be allowed to speak as to its terms, and their action with reference to it before its acceptance is binding upon the mortgagee.

A person assuming the encumbrance may defend an action by the holder of the encumbrance against him, based on the contract of assumption, by showing either an entire or partial failure of consideration of the contract; and he may establish any defense, complete or partial, as against the holder of the encumbrance, which he could have interposed to an action brought by his grantor. Loeb v. Willis, 100 N. Y. 231, 3 N. E. 177.

cut to secure an advance of money, and was surrendered before recording, and another deed executed with this clause omitted. Phipps v. Goulding, 14 Ohio L. J. 50.

Where a conveyance of land is taken by a purchaser in the name of another person, without the knowledge of the latter, the grantee is not liable upon a covenant in the deed of conveyance, assuming and agreeing to pay a mortgage on the land conveyed, where, upon being informed of the transaction and of this agreement, he repudiated the latter and was released from the covenant by the grantor; and this is true although he did not reconvey the land. Gold v. Ogden, 61 Minn. 83, 63 N. W. 266.

A release by the grantor without consideration and merely for the purpose of protecting the grantee against his liability to the holder of the encumbrance under his contract to assume the same is invalid as against the encumbrancer. Trustees of Public Schools v. Anderson, 30 N. J. Eq. 366; Willard v. Worsham, 76 Va. 392. And this is especially true after innocent third persons have acquired the indebtedness, relying upon the grantee's assumption of liability. Clark v. Fisk, 9 Utah, 94, 33 Pac. 248.

Right to rescind after acceptance.

It is clear that after the mortgagee has accepted as his debtor a grantee of the mortgaged premises who has assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage, the latter cannot be released by the grantor from his liability to the mortgagee under his contract of assumption. Betts v. Drew, Fed. Cas. No. 1,372; Fleischauer v. Doellner, 58 How. Pr. 190.

This is also the doctrine in New York L. Ins. Co. v. Aitkin, 125 N. Y. 675, 26 N. E. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The plaintiff Hill, having failed to return, or offer to return, the entire consideration received by him under the contract which he seeks to rescind and to avoid, is not entitled to such relief.

The representations are immaterial, and afford no sufficient ground for avoiding the contract, because the plaintiff in error sustained no pecuniary injury or damage therefrom.

Dibrell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

H. C. Hoeldtke filed suit January 20, 1908, in the district court of Fannin county against F. W. Horstman, B. S. McLeary, L. C. Hill, and J. M. Leach, and alleged that on or about March 13, 1905, the said F. W. Horstman executed and delivered to 732, where the covenant of assumption had been accepted by the holder of the encumbrance assumed, prior to any attempt by the vendor and the purchaser by contract to release the purchaser from liability because of such assumption. And it was held that such release was not effective as against the holder of the encumbrance assumed. To the same effect are Gifford v. Corrigan, 117 N. Y. 257, 6 L.R.A. 610, 15 Am. St. Rep. 508, 22 N. E. 756; Hartley v. Harrison, 24 N. Y. 170; Ranney v. McMullen, 5 Abb. N. C. 246; Whiting v. Gearty, 14 Hun, 498.

And it would seem that it is unnecessary that the mortgagee give to the promisor notice of acceptance. HILL v. HOELDTKE, holding that acceptance by a mortgagee of a contract to assume and pay the mortgage by a purchaser of the land mortgaged precludes a subsequent rescission of the entire transaction, including the contract of assumption, by the immediate parties thereto, although notice of the acceptance is not given the promisor by the mortgagee.

It is to be noted that HILL v. HOELDTKE directly reverses the decision of the court of civil appeals (128 S. W. 642), and also in effect overrules the decision of that court when the case was presented to it on demurrer. 54 Tex. Civ. App. 201, 117 S. W. 217.

The decision is in line with the doctrine of Morrison v. Barry, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 22, 36 S. W. 376, holding that the vendor of real estate is not entitled to rescind a sale thereof where, as part consideration of the sale, the purchaser has assumed and agreed to pay an encumbrance on the property, unless it also appears that this contract of assumption has not been accepted by the holder of the encumbrance.

A. G. S.

plaintiff a note for $690, payable January 1, 1909, with interest at 8 per cent, payable annually, and providing for maturity of principal upon failure to pay the annual interest. The note sued on was given by the defendant Horstman to plaintiff in lieu of four notes aggregating $690, including $40 interest, two of which notes for $175 each had been previously given by one J. J. Dutton to D. E. Taylor and two for $150 each by F. W. Horstman to J. J. Dutton for the purchase price of 57 acres of land in Fannin county, against which the vendor's lien was retained to secure the payment of said notes. J. J. Dutton conveyed the 57 acres of land to the defendant Horstman on or about December 9, 1902, and Horstman, as indicated above, assumed the payment of the two notes for $175 each due by Dutton to Taylor, which were a charge upon the 57 acres of land, and, in addition to assuming the payment of said two notes, executed to Dutton two other notes for $150 each, the assumed payment, and the two notes executed aggregated $650 principal. On November 6, 1905, Horstman conveyed the 57 acres of land to B. S. McLeary and wife, and B. S. McLeary assumed the payment of the S. W. Horstman note for $690, which was due on or before January 1, 1909. McLeary also gave to Horstman as a part of the consideration for said land his two certain notes to operate as a second lien on the land, one for $140 due December 1, 1907, and one for $195, due December 1, 1908. By regular transfer the note for $195 given by McLeary to Horstman became the property of the defendant J. M. Leach, who filed his cross action setting up the ownership of such note. On October 16, 1906, the defendant B. S. McLeary conveyed the 57 acres of land to the defendant L. C. Hill, and, as a part of the consideration for the land, Hill assumed the payment to plaintiff of the note for $690 that had been given plaintiff by S. W. Horstman and the payment of which had been assumed by B. S. McLeary. Hill also assumed the payment of the note given by McLeary to Horstman for $195, afterwards owned by the defendant Leach. Shortly after McLeary sold the 57 acres of land to Hill, and Hill assumed the payment of plaintiff's note, plaintiff accepted such assumption, which fact, however, was not known to the defendant Hill. On or about July 11, 1907, the defendants B. S. McLeary and L. C. Hill entered into an agreement whereby the sale of the 57 acres of land by McLeary to Hill on October 16, 1906, was rescinded, and a deed was made by Hill to McLeary, a part of the consideration for such conveyance being the assumption of the payment of the 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

$690 note to plaintiff by said B. S. McLeary. To this contract and agreement plaintiff was not in any manner privy.

At the time the defendant Hill purchased the land of the defendant McLeary, there was outstanding against the land, in addition to the note for $690 due plaintiff and the note for $195 due the defendant Leach, a note for $140 due December 1, 1907, and which was a second lien on the land. McLeary represented at the time the trade was made with Hill that this note had been paid. As a matter of fact, however, said note had not been paid at the time the trade was made, and was then a subsisting lien against the land, but was, within a week or ten days thereafter, returned to B. S. McLeary by his brother Earnest McLeary, the owner thereof, for cancelation, and has ever since been in the possession of the defendant McLeary. At the time the defendant Hill reconveyed the land to McLeary he was not aware of the facts in regard to the status of the $140 note on the day of said purchase, and hence his reconveyance to McLeary of the land was not because of any fraud supposed to have been practised upon him by McLeary. The plea of fraud on the part of the defendant Hill was not made until February 14, 1908, a short time after he learned the facts in regard to the $140 note.

The plaintiff on the trial sought judgment against both McLeary and Hill on the note for $690, and a foreclosure of the vendor's lien on the 57 acres of land, which had been retained in all the notes, and defendant Leach sought to recover against the same parties on his note for $195, with foreclosure of vendor's lien. The defendant Hill sought relief against a personal judgment upon two grounds: First, because he claimed that by agreement with McLeary, his vendor, the land was reconveyed to McLeary, and McLeary assumed the payment of said notes and released him; and, second, if he was not released by such agreement and reconveyance, he was released on account of fraud which was practised on him by McLeary at the time he purchased the land on October 16, 1906, in that McLeary represented that the note for $140, which was a charge on the land in addition to those assumed by Hill, had been paid, when, as a matter of fact, at that time it had not been paid, which fact was not known to defendant Hill until a short time before February 14, 1908.

Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff Hoeldtke and the defendant Leach for their notes, interest, and attorneys' fees against the defendants Horstman and McLeary, with foreclosure of the vendors' lien on the land as against all the defendants.

No personal judgment was rendered against the defendant Hill. Upon appeal the court of civil appeals reversed and rendered judgment against Horstman, McLeary, and Hill on the notes, with foreclosure of vendors' lien.

The statement of the case as made by the pleadings, and the findings of fact by the court of civil appeals, present but one issuable question of law for determination by this court. That question is whether the promise of a vendee of land to his vendor to pay the debt of such vendor to his creditor who holds a lien on the land to secure such debt can be revoked by the vendee and vendor by an agreement to which the creditor or mortgagor is not privy, after the creditor or mortgagor has accepted the assumption and promise of such vendee to pay his debt.

Before entering upon a discussion of this question, we will dispose of the question of fraud so earnestly and ably presented by counsel as affording the defendant Hill a defense against a personal judgment in favor of plaintiff and defendant Leach.

The finding of the jury upon special issues submitted to them by the court is to the effect that at the time the defendant Hill purchased the 57 acres of land of McLeary he was made to believe that the note for $140, a charge upon the land purchased, had been paid, and that Hill was influenced by that statement in making the purchase. We agree with the court of civil appeals in its conclusion that a finding upon that issue is immaterial, as the other findings of fact eliminate from the case the question of fraud.

There was no rescission or attempted rescission of the purchase by Hill of the 57 acres of land from McLeary on account of the fraud or misrepresentation that had been made him by McLeary in respect to the payment of the $140 note. The pleadings of Hill disclose that he agreed with McLeary on July 11, 1907, to convey back the land and revoke his obligation to pay the debt of McLeary theretofore assumed by Hill, and that he knew nothing of the status of the $140 note at the date of his conveyance to McLeary, and only learned in February, 1908, the note was unpaid at the time he made his purchase. Hence he could not have possibly been influenced in July, 1907, by any fraud that McLeary had practised upon him at the time of his purchase of the land, for he had not then discovered such fraud. His rescission of the contract of sale and attempted revocation of his obligation to pay plaintiff the debt due by McLeary to plaintiff was superinduced by other causes than McLeary's fraud.

It was shown, practically without contradiction, that within a few days after Hill purchased the land of McLeary the note for $140, the subject of the fraud, was delivered to McLeary for cancellation, and at the time of trial was tendered into court, together with a formal release of the lien on the land securing the payment of the note. If Hill had discovered the misrepresentation made him by McLeary before McLeary secured the note for cancellation, and had then manifested his intention to rescind the contract, we are not prepared to say that he could not have done so and relieved himself of his obligation to plaintiff arising out of the assumption to pay the debt of McLeary. But, in view of the facts of this case, in what respect was Hill injured or any right of his impaired? He had, as shown by his pleading, reconveyed the land to McLeary, and thereby rendered it impossible for him to be affected in any particular by the $140 note, whether paid or unpaid. He had never assumed its payment, and rested under no obligation by reason of said note after he had conveyed the land to McLeary. If the note was unpaid, so far as he was concerned, it was a charge only against the land, in which he had no further interest. The mere fact that there might have been a misrepresentation amounting to fraud on the part of McLeary at the time of the purchase of the land by Hill would be no ground for revoking the obligation of Hill on the assumption and promise to pay plaintiff's note, unless such fraud was an inducing cause of Hill's purchase of the land, or in some way caused him to seek and obtain the rescission of his purchase from McLeary. Where a fraud has been committed in the procurement of the sale of land, and before its discovery by the defrauded party full reparation of all injury has been made, or the probable consequential injury or prejudice to the rights of the party defrauded have been fully arrested, we do not understand the law to be that such an act of fraud will vitiate and revoke the purchase. At the time the fraud was discovered the intended or probable consequential injury had been cured and averted, and no right of Hill's had been impaired or could suffer by reason of the fraud that may have been practised by McLeary. The writ of error seems to have been granted in this case under the impression that the fraud was discovered and contract rescinded by Hill before the $140 note was secured by McLeary for cancellation, but the record does not support such conclusion. The fact is there was never any rescission or attempted rescission of the contract of purchase by Hill on account of the alleged fraud. So that we think the question whether the obligation of Hill to pay the note due plaintiff could be revoked by Hill and McLeary in a transaction between them to which plaintiff was not a party is to be determined independent of the question of fraud. This was the view taken by the majority opinion of the court of civil appeals. Hoeldtke v. Horstman, 128 S. W. 642.

The promise of Hill, being to pay a debt he had incurred to McLeary to plaintiff in discharge of the debt due plaintiff by McLeary, was not within the statute of frauds. The plaintiff accepted the promise of Hill to pay said note, although Hill seems to have had no notice of this acceptance. When these facts concurred, the obligation of Hill to pay plaintiff his note was as binding as if Hill had executed and delivered plaintiff his written obligation promising to pay same, and could no more be revoked by any subsequent agreement between Hill and McLeary without the consent of plaintiff than could any other obligation of Hill be revoked independent of the assent of the payee whose rights had been established by the concurrence of a promise to pay, a moving consideration, and an acceptance of such obligation. The relation thus established is purely contractual. McLeary was indebted to Hoeldtke upon the note he had assumed, and Hill was indebted to McLeary in a like sum as a part consideration for the land, and in obligating himself to pay Hoeldtke he was but obligating himself to pay a debt he owed to McLeary, but to McLeary's creditor, Hoeldtke, and, when Hoeldtke agreed with McLeary to accept Hill's promise, Hill became the principal debtor to Hoeldtke and McLeary surety for the debt. This arrangement embraced all the elements of a binding contract. There was a valuable consideration and mutuality of obligation. Hill was no longer a debtor of McLeary, but of Hoeldtke. McLeary had no cause of action against Hill, except in the event that Hill failed to pay Hoeldtke, and then only upon the principle that the surety may recover from the debtor whose debt he has been compelled to pay. "It is not necessary that the holder of the mortgage should notify the purchaser who has assumed the mortgage of his acceptance of the promise to pay the debt." 1 Jones, Mortg. § 752. The theory that the assumption of the debt of the grantor's creditor by the grantee is nothing more than an agreement of indemnity against the mortgage debt, and may be revoked by a reconveyance of the land, does not seem to have ever been recognized by any ruling of any court in this state that we are aware of. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

We doubt if such a rule obtains in any jurisdiction in the United States, where the creditor has accepted the substituted obligor, as in this case. This question seems to have been determined by the supreme court of this state in the case of Spann v. Cochran, 63 Tex. 240. In that case Cochran & Ewing bought of Watson & Lurue a printing press outfit, and assumed the payment of a note for $800 due Spann, which was secured by a chattel mortgage on the property so purchased. Payment seems to have been resisted upon the theory that the promise was to pay the debt of another, and therefore within the statute of frauds, and because there was no privity of contract, and because there was an abandonment of the property by Cochran & Ewing. It appears from the brief statement of the case that Spann was not a party to the contract between Cochran & Ewing on the one hand and Watson & Lurue on the other, from which it may be inferred there was no acceptance on the part of Spann, except as may be inferred from his suit against both parties. The trial court refused to enter a personal judgment against Cochran & Ewing, but the supreme court in reversing that case directed that a personal judgment should be rendered against both parties, and further directed that, in the event that Watson & Lurue paid the judgment, they should have execution over against Cochran & Ewing for such an amount. From this ruling it clearly appears that the supreme court held and regarded that Cochran & Ewing, who had assumed to pay the debt of Watson & Lurue to Spann, became the principal debtors by their assumption, and their grantors became the sureties of the vendees. Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 208. The opinion was rendered by Judge Stayton, and he has established a principle of law applicable to the case at bar, which case is analogous to that case. With reference to the nature of the contract he said: "It is believed, however, that such an agreement between a debtor and a third person, made upon valuable consideration, gives to the creditor a cause of action on which he may sue and recover from the person who has so contracted to pay to him a debt originally due only by the person to whom the promise is made. . . . We are of the opinion that, under the facts of this case, the action may be maintained against Cochran & Ewing, not only for the purpose of foreclosing the chattel mortgage, but also for the purpose of enforcing from them the payment of the debt due to Spann; and this as a personal obligation."

In the Spann Case, supra, there does not appear to have been an acceptance of the assumpsit of the grantees to pay the creditor's debt, and, notwithstanding the grantees had abandoned the property, they were held to be personally responsible on their promise. In this respect the case at bar is much stronger, as the findings show an acceptance by Hoeldtke of the grantee's promise to pay, and upon greater reason should an abandonment or reconveyance of the property not defeat the right of plaintiff to a personal judgment.

As bearing upon the question under discussion we refer to the following cases from which numerous authorities may be gathered and the subject pursued without limit: Spann v. Cochran, supra, and cases there cited; Huffman v. Western Mortg. & Invest. Co. 13 Tex. Civ. App. 169, 36 S. W. 306; Morrison v. Barry, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 22, 30 S. W. 376; Hoeldtke v. Horstman, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 128 S. W. 642, and cases there cited; Gifford v. Corrigan, 117 N. Y. 257, 6 L.R.A. 610, 15 Am. St. Rep. 508, 22 N. E. 756; Keller v. Ashford, 133 U. S. 610, 33 L. ed. 667, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 494. Following the case just referred to comes that of Huffman v. Western Mortg. & Invest. Co. supra, decided by the court of civil appeals, where the doctrine discussed in this opinion is fully sustained as follows: "Where, however, there has been an acceptance upon the part of the creditor, then a release by the original promisor does not affect the creditor's right to recover from the party assuming the debt." To a like effect is the case of Morrison v. Barry, supra, decided by the court of civil appeals, where it is distinctly held that, upon an acceptance of the assumpsit, the promise becomes irrevocable. In that case it is held that a failure of the creditor to accept the assumpsit or to take some steps to hold the promisor liable upon his promise would leave it within the power of the vendor by an act of rescission of the sale to revoke the promise of the vendee to the creditor. Since the case at bar is based upon a different state of facts, we are not called upon to decide the question whether or not an acceptance on the part of the creditor is necessary to prevent a revocation of the assumpsit, and we do not decide that question. It will not be amiss, however, to suggest that the ruling in the case of Morrison v. Barry, above referred to, seems to be in conflict with that in the case of Spann v. Cochran, supra.

A question very similar to that under investigation was before the New York court of appeals in the case of Gifford v. Corrigan, 117 N. Y. 257, 6 L.R.A. 610, 15 Am. St. Rep. 508, 22 N. E. 756, in which Judge Finch said: "Is this release, thus executed, a defense to this action? I shall not undertake to decide, if, indeed, the question is open, . . . whether in the interval between the making of the contract and the acceptance and adoption of it by the mortgagee it was or was not revocable without his assent. However that may be, the only inquiry now presented is whether it is so revocable after it has come to the knowledge of the creditor, and he has assented to it, and adopted it as a security, for his own benefit. My judgment leads me to answer that question in the negative." Judge Hodges in speaking for the majority of the court of civil appeals in this case has so ably and elaborately presented the issues that we desire to quote from his opinion at some length as expressive of our views, as follows: "So far as our investigation has been extended, all of the cases where this question has been involved concede that the promise of the grantee becomes irrevocable when the mortgagee has in some manner acted upon it, with the exception of two, one in California and the other in New Jersey. Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 354, 30 Pac. 609; Laing v. Byrne, 34 N. J. Eq. 52. These, however, have become so isolated by the subsequent trend of American adjudications that they may now be regarded as being without weight as judicial authority upon this question. Certainly it may be said that they are at present almost, if not entirely, alone in espousing the doctrine which distinguishes them from the great body of juridical opinions. In those cases where it is held if the mortgagee has in some manner acted upon the promise of the grantee that the liability of the latter becomes fixed, it is not claimed that this action must be such as would create an estoppel against the grantee. It seems to be sufficient if it is such as to evince an acceptance or an adoption of the promise by the mortgagee. If this be the true view, then it follows irresistibly that the grantee cannot thereafter relieve himself of his assumed obligation without the consent of the creditor whose assent fixed his status. This would seem to be in accord with the general principles governing the right of contracting parties. When Hill purchased this land from McLeary, he, in effect, held back that portion of the consideration which was due to Hoeldtke and Leach from the purchase price. This he undertook to pay to them, or to the holders of the notes, not to benefit McLeary, but in order to discharge an encumbrance against the property which he had purchased, and as a part of the consideration. We do not think it was essential, in order to fix the liability of Hill, that he should have received actual notice of the plaintiffs' assent to or acceptance of his promise made for their benefit. When he accepted the deed from McLeary containing the recitation of his assumption of those outstanding obligations, it was an unconditional promise upon his part to pay those notes according to their terms. It was not a mere offer by him to make a contract, but an absolute contractual undertaking." [128 S. W. 642.]

Upon a careful consideration of the questions presented, we find no reason why the ruling of the court of Civil Appeals in this case, as expressed in the opinion of the majority of that court, should be disturbed, and the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals will be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Petition for rehearing denied.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

H. H. BARTON, Appt.,

v.

E. M. ROGERS et al., Resp'ts.

(21 Idaho, 609, 123 Pac. 478.)

Libel — report of school officers.

1. Where the board of trustees of an independent school district enter orders and pass resolutions with reference to the government and conduct of the school and the duties of the teachers and superintendent, and such orders and resolutions clearly fall within the powers and authority of the school board under the law, the motives and purposes of such board cannot be put in issue in an action for damages under the charge of civil libel.

Same — privilege — malice.

A school board cannot be protected in the use of libelous language or charges against a teacher under the pretext of discharging official duties; but so long as their actions are clearly within the purview of the law and such as they have an unquestionable right to perform, and they use lawful means in the performance of the act, they cannot be held liable in an action for libel, even though it be charged that they performed the act in pursuance of a conspiracy among their members or through a malicious motive.

Same — conspiracy — lawful act.

Allshie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for libel. The plaintiff alleges:

That for many years prior to August 1, 1909, he had been engaged in performing the duties incident to the profession of teaching and superintending public schools. That he had earned a lucrative salary at his profession. That for some four years continuously previous thereto he had been employed by the board of trustees of independent school district No. 1 of Kootenai county as superintendent of the schools of that district. That during the entire term he had been so employed he had been diligent in his profession, and rendered efficient and satisfactory service to the board and the school district. That at all the times covered by the acts complained of, the defendants were the members of the board of trustees of independent school district No. 1 of Kootenai county. That prior to the 6th day of April, 1909, and while the plaintiff was so engaged and employed as superintendent of the schools of independent school district No. 1 of Kootenai county, he became a candidate for the office of city clerk of the city of Cœur d'Alene, to be voted upon at the election held in the city of Cœur d'Alene on the 6th day of April, 1909. That the defendants were during that time actively supporting and using every possible effort to procure the election of another candidate to the office of city clerk; and that the defendants, as members of the board of trustees, used every effort possible to dissuade and prevent plaintiff from becoming a candidate or engaging in the campaign for election to such office, and that they "unlawfully conspired together and acted with each other in doing everything possible to humiliate, degrade, and injure the plaintiff in said campaign, and attempted in various ways to compel plaintiff to withdraw his name as candidate on said ticket for said city clerk, and, failing in this, said defendants promulgated and carried on a system of acts and doings for the purpose of humiliating, mortifying, and degrading plaintiff publicly, and injuring him in the estimation of the public, and in his reputation and standing in his profession, and as a citizen and resident of the community." That defendants, failing to prevent the candidacy of plaintiff, did thereafter "maliciously, unlawfully, knowingly, and for the 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) purpose of slandering and libeling plaintiff, and without any reason therefor, and without any foundation, right, or motive other than malice and revenge, cause the following resolutions and orders to be adopted, passed, and made of record in the books and records of said school district of which defendants were members:"

A Clerk.

That defendants well knew, when they passed these resolutions, that there was no reason or cause therefor, and that they knew at the time of passing such resolutions, that to do so would injure, degrade, and humiliate the plaintiff and would prevent his procuring further employment in his profession, and would result in destroying his profession and leaving him without a profession or means of employment or procuring a livelihood, and plaintiff claimed damages in the sum of $30,000. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that the complaint failed to state a cause of action. Judgment was thereupon entered, and plaintiff appealed.

The only question presented on this appeal is the sufficiency of the complaint to state a cause of action. The foregoing resolutions and communications comprise all of the acts and things charged against the defendants as constituting the injury, and cause for the damages sought herein. Under subdivision 11 of § 658, Rev. Codes (the same as subdivision 11 of § 129 of the school law of 1911, p. 532), the board of trustees of an independent school district is authorized "to require teachers to conform to the laws of the state and regulations of the school board." Subdivision 1 of the same section authorizes the board "to make such by-laws for the government of the schools as they may deem expedient, not inconsistent with the laws of the state;" and subdivision 2 authorizes them to "employ or discharge teachers." They may discharge a teacher without cause. Ewin v. Independent School Dist. No. 8, 10 Idaho, 102, 77 Pac. 222. It is admitted that the defendants made and adopted the resolutions of which the appellant complains while acting "as a board of school trustees," and that they had the power and authority to make these orders and resolutions. They all had reference to the government of the school and the duties of the appellant as superintendent thereof. The appellant contends, however, that no reason or cause existed for the passage of such orders and resolutions; and that the necessities of the occasion or requirements of the situation did not demand this action; and that in fact it was not done out of any solicitude or necessity for the schools, but out of malice and ill-will, and for the purpose and motives of revenge alone. This proposition brings us face to face with the quære: Can the motives and purposes of a school board when performing an official act clearly within their powers under the law be put in issue in an action for damages under the charge of a civil libel? The answer must inevitably be in the negative.

They have no right to employ libelous language in the performance of their official duties, and cannot shield themselves behind their official character where they have overstepped their authority or exercised official powers in an unlawful manner, but so long as their acts are clearly within the purview of the statute and are such as they have an unquestioned right to perform, they should not be subject to an action for libel on the charge of conspiracy or malice in doing the act. Henry v. Mob- erly, 6 Ind. App. 490, 33 N. E. 981; Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. p. 431.

It is quite generally held that what a person may lawfully do may be done with or without malice. Carpenter v. Grimes Pass Placer Min. Co. 19 Idaho, 384, 114 Pac. 42; McHenry v. Snee, 56 Iowa, 649, 10 N. W. 234; Porter v. Mack, 50 W. Va. 581, 40 S. E. 459; note 9, p. 727 of 62 L.R.A.; Macauley Bros. v. Tierney, 19 R. I. 255, 61 Am. St. Rep. 770, and notes, 33 Atl. 1, 37 L.R.A. 455. In other words, there can be no legal malice in contemplation of law where the thing done is lawful and the means employed are lawful.

Courts must judge the intent a man has in doing an act by the means he employs and the thing to be accomplished, and if they all be lawful, courts cannot impute malicious or unlawful motives to the actor. Many acts of a school board or other public body or board may indirectly injure someone, but such injury must be borne as an incident which attaches to the public services and dealings with such officers or public agencies. A school board may dismiss a teacher, and the result will be necessarily injurious to the teacher; but no action for damages will lie. City authorities might dismiss a police officer while he is a candidate for an elective office or an applicant for some more lucrative position, and thereby do him irreparable injury; yet the city council would not be liable in damages. These things are hazards incident to the employment, and such public employees must take their chances on such contingencies.

The demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment is affirmed. Costs awarded in favor of respondents.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

C. W. BRADBURY

v.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(149 Iowa, 51, 128 N. W. 1.)

Trial — instruction — request.

1. A request for special instructions is necessary to require the court, in an action by a servant to hold his master liable for Note. — Power of state court to enforce right under Federal employer's liability act.

It may now be considered as settled that state courts of general jurisdiction not only may, but must, enforce a right arising un-personal injuries alleged to have been caused by a protruding bolt, to submit to the jury the question of the knowledge of the servant based on the custom of business, where it has instructed that if plaintiff knew, or in the exercise of reasonable diligence might have known, of the bolt and the danger therefrom, he could not recover.

Courts — jurisdiction — act of Congress — state authority.

2. State courts may, on the ground of comity, take jurisdiction of actions by employees to recover damages from railroad companies for personal injuries arising under the employer's liability act of Congress relating to interstate commerce, of April 22, 1908.

Pleading — amendment — motion to strike — discretion.

3. There is no abuse of discretion in sustaining a motion to strike an amendment of the answer, filed after all the evidence is adduced, to make the pleading conform thereto.

Evidence — exclusion — variance from pleadings.

4. There is no error in the exclusion of evidence, in an action by an employee to hold a railroad company liable for personal injuries to him, that the injury was received in the transaction of interstate commerce, where there is nothing in the pleadings to indicate that such was the fact.

Damages — loss of arm — excess.

5. A recovery of $15,000 as damages for loss of an arm by a railroad trackman, twenty-four years old, who was earning from $80 to $85 per month, was reduced to $12,000.

der the Federal employer's liability act of April 22, 1908 (35 Stat. at L. 65, chap. 149, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 1171), as amended by the act of April 5, 1910 (36 Stat. at L. 291, chap. 143, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1324). A leading and decisive decision upon this question was rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States in Mondou v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 223 U. S. 1, 56 L. ed. 327, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 44, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 169, reversing 82 Conn. 373, 73 Atl. 762, wherein it was expressly held that the enforcement of rights under this act cannot be regarded as impliedly restricted to the Federal courts, in view of the concurrent jurisdiction provision of the judiciary act of August 13, 1888 (25 Stat. at L. 433, chap. 866, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 508). § 1, and of the amendment of April 5, 1910, to the original employer's liability act, which, instead of granting jurisdiction to the state courts, presupposes that they already possess it. In arriving at this conclusion the court refuted the contentions that a state court, although having ordinary jurisdiction as prescribed by local laws adequate to the occasion, could decline to enforce the act when invoked, on the theory that it was not in harmony with the policy of the state, and that the exercise of such jurisdiction would be attended by inconvenience and confusion because of the different standards of right established by the congressional act and those recognized by the laws of the state. In answering the former objection the court said: "The suggestion that the act of Congress is not in harmony with the policy of the state, and therefore that the courts of the state are free to decline jurisdiction, is quite inadmissible, because it presupposes what in legal contemplation does not exist. When Congress, in the exertion of the power confided to it by the Constitution, adopted that act, it spoke for all the people and all the states, and thereby established a policy for all. That policy is as much the policy of Connecticut as if the act had emanated from its own legislature and should be respected accordingly in the court of the state;" and, continuing, referred to the latter objection as follows: "We are not disposed to believe that the exercise of jurisdiction by the state courts will be attended by any appreciable inconvenience or confusion; but, be this as it may, it affords no reason for declining a jurisdiction conferred by law. The existence of the jurisdiction creates an implication of duty to exercise it, and that its exercise may be onerous does not militate against that implication. Besides, it is neither new nor unusual in judicial proceedings to apply different rules of law to different situations and subjects, even although possessing some elements of similarity; as, where the liability of a public carrier for personal injuries turns upon whether the injured person was a passenger, an employee, or a stranger. But it never has been supposed that courts are at liberty to decline cognizance of cases of a particular class, merely because the rules of law to be applied in their adjudication are unlike those applied in other cases."

The above stated, as well as other, grounds upon which state courts may decline to administer the act, had been advanced and overcome in the following decisions, which support the rule as announced in the Mondou Case: Zikos v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 179 Fed. 893, holding that the act does not attempt to delegate judicial power of the United States to state courts in violation of the United States Constitution, article 3; idem, holding that the state courts cannot refuse to entertain jurisdiction on the ground that the Federal act establishes rules and measures of liability different from those existing under the state laws. In this connection the court said: "The Constitution of the United States being the supreme law of the land, state and Federal courts are alike subject to its provisions; and the refusal of the former to enforce rights conferred by Congress would put them in the same category as would a refusal to entertain causes flowing from any other recognized source of authority. It would be an APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Emmet County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by its negligence. Affirmed on condition.

anomoly in our system if state tribunals, after having so long entertained the grievances of litigants, where rights are traceable to congressional legislation, should refuse to further do so because of the fact that there has been provided by a power clearly competent, different rules of liability for those engaged in interstate commerce from those which may be fixed by statute or recognized by decisions in the several states. All government rests upon acquiescence in the established order. When common consent is withdrawn, prescribed rules of conduct are overthrown and anarchy reigns, and it is not to be supposed that state courts will or can refuse to abide by the result when the Supreme Court, the final arbiter, has decided that they have jurisdiction. If that should occur, the Constitution would cease to be the supreme law of the land, and its express provision, that 'the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding,' would become null and its application inoperative"; St. Louis, I. Messrs. J. I. Myerly and Mack J. Groves for appellee.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The freight train left Emmetsburg for Dowes at about 1:45 o'clock in the morning of July 1, 1908. The plaintiff was head brakeman and had been in defendant's employment about twenty months. He was directed by the conductor at Graattinger to take two stock cars from the side track and place them immediately back of two refrigerator cars next the engine. In order to accomplish this, he uncoupled the remainder of the train from the refrigerator cars, and, after disposing of it and attending to switching, got on the second refrigerator car at the end toward the engine and rode as these backed on the side track on which the stock cars stood. Both his feet were in the stirrup at the side and near the end of the car, one hand hold of the fourth rung of the ladder, and the other carrying a lantern. When the cars had moved to the depot platform, he was about to get off; but, as one foot reached the platform, his glove caught on a bolt between the third and fourth rung of the ladder, and this jerked him between the cars, where he hung an instant and then fell to the ground. The wheel of the car ran over his right arm, so injuring it that amputation was necessary. The negligence alleged was the leaving of the bolt protruding at a locality likely to cause injury. The defendant pleaded that the risk had been assumed, and adduced evidence tending to show that from all its refrigerator cars bolts protruded with nuts on them an half-inch thick, from which the ends of the bolts usually extended beyond the nut from nothing to five eighths of an inch, and that in every car was a bolt about where the one occasioning the injury was located. On the other hand, the evidence tended to show that the ends of most the bolts were flush with the nuts, and that plaintiff had no knowledge of this bolt. Plaintiff had been in defendant's employment as brakeman about twenty months, and one or more refrigerator cars was in nearly every train.

The court instructed the jury, in substance, that if plaintiff knew, or by the exercise of ordinary diligence might have known, of the existence of the protruding bolt, and appreciated the dangers therefrom, he could not recover. Exception is taken to this on the ground that knowledge suming jurisdiction to hear and determine actions arising thereunder.

The only decisions adverse to the rule that state courts of general jurisdiction have jurisdiction concurrent with the Federal courts of actions arising under the Federal employer's liability act are Mondou v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 82 Conn. 373, 73 Atl. 762, which was reversed by the United States Supreme Court (set out supra), and Hoxie v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 82 Conn. 352, 73 Atl. 754; 17 Ann. Cas. 324, upon which the state court decision in the Mondou Case was based. The denial of jurisdiction in the Hoxie Case by the Connecticut supreme court of errors, speaking through Judge Baldwin, was mainly upon the ground that Congress did not intend to authorize the institution of an action under the Federal employer's act in the courts of the state, and that, assuming that Congress had power to and had prescribed a rule not in harmony with the policy of the state, it had no power to make it incumbent upon the state courts to assume jurisdiction of such an action, and that therefore the courts of the state could decline jurisdiction. Both of these contentions are disposed of by the United States Supreme Court in the Mondou Case, as is shown by the summary of the case set out supra. The Hoxie Case is also criticized in BRADBURY v. CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. Co.; 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Wallace, 223 U. S. 481, 56 L. ed. 516, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 205, although not within the scope of this note, because it involves a Federal act other than the one under consideration herein, is of interest upon the general question of administration of Federal laws in state courts, in that it against demonstrates that the United States Supreme Court regards state courts of general jurisdiction as having jurisdiction concurrent with the Federal courts to enforce Federal laws which do not, either expressly or by necessary implication, confer exclusive jurisdiction on the Federal courts.

or its equivalent concerning the particular bolt was exacted, and it is said that the jury should have been told that if plaintiff knew that defendant customarily operated cars with bolts protruding, and plaintiff knew of this custom and appreciated the peril incident thereto, then he should be held to have assumed the risk. Possibly, had such an instruction been requested, it should have been given, for if refrigerator cars with protruding bolts were customarily used on the road, to plaintiff's knowledge, and concerning which he knew the danger, it might well be held that, in the exercise of reasonable care, he must have ascertained the condition of the car he rode on at the time of the accident. This would be the only ground for so holding, and in the instruction given it was clearly stated that, if in the exercise of ordinary care he might have known of the protruding bolt and have appreciated the danger, he must fail. So that whether the knowledge charged be from the understanding of a custom or direct information, the rule is in harmony with the instruction, and, had defendant desired that the law be more specifically applied to the proof, counsel should have so requested. In the absence of such request, there was no error.

2. Evidence was received, subject to objection, showing that, as part of the train, a car load of eggs was being transported from Ellsworth, Minnesota, through this state to Chicago, Illinois, and that several other car loads of freight were being taken to the latter place and other points in Illinois. After all the evidence had been introduced, defendant moved that the jury be directed to return a verdict in its favor. For that, among other things, plaintiff at the time of receiving the injury was employed in the operation of a railway train engaged in interstate commerce, and recovery could only be had under an act of Congress approved April 22, 1908 (act April 22, 1908, chap. 149, 35 Stat. at L. 65, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 1171). Thereupon plaintiff moved that all the evidence of interstate shipments introduced subject to objection be stricken from the record. The court having intimated that defendant's motion must fail because of not having pleaded that the injury was received while connected with a train engaged in interstate commerce, defendant filed an amendment to its answer raising that issue. Plaintiff moved to strike this amendment because filed too late and the matter alleged did not constitute a defense. This motion was sustained, as, also, was the motion to strike the evidence. An instruction to direct a verdict in defendant's favor because of it being engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the accident was requested and refused.

It will be noted that the rulings raise the following questions: (1) Was evidence tending to show that defendant was engaged in interstate commerce admissible in the absence of anything in the answer so asserting? (2) If not, did the court err in striking the amendment so pleading from the files? (3) In either event, can the right created by the so-called employer's liability act be enforced in the state courts?

For convenience, the last may be disposed of first. The constitutionality of the act is not assailed. That it is likely to be upheld finally is fairly to be inferred from the several opinions in Employers' Liability Cases (Howard v. Illinois C. R. Co.) 207 U. S. 463, 52 L. ed. 297, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 141, though a different view appears to have been entertained by the supreme court of Connecticut. Hoxie v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 82 Conn. 352, 73 Atl. 754, 17 Ann. Cas. 324. See El Paso & N. E. R. Co. v. Gutierrez, 215 U. S. 87, 54 L. ed. 106, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 21. In the Howard Case, the court held that Congress had the power, under the clause of the Constitution authorizing it to regulate commerce among the several states, to define the duties and liabilities of master and servant when engaged in interstate commerce. Until the approval of this act, at least, the statutes of the state defining the liability of railway companies to their employees were valid and enforceable (Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 23 L. ed. 819), even when engaged in intrastate commerce. A state statute, when covering a matter within the powers of Congress and necessarily conflicting with an act of that body, must give way to the Federal statute. The rule is tersely stated in the case last cited: "The power to prescribe these and similar regulations necessarily involves the right to declare the liability which shall follow their infraction. Whatever, therefore, Congress determines, either as to regulation or the liability for its infringement, is exclusive of state authority." Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hefley, 158 U. S. 98, 39 L. ed. 910, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 802; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 167 U. S. 642, 42 L. ed. 309, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 986. See Western U. Teleg. Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 654, 40 L. ed. 1106, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 934.

But there is nothing in the petition in the case at bar to indicate whether the cause of action is predicated on the state or Federal statutes, and we have no occasion to inquire to what extent, if at all, the statutes of this state eliminating the fellow-servant rule have been superseded by the Federal statutes. For the purposes of this case, it may be conceded that the facts bring it within the terms of the Federal statute, and that plaintiff must recover thereon, if at all. The petition stated a cause of action thereunder, and, unless it can be said that Federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction in the enforcement of rights created or declared in advancement of those previously existing, there is no ground for interfering with the judgment entered. The matter of jurisdiction is not touched in the act of Congress, and it is now well settled that state courts may exercise concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal courts in all cases arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, unless exclusive jurisdiction has been conferred, expressly or by necessary implication, on the Federal courts. Claffin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 130, 23 L. ed. 833; Raisler v. Oliver, 97 Ala. 714, 38 Am. St. Rep. 215, 12 So. 238; Wilcox v. Luco, 118 Cal. 642, 45 L.R.A. 582, 62 Am. St. Rep. 306, 45 Pac. 676, 50 Pac. 758; Schuyler Nat. Bank v. Bollong, 24 Neb. 827, 40 N. W. 414; Bletz v. Columbia Nat. Bank, 87 Pa. 92, 30 Am. Rep. 345; Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick, 88 N. Y. 60; People v. Welch, 141 N. Y. 273, 24 L.R.A. 117, 38 Am. St. Rep. 793, 36 N. E. 328; 11 Cyc. 996.

In the case first above cited, the Supreme Court, speaking through Bradley, J., said: "The general question, whether state courts can exercise concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal courts in cases arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, has been elaborately discussed, both on the bench and in published treatises,—sometimes with a leaning in one direction and sometimes in the other; but the result of these discussions has, in our judgment, been, as seen in the above cases, to affirm the jurisdiction, where it is not excluded by express provision or by incompatibility in its exercise arising from the nature of the particular case. When we consider the structure and true relations of the Federal and state governments, there is really no just foundation for excluding the state courts from all such jurisdiction. The laws of the United States are laws in the several states, and just as much binding on the citizens and courts thereof as the state laws are. The United States is not a foreign sovereignty as regards the several states, but is a concurrent and, within its jurisdiction, paramount sovereignty. Every citizen of a state is a subject of two distinct sovereignties, having concurrent jurisdiction in the state; concurrent as to place and persons, though distinct as to the subject-matter. Legal or equitable rights, acquired under either system of laws, may be enforced in any court of either sovereignty competent to hear and determine such kind of rights, and not restrained by its Constitution in the exercise of such jurisdiction. Thus a legal or equitable right acquired under state laws may be prosecuted in the state courts, and also, if the parties reside in different states, in the Federal courts. So rights, whether legal or equitable, acquired under the laws of the United States, may be prosecuted in the United States courts, or in the state courts, competent to decide rights of the like character and class; subject, however, to this qualification, that, where a right arises under a law of the United States, Congress may, if it see fit, give to the Federal courts exclusive jurisdiction. . . . This jurisdiction is sometimes exclusive by express enactment and sometimes by implication. If an act of Congress gives a penalty to a party aggrieved, without specifying a remedy for its enforcement, there is no reason why it should not be enforced, if not provided otherwise by some act of Congress, by a proper action in a state court. The fact that a state court derives its existence and functions from the state laws is no reason why it should not afford relief; because it is subject also to the laws of the United States, and is just as much bound to recognize these as operative within the state as it is to recognize the state laws. The two together form one system of jurisprudence, which constitutes the law of the land for the state; and the courts of the two jurisdictions are not foreign to each other, nor to be treated by each other as such, but as courts of the same country, having jurisdiction partly different and partly concurrent."

An illustration of the exercise of exclusive jurisdiction by the Federal courts will be found in Copp v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 43 La. Ann. 511, 12 L.R.A. 725, 26 Am. St. Rep. 198, 9 So. 441, where a plea to the jurisdiction of the state court was sustained on the ground that the act of Congress on which the action for damages was based, directed that it be brought in the United States courts. In Hoxie v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. supra, the supreme court of Connecticut reached the conclusion that by fair implication the act of Congress excludes jurisdiction of the state courts, and, in any event, the state court was under no obligation to enforce the rights therein created. The last point appears to have been considered as though involving a question of comity merely, regardless of the convenience and propriety of enforcing all rights and redressing all wrongs within the jurisdiction of the local courts.

The prevailing rule is that, where a cause of action accrues by virtue of the statute of any state, the action may be maintained in any other state if not contrary to the public policy or law of the place where the suit is brought. Boyce v. Wabash R. Co. 63 Iowa, 70, 50 Am. Rep. 730, 18 N. W. 673; Morris v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 727, 54 Am. Rep. 39, 23 N. W. 143. See cases collected in note to Reeves v. Southern R. Co. 70 L.R.A. 513. In such cases, the law of the place where the right was acquired or the liability incurred will govern as to the right of action, while all that pertains merely to the remedy will be controlled by the law of the state where the action is brought. Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 31 Minn. 11, 47 Am. Rep. 771, 16 N. W. 413.

Even where the cause of action arises in a foreign country, suits may be maintained in our courts, though jurisdiction can be declined; but this is seldom done, unless from fear of inability to do justice through lack of knowledge of the laws of the place where the cause of action arose. Mason v. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch, 240, 2 L. ed. 266; Roberts v. Dunsmuir, 75 Cal. 203, 16 Pac. 782; Great Western R. Co. v. Miller, 19 Mich. 305; Cofrode v. Gartner, 79 Mich. 332, 7 L.R.A. 511, 44 N. W. 623; Evey v. Mexican C. R. Co. 38 L.R.A. 387, 26 C. C. A. 407, 52 U. S. App. 118, 81 Fed. 294; 11 Cyc. 663. The reasons which induce state courts to exercise jurisdiction of causes of action arising in a foreign country or under legislation of another state should be quite as persuasive in favor of assuming jurisdiction over causes of action arising under the statutes of the United States, with this in addition, that these are the laws of the very people the jurisdiction of whose courts is invoked. See 11 Cyc. 996. If a cause of action has become fixed and a legal liability incurred, the doors of the courts of this state should not be closed to the prosecution of such cause of action, regardless of whether the same may have arisen under the statutes of another state, an act of Congress, or the laws of a foreign country, unless to enforce it would be contrary to the laws or public policy of the state, or complete justice probably could not be done. Unless the act of Congress should be construed to confer exclusive jurisdiction on the Federal courts, or the mode of procedure is such that the state courts cannot safely undertake to enforce the liability defined, there seems no ground for declining to exercise a jurisdiction fully approved by the authorities. The statute is silent concerning jurisdiction; but it is said that the rules of practice prescribed therein and the direction as to who shall be the beneficiaries thereunder are so inconsistent with the state laws as to indicate the congressional intent that redress may be had in the Federal courts alone. In order to dispose of this objection, it will be necessary to set out the main provisions of the act:

"Sec. 1. That every common carrier by railroad while engaging in commerce between any of the several states or territories, . . . or between the District of Columbia or any of the states or territories and any foreign nation or nations, shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce, or, in case of the death of such employee, to his or her personal representative for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee, and if none, then of such employee's parents; and if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee, for such injury or death resulting, in whole or in part, from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment."

"Sec. 3. That in all actions hereafter brought against any such common carrier by railroad, under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act, to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee, or where such injuries have resulted in his death, the fact that the employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee: Provided, that no such employee who may be injured or killed shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation of such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee."

"Sec. 4. That in any action brought against any common carrier, under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act to recover damages for injuries to or the death of any of its employees, such employee shall not be held to have assumed the risks of his employment in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee."

"Sec. 6. That no action shall be maintained under this act unless commenced within two years from the day the cause of action accrued."

It is manifest from the mere reading that this act effects quite as important a change in the trial of such causes in the Federal courts as would be possible in the state courts. Thus the Federal decisions are harmonious on the proposition that the negligence of complainant which contributes proximately to the injury will defeat the recovery of damages therefore. So, too, in the absence of local statutes, the fellow-servant doctrine and that of assumption of risks have been broadly applied in all Federal courts. Hereafter all of these rules are to be modified or eliminated where the injuries are such as contemplated in the above act. If inconvenience and confusion would result from an attempt to enforce the acts in the state courts, like consequences will be the outcome of a similar undertaking in the courts of the United States. Let us examine the several sections and ascertain the alleged inconsistencies which are said to preclude the maintenance of actions based thereon in the state courts. No one, we apprehend, would say that the state courts are not competent to entertain suits by the persons authorized by § 1 to recover damages or to distribute those recovered as specified. Under the statutes of this state, the suit is prosecuted in the name of the administrator where death is alleged to have resulted from wrongful act, and anything recovered distributed as personal property among the heirs. It goes to the surviving spouse and children if any there are, and, if not, to the parents of the deceased, precisely as under the Federal statute. In event there are neither spouse and children nor parents of deceased, the remoter heirs are entitled thereto under the state statute, while under this act the damages go to the next of kin dependent upon deceased. As the state statute must give way to that of Congress, no inconsistency is involved. All essential is that effect be given the latter as though the former were not on the statute book. Nor can it be said that this involves an interference by Congress with the distribution of an estate through the probate court of the state. The cause of action was created by Congress in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce among the several states, and it is elementary that in doing so it might determine who was entitled to maintain the same and for whose benefit. The administrator is not required thereby to institute proceedings; he may do so, and in that event can recover only for the benefit of the person entitled under the act to the damages. The administrator therein sustains the relation to the beneficiaries, like that of trustee to his cestui que trust, and it is of little concern whether he shall distribute the damages recovered in pursuance of an order of the court wherein recovered or in the appropriate probate court. Surely no court would permit an administrator, after recovering damages under a statute specifically prescribing who is entitled thereto, to divert the money elsewhere.

It must be borne in mind that this act does not relate to the distribution of the personal property of an estate. The cause of action does not belong to the estate of the deceased person, but to certain classes for whose benefit the administrator is authorized to recover damages, and we see no ground for saying this is contrary to our law or its policy. In a few states, notably Connecticut, the fellow-servant doctrine is still applied in case of injury caused in the use and operation of railways, and it seems to have been thought in the Hoxie Case that for a state court to apply that doctrine in causes based on injuries received in intrastate commerce, and to proceed in actions based on the Federal statute on the theory that the master is responsible for the acts of the fellow servant, would create confusion "setting up in the same tribunal different standards of right and policy and practice." More than fifty years ago, the fellow-servant doctrine was eliminated by the legislature of this state wherever the injury was occasioned by the negligent act of the fellow servant engaged in the use and operation of a railway, and, though that doctrine has been continually applied in all cases involving injuries suffered in other employments, little difficulty has been experienced in discriminating between situations exacting the application of the different rules. Indeed, the situation of employees engaged in the operation of railways ordinarily is such that they can exert little direct or personal influence upon each other in discharging their respective duties; and their opportunities for guarding against the negligent acts of one another are so limited that in many, if not in most, of the states, laws have been enacted declaring the master liable for the negligent acts of the servant when engaged in the use and operation of railways, even though the injured party be a fellow servant.

And we apprehend that the design of Congress was to furnish this measure of protection to employees engaged in interstate commerce in those states where, for reasons such as are suggested in the Hoxie Case, none have been provided by local legislation. Section 4 is somewhat similar to a statute of this state relating to assumption of risks. Chapter 219, Acts 33d Gen. Assem. And the only difficulty in entertaining suits for liability under the act of Congress, as it seems to us, will develop in the construction and application of § 3.

Under the decisions of this state contributory negligence, if the proximate cause, has always been held to defeat recovery. But such has been the rule in the Federal courts, and, as said, is now, save as modified by this act. No greater difficulty will confront the state courts in applying this or other sections of the act than the courts of the United States, and for this reason there is no ground for inferring from the somewhat radical nature of the act that it was the intent of Congress to confer exclusive jurisdiction on the Federal courts. With all due respect for the eminent court holding otherwise in Hoxie v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. supra, we are not persuaded by the reasoning of its opinion. Differences between the Federal and local courts not greater than those between different statutes or laws of the same state do not alone justify the conclusion that Congress intended to deny jurisdiction of the state courts, nor furnish a satisfactory reason for refusing that comity due to the sovereign government. Nor does it appear to have convinced the Congress, for an act approved April 5, 1910 (act April 5, 1910, chap. 143, 36 Stat. at L. 291, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1324), declared the jurisdiction of the United States courts under this act concurrent with that of the state courts, and further declared that "no case arising under this act and brought in any state court of competent jurisdiction shall be removed to any court of the United States."

The ruling of the trial court in retaining jurisdiction has our approval. As the amendment to the answer was filed after all the evidence was adduced, the court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining the motion to strike.

Nor do we think there was error in striking the evidence tending to show that plaintiff was at the time he received the injury engaged in interstate commerce. The fact that he was so engaged had not been alleged in the petition nor asserted in the answer; so that whether he was so engaged was not in issue. As argued, it is not necessary to plead the statutes of the United States; but, to invoke their benefit, facts rendering these applicable should be pleaded. All essential under the state law was proof that the injury was received because of the negligence of the company in the use or operation of its railway within the state, for until the contrary was made to appear it will be presumed to have been engaged in intrastate commerce. The evidence was rightly excluded.

3. Plaintiff was allowed $15,000 as damages, and this is said to be excessive. He was twenty-four years old and earning $80 to $85 per month. His life expectancy 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

was 39.5 years. Prior to the injury, his health was good, and since then it has been poor. He suffered pain at the time of the accident, and afterwards for four or five days it was severe. The right arm was amputated about 2 inches below the elbow. In Struble v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 128 Iowa, 158, 103 N. W. 142, a verdict of $12,000 for the loss of the left arm in favor of a brakeman twenty-seven years old and earning $60 to $70 per month was held excessive and reduced to $7,500. In Knapp v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 71 Iowa, 41, 32 N. W. 18, a verdict of $9,500 in favor of an engineer under forty years of age earning $100 per month, for permanent disability of right arm, was held not excessive. See Grannis v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 81 Iowa, 444, 46 N. W. 1067; Sprague v. Atlee, 81 Iowa, 1, 46 N. W. 756. In Kroener v. Chicago M. & St. P. R. Co. 88 Iowa, 16, 55 N. W. 28, and in Wimber v. Iowa C. R. Co. 114 Iowa, 551, 87 N. W. 505, the losses were of a leg, and in each the damages were reduced from $12,000 to $8,000. The facts of cases differ so much that no criterion can be established. The loss of an arm will not prevent plaintiff from pursuing another occupation, though always at an inconvenience, and probably with less remuneration. Upon examination of the entire record, we are satisfied that the sum of $12,000 will compensate him for the injuries received, and, if the plaintiff shall file a remittitur of the judgment in excess of that amount within thirty days of filing this opinion, the judgment will stand affirmed; otherwise it will be reversed.

Affirmed on condition.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Appeal dismissed for the want of jurisdiction by the Supreme Court of the United States, November 13, 1911, 223 U. S. 711, 56 L. ed. 624, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 520.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

GEORGE H. KERR

v.

JOHN W. CRANE et al., Appts.

(212 Mass. 224, 98 N. E. 783.)

Insurance — benefit certificate — trust in fund.

1. A trust enforceable in equity arises where, with the assent of the beneficiary,

Note. — Enforceability of promise by beneficiary to pay proceeds of life insurance to third person

In accord with KERR v. CRANE it is gen-one who could not acquire an interest in a benefit certificate because not bearing the necessary relationship to the member agrees to pay the dues and make advances to the member in consideration of the agreement with the member that the benefit fund shall be collected for his benefit.

Trust — benefit certificate — execution — enforcement.

2. A sufficient execution of the trust to enable equity to enforce it arises where a mutual benefit certificate is delivered to one having no insurable interest in the life of the member, upon the agreement of the beneficiary that, if he will pay the dues and make advances to the member, he shall have the proceeds when collected, and the member dies leaving the condition unchanged.

erally held that a promise by the beneficiary to the insured to collect and pay the whole or a part of the proceeds of the policy to a third person is valid and enforceable as against the promisor. Catland v. Hoyt, 78 Me. 355, 5 Atl. 775; Coyne v. Supreme Conclave, I. O. H. 106 Md. 54, 66 Atl. 704, 14 Ann. Cas. 870; Devries v. Hawkins, 70 Neb. 656, 97 N. W. 792; Steller v. Sell, 55 N. J. Eq. 530, 37 Atl. 1010, which modified decree rendered in 53 N. J. Eq. 397, 32 Atl. 211; Hirsh v. Auer, 146 N. Y. 13, 40 N. E. 397, affirming 79 Hun, 493, 29 N. Y. Supp. 917; *Brett v. And this is so, notwithstanding the fact that such third person could not acquire an interest in the benefit certificate or policy because not bearing the necessary relationship to the insured as prescribed by the rules of the beneficial association. Peek v. Peek, 101 Ky. 423, 41 S. W. 434; Hurd v. Doty, 86 Wis. 1, 21 L.R.A. 746, 56 N. W. 371; Clark v. Callahan, 105 Md. 600, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 616, 66 Atl. 618, 12 Ann. Cas. 162; Cowin v. Hurst, 124 Mich. 547, 83 Am. St. Rep. 344, 83 N. W. 274. The reason for this rule is that the beneficial association is the only party in position to contest the legality of the transaction.

Some cases proceed upon the theory that such an arrangement raises a trust in favor of such third person which is enforceable in equity. Peek v. Peek, 101 Ky. 423, 41 S. W. 434; *Clark v. APPPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Supreme Judicial Court for Middlesex County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount due upon a benefit certificate. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Gilbert A. A. Pevey, for appellants:

Payment of assessments by the plaintiff does not entitle him, in equity, to be repaid out of the fund.

Clark v. Supreme Council, R. A. 176 Mass. 470, 57 N. E. 787; Supreme Commandery, U. O. G. C. v. Merrick, 163 Mass. 374, 40 N. E. 183; Clarke v. Schwarzenberg, 164 Mass. 347, 41 N. E. 655.

(promise by creditor named as beneficiary to pay balance to insured's wife after satisfying his claim).

So, it has been held that an agreement entered into by a member of a fraternal beneficial society, with the consent of the beneficiary named in the certificate, to transfer the certificate to the plaintiff in consideration of plaintiff's undertaking to provide the member with a home, pay his dues and assessments to the order, and at his death pay his funeral expenses, and to repay the beneficiary the amount of dues and assessments which he had previously paid to the society, is enforceable in equity against the beneficiary after the death of the insured, where it appears that it was entered into in good faith, and not as a wagering contract. Brett v. Warnick, 44 Or. 511, 102 Am. St. Rep. 639, 75 Pac. 1061.

In Woodruff v. Tilman, 112 Mich. 188, 70 N. W. 420, it was held that a testamentary provision directing a beneficiary named in a fraternal benefit certificate, payable at testator's death, to pay a certain amount due a creditor out of the proceeds of the certificate, created a lien or trust upon the fund which was enforceable in equity, where it appeared that the beneficiary understood the arrangement and knew that the indebtedness was incurred on the faith of such security, and subsequently presented the will for probate.

But in Fisher v. Donovan, 57 Neb. 361, 44 L.R.A. 383, 77 N. W. 778, it was held that an oral promise by a wife to her husband, that she would pay his debts, did not create a trust in a benefit certificate on his life of which she was the beneficiary, upon the ground (1) that he had no interest in the fund, but possessed merely a power of appointment and therefore could not impress a trust upon it, and (2) that the oral promise of the beneficiary to pay the debts of another out of her own funds was void. The court said: "It is true, Mrs. Donovan did assent to her husband's request to pay his creditors, but, since he failed to provide the trust fund out of which payment might be made, the plaintiffs cannot recover from her as trustee. After her husband's death, there being no proper change of beneficiary, half the proceeds of the certificates in question became absolutely the money of Mrs. Donovan, and the promise she made was at most but a promise to pay her husband's debts out of her own property. There is no claim that the promise was in writing, and it is a familiar doctrine that a promise to answer for the debt, default, or misdoings of another is within the statute of frauds, and, to be binding, must be in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith."

The only right Merritt had in the certificate was the power of appointment.

In Donithen v. Independent Order of Foresters, 209 Pa. 170, 58 Atl. 142, reversing 23 Pa. Super. Ct. 442, it was held that one named as beneficiary in a benefit certificate will be declared trustee of the fund for the insured's wife, where it is clear the fund was intended for the sole benefit of the wife, though such fact was never communicated to the beneficiary named in the certificate, who had no knowledge that he was so named until after the death of the insured, and he declared to an officer of the association that he was acting solely for the wife's benefit when first being informed of the facts; it appearing that he was the insured's elder brother, residing in a distant state, having a good reputation as a business man; that the insured's wife was a minor, and that insured lacked confidence in his wife's mother.

So, it has been held that where one advanced money to pay the premiums and assessments upon another's life insurance policy, at the request of the insured and the beneficiary, under an agreement that such person's wife would be named as one of the beneficiaries to secure the repayment of the money, the beneficiary so named has no beneficial interest in the proceeds except as trustee for the amount advanced under the agreement. McDonald v. Humphries, 56 Ark. 63, 19 S. W. 234.

In other cases, the courts have permitted a recovery at law, applying the general doctrine that a third person may sue upon a contract made for his benefit. Waterhouse v. Waterhouse, 29 R. I. 485, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 639, 72 Atl. 642; Katz v. Witt, 74 Misc. 582, 134 N. Y. Supp. 675 (sustaining right of residuary legatee to recover where beneficiary named in certificate agreed to distribute fund according to directions of 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)) insured's will, which made the fund a part of the residuary estate).

In Catland v. Hoyt, 78 Me. 355, 5 Atl. 775, it was held that the executor of the insured could maintain assumpsit against the beneficiary to recover funds collected on the policy, where it appeared that the beneficiary had promised insured to pay the proceeds to the heirs of insured after deducting what should be due from the deceased to him. The defendant objected to evidence to establish the fact, upon the ground that it tended to vary the terms of the written agreement between the deceased and the beneficial association; and further, if admitted, would show a promise by the defendant to pay, not to the deceased, but to his heirs, and such a promise would not support an action by the executor. In disposing of these objections the court said: "The oral evidence was not in conflict with the written contract. It was offered not to vary or control the contract between the deceased and the insurance company, but to show another and an independent contract between the deceased and the defendant. It was offered not to show that the defendant was not to receive the money, but to show what he was to do with it after receiving it."

In Devries v. Hawkins, 70 Neb. 656, 97 N. W. 792, it was held that the fund collected by the beneficiary named in a fraternal benefit certificate, which he promised to pay to the member's child, may be recovered from the estate of such beneficiary by the child in an action for money had and received, where it appeared that the beneficiary, after the receipt of the fund, acknowledged that it belonged to the child.

Likewise, in Hirsh v. Auer, 146 N. Y. 13, 40 N. E. 397, affirming 79 Hun, 493, 29 N. Y. Supp. 917, it was held that the children of the insured were entitled to recover the proceeds of a certificate of insurance from the beneficiary, upon proof of a promise by beneficiary to collect and distribute the same among the children after paying the funeral expenses. While it was said in the above case that the proofs established a trust which was enforceable in equity, the form of action appears to have been at law, as distinguishing from a purely equitable suit.

No valid trust, resulting or otherwise, exists which can be enforced in equity.

the intention to establish the trust for his benefit, and acceptance of the offer.

An assignment of a certificate in a fraternal benefit order, although contrary to the purpose and intent of the by-laws of the order, and made to a stranger outside of the classes eligible under the by-laws of the order or the statutes of the state, must be recognized, in equity at least, in all cases where the fraternal benefit order does not appear to object.

Sheldon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The findings made by the single justice were well warranted and cannot be reversed. The case must be decided upon those findings.

The benefit certificate taken by Merritt B. Crane in the defendant order could not have been made payable to the plaintiff, who came within none of the classes named in the statute or in the "general laws" of the order. Rev. Laws, chap. 119, § 6; Massachusetts C. O. F. v. Callahan, 146 Mass. 393, 16 N. E. 14; Marsh v. Supreme Council, A. L. H. 149 Mass. 512, 4 L.R.A. 382, 21 N. E. 1070; Lavigne v. Ligue des Patriotes, 178 Mass. 25, 54 L.R.A. 814, 86 Am. St. Rep. 460, 59 N. E. 674. Nor could he acquire any rights in the certificate or its proceeds from any subsequent directions or assignment made in his favor by the insured (Briggs v. Earl, 139 Mass. 473, 1 N. E. 847), or by reason of the affectionate relations between himself and the member, or by reason of his having paid assessments and dues for which the member was liable (Supreme Council, A. L. H. v. Perry, 140 Mass. 580, 5 N. E. 634; Skillings v. Massachusetts Ben. Asso. 146 Mass. 217, 15 N. E. 566; McCarthy v. Supreme Lodge, O. P. 153 Mass. 314, 11 L.R.A. 144, 25 Am. St. Rep. 637, 26 N. E. 866; Shea v. Massachusetts Ben. Asso. 160 Mass. 289, 39 Am. St. Rep. 475, 35 N. E. 855; Clarke v. Schwar-zenberg, 162 Mass. 98, 38 N. E. 17; Id. 164 Mass. 347, 41 N. E. 655; Supreme Commandery, U. O. G. C. v. Merrick, 163 Mass. 374, 40 N. E. 183; Clarke v. Supreme Council, R. A. 176 Mass. 468, 57 N. E. 787; Hill v. Supreme Council, A. L. H. 178 Mass. 145, 59 N. E. 652; Wilber v. Supreme Lodge, N. E. O. P. 192 Mass. 477, 78 N. E. 445; Davis v. McGraw, 206 Mass. 294, 138 Am. St. Rep. 398, 92 N. E. 332). It is therefore the right and the duty of the defendant order to pay the amount of the certificate to the beneficiary named therein, the defendant John W. Crane.

The real claim of the plaintiff is against the last-named defendant, upon the ground that a trust has been created in the plaintiff's favor and impressed upon the proceeds of the certificate, by which the beneficiary of the certificate is bound to receive and hold its proceeds for the benefit of the plaintiff and to turn them at once over to him. To create such a trust and to bind the beneficiary to the performance thereof, the insured member delivered the certificate to the plaintiff and arranged that the latter should pay the assessments to become due thereon, and also make a small monthly payment to the member himself. The member also informed the beneficiary, John W. Crane, of this, his desire, of his arrangement with the plaintiff, and of his wish that John should pay the proceeds of the certificate, when collected, to the plaintiff. John orally assented to this. A written memorandum was also prepared and signed by the insured member, his wife, and his nearest blood relations, and by John, the beneficiary. And a single justice has found that this beneficiary "understood that he was not to receive the proceeds for his own use," but that he "agreed to collect and hold the proceeds for the use of the plaintiff." Unless this arrangement and the trust which resulted therefrom are invalid, or are not to be enforced by reason of the circumstances of the case, we are satisfied that it did create a duty on the part of John W. Crane to recognize the rights of the plaintiff as entitled to this fund when it should have been collected, and to pay the same at once to him, and that this right of the plaintiff can be enforced in equity. Kendrick v. Ray, 173 Mass. 305, 73 Am. St. Rep. 289, 53 N. E. 823; Hewins v. Baker, 161 Mass. 320, 37 N. E. 441. Though not precisely the same, the situation is analogous to those cases in which one has acquired property "by conveyance or devise, secured to himself under assurances that he will transfer the property to or hold and appropriate it for the use and benefit of another. A trust for the benefit of such other person is charged upon the property, not by reason merely of the oral promise, but because of the fact that by means of such promise he had induced the transfer of the property to himself." Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 24, 39, 3 Am. Rep. 418, and cases cited; Olliffe v. Wells, 130 Mass. 221, 224, and cases cited. John W. Crane, though already named as beneficiary in the certificate, yet held this position only at the will of the insured member, who at any time could have revoked his designation and appointed another in his stead; and it is an irresistible inference from the facts found that this course would have been taken, and that another beneficiary within the class permitted would have been appointed but for the consent and engagement given by John.

But it is claimed that there was no valid consideration for this promise and the trust which resulted therefrom. This position, however, is sufficiently answered by what has been said. The beneficiary retained his position by reason of his undertaking, and that was consideration enough. As in the cases already referred to, it would be a fraud for him to receive and apply to his own use the proceeds which he has been enabled to obtain only by means of his promise to pay them to the plaintiff.

It is said that the interests, both of the insured member and of this beneficiary, were merely contingent, and not actually vested, rights of property in an existing fund. That is true. The amount of the benefit might never be realized at all. If it were to be realized, yet the member had no other interest therein than the bare power to appoint some person of a limited class to receive the fund if and when it should become due and payable. The beneficiary had no other interest than a mere expectancy dependent upon the will and pleasure of the insured member. But it does not follow that the holder of such a merely expected or contingent interest, growing or expected to grow out of actually existing, though defeasible, contractual rights, has no power of dealing with it, or that his engagements made with reference to such an interest, while it is merely expectant and contingent, may not be enforced in equity after the interest shall have become vested and absolute. And it has been so held with reference to just such contingent and expectant rights as are here in question. Hirsh v. Auer, 146 N. Y. 13, 40 N. E. 397; Dexter v. Supreme Council, R. T. T. 97 App. Div. 545, 90 N. Y. Supp. 292; Kimball v. Lester, 43 App. Div. 27, 59 N. Y. Supp. 540, affirmed in 167 N. Y. 570, 60 N. E. 1113; Jarvis v. Binkley, 206 Ill. 541, 69 N. E. 582; Peek v. Peek, 101 Ky. 423, 41 S. W. 434. That equitable rights might be attached to the proceeds of such a certificate was recognized by this court in Mee v. Fay, 190 Mass. 40, 42, 76 N. E. 229.

This disposition cannot be avoided on the ground that it was merely testamentary. Kendrick v. Ray, 173 Mass. 305, 73 Am. St. Rep. 318, 53 N. E. 823.

The trust was sufficiently executed by the delivery of the certificate to the plaintiff and the promise of the beneficiary to pay the prospective fund to the plaintiff upon its receipt. No doubt all this rested upon a merely contingent foundation, and might have been avoided by the member in his lifetime, through the appointment of a new beneficiary; but this was not done, and the rights of these parties are not now affected by that past contingency.

It is a more difficult question whether by the means here presented the benefit of the certificate can be secured to one who is not a member of the class described in the statute already quoted and in the rules of the defendant order. If the plaintiff claimed merely under the insured member, he could not maintain his claim. It is said that to permit him now to recover would be to allow that to be done by indirection which could not be done directly, and thus to frustrate both the legislative will and the intention of the parties to the contract. On this reasoning it was held in another state that an assignment of such a certificate made by the beneficiary thereof in the lifetime of the insured member and joined in by the latter was invalid. Rose v. Wilkins, 78 Miss. 401, 29 So. 397. It may be granted that a beneficiary association could not be required to make payment to any other persons than those specified in its regulations and in the statutes by which it is governed. The power of the court to deal with the beneficiary, to require him to collect the money that has become due, and to pay it out according to the obligations into which he has entered, stands on a different footing. But the existence of even this power has been denied. Gillam v. Dale, 69 Kan. 362, 76 Pac. 861: In our opinion, however, there is a fundamental difference between the two propositions. The right of the beneficiary to bind himself by antecedent conduct or agreement as to what he will do with the proceeds of such a certificate when they shall come into his possession, subject only to the contingency of their so coming, is hardly to be denied. His prospective obligation becomes binding only when his contingent interest has become absolute. He has at first only a prospective right, which may never come into existence, but it is a right growing out of a presently existing subject-matter, and 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

expectancy which, if there is no change in the present state of affairs and if nothing intervenes to destroy rights which have been stipulated for, is likely in the natural order of events to ripen into a reality,—a vested right which will then be capable of enforcement. The right of the beneficiary during the lifetime of the insured member closely resembles the expectation of a farmer to raise a crop which he intends to plant upon his land and which he pledges to obtain the seed therefor; or the expectation of an owner of domestic animals that they will yield a natural increase, about which he may make contracts in advance; or of a dairyman that his cows will yield milk, so that he may properly bargain for the disposing of the butter and cheese which he hopes to make therefrom. Low v. Pew, 108 Mass. 347, 350, 11 Am. Rep. 357. And see the cases collected in 35 Cyc. 45, 46. It is enough that there is a present interest in the thing from which the expected article or right is to be directly produced. And even if the actual property does not pass in the future product or result of that which has a present existence, an agreement touching that future product or result may yet have validity and afterwards be capable of enforcement, as was held in the cases cited on pages 695, 696, of this opinion.

The beneficiary cannot indeed make a valid assignment of his expectant interest to one not within the limited classes; but as soon as his right has vested and become absolute, it is his property and he may dispose of it at his will. We see no reason why he may not in advance bind himself, at any rate, by the creation of a trust, to make such a disposition as we have here.

What has been said disposes also of the objection that this is an illegal result, an evasion of the statute. It has been found that the parties had no intention to evade the statutes of the commonwealth or the "laws" of the defendant order. Nor does the accomplishment of their purpose have that effect. The payment of the benefit to the beneficiary is not to be interfered with. The property in that benefit, as between the order and the beneficiary, vests absolutely in the latter. The order is not concerned with the disposition which he may make of it. But it would be grossly inequitable to allow him to set up the legal title which he has acquired, as a means of evading the execution of the trust which he has assumed and by means of which he obtained both his expectant right and his absolute title.

The decree appealed from must be modified by providing that upon the surrender of the certificate the defendant order shall pay the amount thereof to the defendant John W. Crane, and that he shall forthwith pay the same to the plaintiff. The plaintiff should have also costs against the last-named defendant.

v.

ETTA M. FENN, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(84 Vt. 117, 78 Atl. 713.)

Surety — judgment against principal — binding effect.

A judgment against a man in a bankruptcy proceeding to which his wife is not a party is not admissible in evidence in a proceeding by the judgment creditor to enforce a mortgage which she had given as surety for him, where the judgment against him was not a prerequisite to her liability, and her contract does not bind her to abide a judgment against him.

I. Introduction.

The decisions seem to be in great conflict as to the evidential value of a judgment against the principal in an action against his surety. It is not always possible to tell what the language of the obligation involved in the particular suit is, and without this, it cannot be said how far two cases may be out of harmony. The wording of the instrument is everything in this class of cases. There is nothing to prevent a surety APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Rutland County in plaintiffs' favor in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage on certain premises given by defendant as surety for her husband. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles L. Howe, for appellant:

The doctrine of res judicata does not apply against strangers to the proceeding.

Nason v. Blaisdell, 12 Vt. 165, 36 Am. Dec. 331; Knapp v. Marlboro, 31 Vt. 674; Gerrish v. Bragg, 55 Vt. 329.

The liability on a contract of surety cannot be extended by implication beyond the fair scope of its terms, and the contract must be construed strictissimi juris.

State v. Mann, 34 Vt. 371, 80 Am. Dec. 688; Ferrisburg v. Martin, 60 Vt. 330, 14 Atl. 88; Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat. 680, 6 L. ed. 189.

It does not appear that defendant agreed to be bound by any judgment or decree rendered against her husband.

McConnell v. Poor, 113 Iowa, 133, 52 L.R.A. 312, 84 N. W. 968; Chamberlain v. Godfrey, 36 Vt. 380, 84 Am. Dec. 690.

from contracting to be bound by a judgment against his principal, if he choose, and if that is the fair import of his agreement, he will be concluded by such a judgment. It is simply a case of what the surety has said he will do. In an ordinary contract of indemnity, the surety is brought in by notice. It is usually held in such cases that if he is seasonably notified of the original suit and given an opportunity to defend, he will be concluded by the judgment against his principal. Without notice, the judgment is reduced to prima facie evidence of the indemnitor's liability.

The broad general rule is that a judgment is no evidence against a stranger to it. Lucas v. The Governor, 6 Ala. 826; McClure v. Colclough, 5 Ala. 65.

Or, as often stated, that no one is bound by a judgment or decree but parties and privies. Bryant v. Owen, 1 Ga. 355.

And the mere fact that several persons are jointly, or jointly and severally, bound by the same instrument, does not create an exception. McClure v. Colclough, supra.

It is a general principle that no one can be held for a breach of his own obligation without opportunity to be heard in defense. Graves v. Bulkley, 25 Kan. 249, 37 Am. Rep. 249.

The general rule is that verdicts and judgments bind conclusively parties and privies, because privies in blood, in estate, and in law, claim under the person against whom the judgment is rendered, and they, claiming his rights, are, of course, bound as he is. But, as to all others, they are not conclusively binding, because it is unjust to bind a person by any proceeding in which he had no opportunity to make a defense, of offering evidence, of cross-examining witnesses,

It would be unjust to compel her to be bound by a judgment obtained in a proceeding in which she had neither the right nor the opportunity to be heard.

Lipscomb v. Postell, 38 Miss. 476, 77 Am. Dec. 651; Chamberlain v. Godfrey, 36 Vt. 380, 84 Am. Dec. 690; Gerrish v. Bragg, 55 Vt. 329; McConnell v. Poor, 113 Iowa, 133, 52 L.R.A. 312, 84 N. W. 968; Ferrisburg v. Martin, 60 Vt. 330, 14 Atl. 88.

Messrs. Lawrence, Lawrence, & Stafford and T. W. Moloney, for appellees:

The surety was bound by the judgment. Lindsey v. Danville, 46 Vt. 144; Tute v. James, 50 Vt. 124; Chamberlain v. Godfrey, 36 Vt. 380, 84 Am. Dec. 690; Bradley v. Chamberlin, 35 Vt. 277; Tracy v. Goodwin, 5 Allen, 409; Dennie v. Smith, 129 Mass.

or of appealing if he was dissatisfied with the judgment. Munford v. Nottoway, 2 Rand. (Va.) 313.

The doctrine is thus stated in the opinion given by the judges in the Duchess of Kingston's Case, 20 How. St. Tr. 538: "What has been said at the bar is certainly true as a general principle, that a transaction between two parties in judicial proceedings ought not to be binding upon a third, for it would be unjust to bind any person who could not be admitted to make a defense, or to examine witnesses, or to appeal from a judgment he might think erroneous; and therefore the depositions of witnesses in another cause in proof of a fact, the verdict of a jury finding the fact, and the judgment of the court upon facts found, although evidence against the parties and all claiming under them, are not in general to be used to the prejudice of strangers."

The rule of law that none shall be bound by a judgment but parties and privies is said to be founded in justice; that it would be most unjust—contrary to all ideas of the administration of justice in civilized countries—to hold that a judgment should be binding upon one who, neither by himself nor by one representing him and identified in interest with him, has had an opportunity to appear in court and make defense. Chamberlain v. Godfrey, 36 Vt. 380, 84 Am. Dec. 690.

In a North Carolina case it is said that the general rule laid down by all the writers on the law of evidence is that it would be unjust to bind a third person by a judicial proceeding between two, in which he could not be admitted to make a defense, or to examine witnesses, or to appeal from a judgment which he might think erroneous. A verdict or judgment, however, in a former action, upon the same matter directly in question, is also evidence for and against privies in blood, privies in estate, or privies in law, because their rights are derived under the person against whom the judgment is recovered, and must consequently be bound as his were. M'Kellar v. Bowell, 11 N. C. (4 Hawks) 34.

Powers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition in behalf of a New York corporation to foreclose a mortgage on certain premises in Rutland given by a wife as surety for her husband, the latter joining in the conveyance. The husband, Frederick Fenn, was subsequently adjudged a bankrupt, and the petitioner presented its claim against him in the court of bankruptcy, and, without fraud or collusion, there obtained a judgment for a certain sum against Fenn. The only question here respecting the same cause of action, and between the same parties, is also said to rest upon the just and expedient axiom that it is for the interest of the community that a limit should be imposed to the continuance of litigation, and that the same cause of action should not be brought twice to a final determination. Robbins v. Chicago, 4 Wall. 658, 18 L. ed. 429.

By the rule of the civil law, a judgment against the principal, whilst in force, is conclusive against his sureties. But this is because the sureties are permitted to controvert the judgment against the principal, even if it be a judgment of a court of final resort. Munford v. Nottoway, supra.

The civil law regarded the relation of principal and surety as creating such a privity of interest as made the surety responsible for whatever bound the principal; but the security was allowed to contest the liability of the principal in any action against the latter, and to appeal from the judgment if it was unfavorable. State use of Griffith v. Holt, 27 Mo. 340, 72 Am. Dec. 273.

Under the civil law, the surety was permitted to defend, and even allowed to prosecute an appeal from the judgment against the principal, though not a party to the judgment. As he was given his day in court, there appears no serious objection to binding him by the litigation. Much of the confusion in the decisions seems to have resulted from the attempt to apply the rule of the civil law, binding the surety by the litigation against the principal, without allowing the former the participation there accorded. McConnell v. Poor, 113 Iowa, 133, 52 L.R.A. 312, 84 N. W. 968.

It was a rule of the civil law that, the obligation of the surety being dependent upon that of the principal debtor, the surety was to be regarded as the same party with the principal, with respect to whatever was decided for or against him. Therefore, if the demand against the principal had been dismissed, the surety might, in case he was afterwards proceeded against, oppose the exception, sic judicata, to the creditor. The creditor could not, in this case, reply that involved is the amount due in equity under the mortgage; and as the case is presented, this depends upon the admissibility and effect of the judgment of the court of bankruptcy as against Mrs. Fenn, who was not a party to it. When a certified copy of this judgment was offered in evidence at the hearing before the master, the defendant, Etta Fenn, objected on the ground that it was neither conclusive nor admissible against her, since she was in no sense a party to it. Subject to her exception it was admitted and held to be conclusive of the amount due from Fenn, not only against him, but against Mrs. Fenn as well, and evidence offered by her tending to show that the sum due was less than that found by the court of bankruptcy was rejected.

it was res inter alios judicata, for, as it was the office of a surety that his obligation should depend on that of his principal, the surety could not owe more than the principal, and he might oppose all the exceptions in rem which could be opposed by the principal; it followed that whatever had been decided in favor of the principal must be taken to have been decided in favor of the surety, who ought in this respect to be considered the same party. And on the other hand, if the judgment was against the principal, the creditor might oppose it to the surety, and demand that it be carried into execution against him. But the reason for these rules, as explained by Pothier, was "that the surety is allowed to appeal against the judgment, or to form an opposition to it, if it is in the last resort." M'Kellar v. Bowell, supra.

The general rule of the common law is undoubtedly otherwise. A judgment by the common law binds only parties and privies,—privies in blood, in estate, or in law; and as a security has no opportunity of contesting the propriety of a judgment against his principal, nor of appealing from it after it is rendered, he is not in general bound by it. State use of Griffith v. Holt, supra.

The general meaning of privies includes those who claim under, or in the right of, parties. It has been held that there is no such privy between a surety and his principal as will take him out of the general rule. Bryant v. Owen, 1 Ga. 355.

In Calhoun v. Gray, 150 Mo. App. 591, 131 S. W. 478, it was said that in cases where the sureties are not parties to the record or given an opportunity to defend by appropriate notice, a judgment establishing the obligation against the principal is not conclusive on the doctrine of privity alone, and, if it is conclusive at all against the sureties, it is because of the form the obligation has taken, and not from the principles of law which obtain.

The books and daily practice afford many instances where sureties are concluded by judgments against their principals, though not parties to the action; as, for instance, in the case of replevin and supersedeas 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Stated abstractly, the question is: Is a judgment against a principal admissible in a suit against his surety, and, if so, what is its effect?

Though it would be difficult to find in the books a question on which the cases are in more hopeless conflict,—some holding that such judgment is inter alios and inadmissible, some that it is prima facie evidence of the sum due from the surety, and still others that it is conclusive evidence of the sum so due,—we think there is enough to be found in our own cases to furnish a safe guide for the determination of the question. In Bramble v. Poultney, 11 Vt. 208, it was held that a judgment against a constable in a suit of which the town had no notice bonds. Whether, in the absence of some provision by statute, the surety is thus concluded, depends upon the terms and conditions of his undertaking. If his covenant is that his principal will comply with the judgment, then he is concluded by that judgment as to all matters determined thereby, though not a party to the action. Shenandoah Nat. Bank v. Read, 86 Iowa, 136, 53 N. W. 96.

The holding that the sureties on a guardian's bond are concluded by the judgment against their principal is based upon the peculiar obligation of the bond itself, the sureties' undertaking being that their principal shall discharge all his official duties, and one of the duties is to pay over to the persons entitled the amount found by the court to be due. See infra, III. c.

The general rule that judgments shall bind only parties and privies admits of this exception, that one may agree to stand in the place of another, and to be so fully answerable for his debt or unlawful act, as that a judgment against the latter shall conclude the former as to the amount of such debt or damage. Levick v. Norton, 51 Conn. 461.

But what are sometimes called exceptions to the general rule are really not exceptions, and do not fall within the rule at all, depending, solely, upon the principle that one may contract to be answerable to another person upon such lawful conditions as he pleases. Pioneer Sav. & L. Co. v. Bartsch, 51 Minn. 474, 38 Am. St. Rep. 511, 53 N. W. 764.

In every case the important question is: What are the terms of the surety's contract? What has he undertaken to indemnify his covenantee against? On what contingency has he agreed that his liability shall be fixed? Ibid.

One way of stating the rule is that a recovery against the principal cannot be used as evidence to charge the surety, unless his contract binds him to the result of legal proceedings against his principal. Arrington v. Porter, 47 Ala. 714.

A surety is not bound by a judgment against his principal if the surety is not was not conclusive evidence against the town. The question whether or not it was prima facie evidence was left undecided. It was pointed out in that case that a suit against the constable was not necessary to a suit against the town, and that therein the case differed from one in which it was sought to charge the sureties of a sheriff and high bailiff,—in which (it was said) a judgment must first be obtained against the officer, and then be affirmed against the bondsmen. Accordingly it was held in Bradley v. Chamberlin, 35 Vt. 277, though the statute somewhat influenced the decision, and in Tute v. James, 50 Vt. 124, that a judgment against a sheriff was conclusive against his bondsmen, and in Chamberlain v. Godfrey, 36 Vt. 380, 84 Am. Dec.

a party thereto, unless he has so contracted. Thomson v. McGregor, 9 Abb. N. C. 138.

A judgment against the principal is entitled to no consideration as against the surety, unless by the terms of the contract the surety is to be bound thereby. McConnell v. Poor, supra.

The true rule is that a recovery against the principal cannot be used as evidence to charge the surety, except in cases where the contract of the surety can be construed into an undertaking to be bound by the result of legal proceedings against the principal; and when the judgment is binding on the sureties at all, it is conclusive, and not merely prima facie evidence. Firemen's Ins. Co. v. McMillan, 29 Ala. 147.

The rule has been said to be that the judgment against the principal is only prima facie evidence of liability against the surety, unless the condition of the bond makes it otherwise. Price v. Carlton, 121 Ga. 12, 68 L.R.A. 736, 48 S. E. 721.

In an Iowa case it is said that there is no little confusion in the language of the courts on this subject, and entire harmony does not prevail in the decisions. This has resulted sometimes in treating such a judgment as res judicata in an action against the surety, rather than passing on the character of the contract, and simply holding him to its performance. It is a fundamental principal in jurisprudence that every man shall have his day in court, and shall be heard in his own defense, and of this right he may not, under the laws and Constitution of this state, be deprived. For this reason judgment against the principal may never foreclose investigation of the surety's liability, unless, by virtue of the latter's undertaking, he has obligated himself directly or by implication to be bound thereby. Where, by the terms of the bond, the surety is to be bound by the litigation to which he is not a party, the courts decide, not that the judgment is an adjudication because of the connection, but that he must perform the contract as it written. McConnell v. Poor, 113 Iowa, 133, 52 L.R.A. 312, 84 N. W. 968.

In Pioneer Sav. & L. Co. v. Bartsch, supra, it is said if a surety stipulates for any par-

690, that a judgment against a sheriff was conclusive against the sureties of his deputy. Judge Redfield, in Fletcher v. Jackson, 23 Vt. 581, 56 Am. Dec. 98, divides these cases into two classes, saying: "The general rule undoubtedly is that in a collateral undertaking by way of guaranty, where a suit [against the principal] is necessary to fix the liability of the guarantor, the first judgment is prima facie evidence of the default. But, where the guarantor is liable without suit against the principal, the judgment against him is regarded as strictly matter inter alios. . . . Where the suit may, in the first instance, be brought directly against the guarantor, the judgment against the principal without notice to the guarantor is not evidence; and particular method by which the liability of his principal or of himself shall be fixed, he is bound by it. If he has undertaken, either expressly or by implication, from the position which he has assumed with reference to pending litigation, to be responsible for the result of a suit between others, to which he is not a party, and to which he has not been made privy by notice and an opportunity to defend, then, in the absence of fraud or collusion, the judgment against the principal alone would be conclusive evidence against him of every fact which it was necessary to find to recover such a judgment. This would be because he had so contracted. In the absence of such agreement, express or implied, it would be as to him res acta inter alios, and evidence of nothing except of the fact of its recovery. There would seem to be no middle ground, and it is consequently very difficult to sustain on principle the numerous class of cases which hold certain judgments against the principal prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence that the facts in pais against which the sureties agreed to indemnify were established in the suit.

If a person enters into a contract of indemnity whereby he agrees to become responsible for the result of a litigation, or if, by operation of law, such a responsibility is cast upon him without any agreement, he will, in the absence of fraud or collusion, be conclusively bound by the judgment rendered, whether he had notice of the action in which it was entered or not. The law has been held to be thus: (1) Where the covenantor expressly makes his liability depend on the event of a litigation to which he is not a party, and stipulates to abide the result; and (2) where the covenant is one of general indemnity merely against claims or suits. In cases of the first class, the judgment is conclusive evidence against the indemnitor, although he was not a party and had no notice, for its recovery is the event against which he covenants. In those of the second class, the judgment is prima facie evidence only against the indemnitor, and he may be let in to show that the principal had a good defense to the so, too, if the guarantor have notice of suit against the principal, he is not obliged to concern himself in its defense, but may await a suit against himself, and then insist upon the right to contest the whole ground. The cases of joint and several obligors, and especially of sureties and co-sureties, as a general rule, we apprehend, have been ranked under the latter class of cases." It may be true, as suggested by Judge Redfield, that this proposition was not strictly necessary to a decision of the case then in hand, and so not entitled to be regarded as an authority; but the point was argued by counsel, and the case seems to be regarded outside the state as an authority on the question, for it is very generally so cited. Judge Aldis, too, in Chamberlain v. Godfrey, supra, divides these cases into two classes, saying, in effect, that when a surety, either expressly or by reasonable implication from the nature and intent of his obligation, stipulates to pay the damages and costs which may be recovered against his principal, or otherwise to abide the judgment or decree against the principal, he is bound by the judgment, though he has no notice of the suit. But when a surety merely becomes holden for the payment of money,—as, for instance, a surety on a promissory note,—or the performance of some act on the part of the principal, he is not bound by the judgment.

It is apparent from the foregoing that, in this state at least, these contracts are classified, and that a different rule applies to one class than to the other. Nor do we think that there is any conflict or inconsistency in the two forms of stating the rule. On the other hand, we think they are fundamentally and practically the same thing. It is plain enough that the case in hand falls into that class in which a judgment against the principal is not admissible at all, either to establish liability or the amount of it; for a judgment against Fenn was not a prerequisite to a right of action against his wife, if we are to apply the rule as stated by Judge Redfield; nor is there anything in the contract or in its nature or object which expressly or by implication binds the wife to abide the judgment against her husband, if we are to apply the rule as stated by Judge Aldis. It follows that the certified copy was improperly admitted, and that the offered evidence (if otherwise admissible) was improperly excluded.

claim. State use of Beard v. Abbott, 63 W. Va. 189, 61 S. E. 369. For note on "How far indemnitors are bound by judgments against their principals," see Robinson v. Baskins, 22 Am. St. Rep. 204.

When it clearly appears from the obligation itself that the sureties undertook to pay a particular judgment, or to do something else dependent upon the result of specific litigation then pending, as to pay the costs which may be adjudged therein or to answer for the conduct of a party in respect of a charge which the law lays upon him, the judgment in such litigation against the principal in the undertaking, in the absence of fraud or collusion, is accepted as conclusive upon the sureties, for such, indeed, is the measure of their obligation. The rule in such cases rests not upon the principles of law which obtain between principal and surety, but instead it rests upon the fair construction which the courts place upon the obligation assumed by the parties. Calhoun v. Gray, 150 Mo. App. 591, 131 S. W. 478.

There can be no doubt that where a surety undertakes for the principal that the principal shall do a specific act, to be ascertained in a given way, as that he will pay a judgment, the judgment is conclusive against the surety; for the obligation is express that the principal will do this thing, and the judgment is conclusive of the fact and extent of the obligation. As the surety in such cases stipulates without regard to notice to him of the proceedings 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

to obtain the judgment, his liability is, of course, independent of any such fact. Pico v. Webster, 14 Cal. 202, 73 Am. Dec. 647.

There is a marked distinction between covenants which stipulate against the consequences of a suit, and those which contain no such undertaking. In the latter class, the judgment is res inter alios acta, and proves nothing except rem ipsam against the indemnitor, unless he had notice and an opportunity to defend. Bridgeport F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 34 N. Y. 275.

Whenever the surety has contracted in reference to the conduct of his principal in a suit or a proceeding in the courts, he is concluded by the judgment, in the absence of fraud or collusion between the prosecuting parties and him for whom he is bound. Kennedy v. Brown, 21 Kan. 171.

Where the sureties, by the express terms of their agreement, or by reasonable implication from the very nature and intent of their obligation, have stipulated to pay the damages and costs which may be recovered against their principal, or otherwise to abide the decree or judgment of a court against the principal, there they are bound by the judgment though they have no notice of the suit. This results from their agreement. Chamberlain v. Godfrey, 36 Vt. 380, 84 Am. Dec. 690.

When it appears from the terms of the obligation that the surety has contracted to become bound by a judgment that has been or may be rendered in an action against his principal, it is conclusive against him, although he was not a party to the suit in which the judgment was obtained; but in an undertaking general in character, the judgment obtained against the principal therein creates only a prima facie liability against the surety, who was not made a party or given an opportunity to defend the suit in which the judgment was obtained. Browne v. French, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 445, 22 S. W. 581.

A judgment against a principal does not bind the surety conclusively, as a general rule, but it is prima facie evidence of liability and its extent. If, however, the instrument binds its makers to abide the result of certain litigation, or to satisfy any judgment therein, or to indemnify against it, a judgment against the principal is conclusive upon the sureties, so that they cannot contest the liability, in the absence of fraud or collusion. State v. Nutter, 44 W. Va. 385, 30 S. E. 67.

Where the effect of the undertaking of a surety is that he shall be liable for the result of a suit against his principal, he is conclusively bound by the judgment in such suit, even though he be not a party to it, and have no notice of it. Point Pleasant v. Greenlee, 63 W. Va. 207, 129 Am. St. Rep. 871, 60 S. E. 301.

Where the bond is an official bond, and not for the performance of a specific act, but for faithful conduct, the courts are in great conflict over the question whether the judgment against the principal is conclusive against the sureties. A few courts hold that the judgment against the principal is conclusive against the sureties. Others hold that the judgment against the principal is prima facie evidence against the sureties, and still others that the judgment against the principal is inadmissible against the sureties, and that to hold the sureties for misfeasance of the principal, the facts of the misfeasance must be proved in an action in which the sureties are defendants.

In the case of most official bonds, the sureties do not assume to pay any judgment rendered against the principal, hence a judgment against the official on such a bond is not conclusive upon the sureties where the latter had no notice of the suit. Pasewalk v. Bollman, 29 Neb. 519, 26 Am. St. Rep. 399, 45 N. W. 780.

The only grounds on which sureties on official bonds generally may be regarded as bound by the judgments against their principals is that the sureties, by the terms of their bond, agree, expressly or impliedly, to abide the result of litigation against their principals. McConnell v. Poor, 113 Iowa, 133, 52 L.R.A. 312, 84 N. W. 968.

In a California case it is said: "In the case of official bonds, the sureties undertake, in general terms, that the principal will perform his official duties. They do not agree to be absolutely bound by any judgment obtained against him for official misconduct, nor to pay every such judgment. They are only held for a breach of their own obligations. It is a general principle that no party can be so held without 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) an opportunity to be heard in defense. This right is not defeated by the fact that another party has defended on the same cause of action and been unsuccessful. As the sureties did not stipulate that they would abide by the judgment against the principal, or permit him to conduct the defense, and be themselves responsible for the result of it, the fact that the principal has unsuccessfully defended has no effect on their rights. They have a right to contest with the plaintiff the question of their liability; for, to hold that they are concluded from this contestation by the suit against the sheriff is to hold that they undertook for him that they would be responsible for any judgment against him which might be rendered by accident, negligence, or error, instead of merely stipulating that they would be responsible for his official conduct. Pico v. Webster, supra.

In Graves v. Bulkley, 25 Kan. 249, 37 Am. Rep. 249, it is said: "To our mind, the better opinion, however, is that, except in cases where, upon the fair construction of the contract, the surety may be held to have undertaken to be responsible for the result of a suit, . . . or when he is made privy to the suit by notice, and the opportunity is given him to defend it, a judgment against the principal is not conclusive against the surety. This is especially true in the case of official bonds, where the sureties undertake in general terms, as in the bond set forth in the petition, that the principal will perform his official duties, pay over the moneys that may come to his hands, and deliver to his successor the writs, books, and papers of his office. They do not agree to be absolutely bound by any order or judgment against him for official misconduct or neglect, nor to pay every such judgment."

The reasons for holding that a judgment against a principal is prima facie evidence against his sureties in an action on an official bond are: First. Because the judgment in the action against the principal, when in his favor, is a complete bar to the action against the sureties, and in any case fixes an absolute limit to the damages which can be recovered against them. It should be mutual, so far, at least, that when the judgment is against the principal, it should be presumptive evidence against the sureties. Second. The nature of the contract in official bonds is that of a bond of indemnity to those who may suffer damages by reason of the neglect, fraud, or misconduct of the officer. The bond is made with the full knowledge and understanding that in many cases such damages must be ascertained and liquidated by an action against the officer for whose acts the sureties make themselves liable; and the fair construction of the contract of the sureties is that they will pay all damages so ascertained and liquidated in an action against their principal. Stenhens v. Shafer, 48 Wis. 54, 33 Am. Rep. 793, 3 N. W. 835.

In many of the cases, judgments against the principal are said to be prima facie evidence against the surety. This, of course, gives the surety an opportunity to interpose any defense he may see fit in the action against him.

The general rule is that a judgment against a principal, instead of being conclusive, is only prima facie evidence against the surety, to show the breach of the contract and liability thereunder. Calhoun v. Gray, 150 Mo. App. 591, 131 S. W. 478.

Although a judgment against the principal does not conclude the sureties, it is evidence against them until its effect is impugned. Whitehead v. Woolfolk, 3 La. Ann. 42.

But this doctrine has been criticized. It has been said that there is no middle ground, and that the surety is either a party or privy, and bound by the judgment; or a stranger, and not bound. Firemen's Ins. Co. v. McMillan, 29 Ala. 147.

When the judgment is binding on the surety at all, it is conclusive. He is either a party or privy, or a stranger. Arrington v. Porter, 47 Ala. 714.

It would seem, however, that the advantage that would be gained by a rule making judgments against the principal prima facie evidence against the surety, over a rule declaring such judgments to be no evidence at all against the surety, would be very slight in any case in which the surety had a bona fide defense.

Where the surety has not contracted to become responsible for the result of the suit, and where he is not made privy to the suit by notice, and an opportunity given him to defend, the judgment against the principal alone is, as a general rule, evidence of the fact of its recovery only, and not of any fact which it was necessary to find in order to recover judgment. De Greiff v. Wilson, 30 N. J. Eq. 435.

II. Scope.

This note is intended to cover cases on the evidentiary value of judgments against the principal not only in actions based on simple contracts of suretyship, but also in suits growing out of ordinary indemnity obligations. Cases on indemnity insurance or reinsurance, however, are not included. Cases of the effect of judgments in favor of principals are also excluded, as well as cases involving the rights of sureties in actions for contribution and in actions on promissory notes, although a number of commercial paper cases are referred to for illustrative purposes. Only such settlements of executors, administrators, or guardians' accounts as have the force of judgments are considered.

III. Official bonds.

a. Of sheriffs and constables.

In considering whether a judgment against the principal is conclusive against his surety in an action on an official bond, the question to be determined, as already 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

pointed out, is whether the sureties by the language of the instrument have agreed to be so bound. If they contract merely to answer for the good conduct of the principal, and for the faithful performance of his duty, the better opinion is that a judgment against the latter is not conclusive as to the liability of the surety; but that if it is one of the duties of the principal to obey the orders and judgments of the court, a judgment against him will bind the sureties.

It has been held that where the wrongful conversion and acts by the principal as sheriff has been determined by a court of competent jurisdiction, the plaintiff cannot recover against the sureties a larger amount than that adjudicated against the principal, nor can the sureties go behind such judgment and relitigate a question already determined. Charles v. Haskins, 14 Iowa, 471, 83 Am. Dec. 378. The court said: "The principle governing is that the liability of the surety is dependent upon that of the principal. Though not a party, the surety is not a stranger to the judgment. He covenants that his principal shall discharge certain official duties. When it is once fairly determined by a competent judicial tribunal that there has been a breach of the official undertaking, the liability of the surety prima facie attaches, whether he was a party to the action adjudging the breach or not. In an action against him, the surety may show fraud or collusion in obtaining the judgment against the principal, or he may show a mistake in the amount, or that it has been paid. . . . And as the surety could claim the benefit of a judgment in favor of his principal, so he is concluded, as above explained, by a judgment against him."

But in McConnell v. Poor, 113 Iowa, 133, 52 L.R.A. 312, 84 N. W. 968, it is said that the fallacy in the reasoning in the last-mentioned case, as well as Lowell v. Parker, infra, on which it was based, lies in supposing that, because the surety may claim the benefit of a judgment in favor of his principal, it follows that he is concluded by one against him. But the surety is discharged by a finding for his principal, not owing to the creditor being estopped, but for the reason that it establishes the absence of liability of the principal; and, if he is not liable, the surety cannot be, as his obligation is merely incidental to that of the principal. Besides, the discharge of the principal does not always release the surety. If the former be an infant when executing an instrument, and is discharged on that ground, the surety may yet be held.

The judgment in an original action against a sheriff is conclusive on the sureties in an action on the bond. Pico v. Webster, 14 Cal. 202, 73 Am. Dec. 647.

In the absence of fraud, a judgment against a constable for wrongful attachment settles conclusively against his sureties, as well as himself, not only the right of the plaintiff to recover against him, but the amount of the damages. Tracy v. Goodwin, 5 Allen, 409.

A judgment against a constable for conversion of attached property is conclusive against his sureties in an action on the bond conditioned that the officer should fully perform all duties of a constable in the service of all civil processes which might be committed to him. Dennie v. Smith, 129 Mass. 143.

In an action against sureties on a sheriff's bond, to recover moneys paid to the sheriff through a deputy, on a writ of fieri facias, a judgment upon proceedings by scire facias against sureties on the writ of error bond, in a cause in which it was held that payment to the deputy was pro tanto a discharge of the judgment, was held conclusive, notice having been given to the sheriff's sureties. McBroom v. The Governor, 4 Port. (Ala.) 90.

The sureties on a sheriff's bond, against whom a summary judgment upon motion for failure to return an execution has been rendered, under a statute authorizing judgment to be rendered against sureties without notice when the principal is notified, cannot in equity controvert the conclusiveness of such judgment, the statute appearing to indicate a legislative intention that the litigation in that class of cases should be confined to the plaintiff in execution and the sheriff. McClure v. Colclough, 5 Ala. 65.

Where the owner recovers judgment against the officer because of the wrongful seizure of property, for the value of the property seized, the judgment is conclusive against the sureties on the official bond in an action on the bond, as to the ownership of the property at the time of its seizure, and the amount of the damages and costs sustained by the owner by reason thereof, in the absence of a showing that the court was without jurisdiction, or that the judgment was procured by fraud or collusion. Thomas v. Markmann, 43 Neb. 823, 62 N. W. 206. To the same effect, Lewis v. Mills, 47 Neb. 910, 66 N. W. 817. But these cases were overruled in Barker v. Wheeler, 60 Neb. 470, 83 Am. St. Rep. 541, 83 N. W. 678. See infra, III. f.

A judgment against a sheriff for failure to pay over money received on execution is conclusive against the sureties on his recognizance, and dispenses with any evidence of request before suit, necessary by the condition of the recognizance. McMicken v. Com. 58 Pa. 213.

In an action by a sheriff against his deputy on his official bond for indemnity against the liability for not returning an execution, it is sufficient to introduce the proceedings against the sheriff from the files and minutes of the court, without showing their regularity. Hall v. Luther, 13 Wend. 491.

A judgment against a constable for an official default conclusively establishes that fact in a proceeding against his bail. Eagles v. Kern, 5 Whart. 144.

A judgment against a constable for default in executing process prevents the sureties on his official bond from setting up the defense that the constable had been removed within twenty days from the receipt of the writ, and hence, not having the time allowed by law for executing it, was thereby discharged. Musselman v. Com. 7 Pa. 240.

A judgment against a constable is conclusive against his sureties as to his misconduct and the extent of the damage sustained by the plaintiff. Masser v. Strickland, 17 Serg. & R. 354, 17 Am. Dec. 668.

Where there was a judgment against the estate of a sheriff for moneys which he had collected on execution, but had failed to turn over, it was held that the sureties of the sheriff, although not parties to the proceeding, were concluded thereby as to all defenses which the sheriff's administrator might have interposed. The sureties cannot inquire whether the execution was seasonably delivered, whether it was returned, or whether the claim was barred by the statute of limitations. Tute v. James, 50 Vt. 124.

In an early Pennsylvania case, it was held that the sureties on the official bond of the sheriff cannot be concluded by the judgment against the sheriff in an action of trover for wrongful seizure of goods, on the theory that, inasmuch as the sheriff is bound by the judgment, in a joint action against the sheriff and the sureties on the bond, the sureties must be likewise bound. Carmack v. Com. 5 Binn. 184. The court said: "This is a very subtle attempt to cut off the securities from all possibility of being heard; but it is too unreasonable to be sanctioned by the law. It is much more just to say that, the plaintiffs having thought proper to join the sheriff in this action with other persons not parties to the action of trover, they have thereby relinquished the estoppel against the sheriff, because that estoppel cannot be insisted on without injustice to the other defendants."

But in Masser v. Strickland, supra, Huston, J., in referring to official bonds of constables, said: "These official bonds are always joint and several. If the officer is sued first, and a judgment obtained against him, and on failure of obtaining satisfaction, suits are brought against the sureties, I apprehend judgment could not be obtained for a larger sum against them than had been recovered against the officer. The verdict and judgment against him might be used by them to limit the extent of the plaintiff's claim; if it could not, the case of sureties would be alarming. The plaintiff's demand, as shown by his execution, may be large. The sheriff alone can show how much of the defendant's goods he found; whether those goods were in whole or in part subject to claims for rent, or to prior levies on other executions in the hands of the same or a different officer. If any money were paid the plaintiff, this, and the evidence of it, must be peculiarly within the knowledge of the sheriff. A judgment against him for a small sum must then protect his sureties from paying a much larger, and if the judgment is evidence to protect them, it must be evidence against them; not conclusive in all respects for they may plead non est factum to the bond, a release, the statute of limitations, etc., but conclusive either for or against them of the fact that the officer has not performed his duty, and of the damage for which he and his bail are liable." It was said that the opinion in the Carmack Case could be left for consideration when a case on a sheriff's bond accrues.

In following the Masser Case the court in Evans v. Com. 8 Watts, 398, 34 Am. Dec. 477, said: "Seeing then that it has become the settled rule of the law in regard to the sureties in a constable's bond, that a judgment obtained in a suit brought against the constable alone, for official misconduct or neglect of duty, will bind and be conclusive upon them, though not notified of the suit, they must be presumed to have known that such was the law, when they entered into the bond; and it must therefore be taken as a part of their obligation or agreement, that they were willing to be so bound and concluded, as often as judgment should be so obtained against their principal; and hence those who have become sureties for constables since the establishment of the rule in this respect can have no reason to complain of."

Under a statute providing that the party claiming to have been injured by the official misconduct of the sheriff shall first, and before resorting to the recognizance, establish his claim by obtaining a judgment against the sheriff for his damages resulting from such misconduct, and show a failure to collect the same of him; and that, on the return of the writ of scire facias, the court, unless satisfactory cause be shown to the contrary, shall render judgment against such sheriff and his sureties in favor of the creditor, for the amount of such judgment and all charges, with interest and costs; and that in all cases where the original judgment against the sheriff was rendered by default, and scire facias brought, as before provided, the sureties may make any defense, and take any advantage in the scire facias, which the principal might by law have made or taken in the original action.—it was held that it was the intention of the legislature that the judgment against the sheriff should be conclusive of the claimant's right to a judgment against the sheriff and his sureties, in the scire facias, as against all defenses that the sheriff might have urged in defense of the suit against him alone. Bradley v. Cham-berlin, 35 Vt, 277.

On the other hand, it has been held that a judgment against a sheriff is not conclusive against the sureties on his official bond. Munford v. Nottoway, 2 Rand. (Va.) 313. Green, J., in his opinion, said that the creditor cannot complain of the burden of proving his case repeatedly in different suits against the principal and his sureties, for generally he can, if he will, convene them all in one suit and so avoid that inconvenience.

A surety on a sheriff's bond is not concluded by the judgment against the sheriff for failure to return an execution. The Governor v. Shelby, 2 Blackf. 26.

The order or judgment of amercement against a sheriff is not res judicata as to the sureties, so as to preclude the latter from setting up as a defense any matter that occurred previous to the entering of the judgment. Graves v. Bulkley, 25 Kan. 249, 37 Am. Rep. 249.

A judgment against a sheriff arising out of the breach of duty at a sale under a fi. fa. is not res judicata against his sureties, and does not conclude them as to the amount of the sheriff's liability for which they are to respond. Mullen v. Scott, 9 La. Ann. 173.

A surety on a constable's bond may impeach the judgment against his principal by showing that, by reason of want of legal service of a writ, the latter had no legal notice of the action, and that the court rendering the judgment thus had no jurisdiction of the case. Fall River v. Riley, 140 Mass. 488, 5 N. E. 481. The court said: "The surety on a bond, who may, by his contract, be responsible for the amount of such a judgment, is not a party to the original suit, nor privy thereto, and cannot, by the rules of law, review or reverse it. He may therefore impeach it in a suit against himself, and, without reversing it, show that it was invalid for want of jurisdiction over the defendant."

By some courts it is held that the judgment against the sheriff for acts constituting a breach of his official bond is only prima facie evidence against his sureties. Hursey v. Marty, 61 Minn. 430, 63 N. W. 1090.

The record of a suit against a sheriff for his default is prima facie evidence against his sureties, although they were not parties thereto. Carr v. Meade, 77 Va. 142.

A judgment against a sheriff is prima facie evidence against the sureties on his official bond conditioned for the faithful performance of his duty. This means that the sureties may interpose any defense that they may have, and be fully heard on the merits. Beauchaine v. McKinnon, 55 Minn. 318, 43 Am. St. Rep. 506, 56 N. W. 1065. The court admitted that the rule declaring judgments against principals on official bonds ineffectual as against sureties to be more easily sustained on principle. "In fact," said the court, "the prima facie doctrine has less to justify it than that which makes a judgment against the principal conclusive upon his sureties, except where there has been fraud and collusion. There is some difficulty in standing upon the middle ground of presumption."

A rule absolute against the sheriff is prima facie evidence only against his sureties. Taylor v. Johnson, 17 Ga. 521. But the court declared that it was somewhat difficult to perceive upon what principle the rule rests.

Upon an action on a sheriff's bond after a rule absolute against him, the sureties can set up any defense to the action which the sheriff could have urged to the rule. Watts v. Colquitt, 66 Ga. 492.

A judgment of amercement against a sheriff is not conclusive upon his sureties in a subsequent suit upon his official bond, but is prima facie evidence only. Fire Asso. of Philadelphia v. Ruby, 49 Neb. 584, 68 N. W. 939.

In rebutting the prima facie evidence against the sureties furnished by a judgment of amercement against a sheriff, the former are not limited to showing fraud, collusion, or mistake in the rendition of the judgment, but the original facts are open to inquiry. Fay v. Edmiston, 25 Kan. 439.

The record of a proceeding in amercement, while not competent against the sheriff's sureties to prove the default, is competent to prove the extent of the amercement itself. The Governor v. Montfort, 23 N. C. (1 Ired. L.) 155.

A sheriff's sureties in an action on the bond may show that a judgment of amercement was either fraudulently or improperly obtained against their principal. State ex rel. Parker v. Woodside, 29 N. C. (7 Ired. L.) 296.

In Crawford v. Word, 7 Ga. 445, a sheriff having failed to levy an execution, and a rule absolute having been granted against him for the amount of the plaintiff's debt in consequence of his neglect of duty, it was conceded that the rule against the sheriff was presumptive evidence only against the securities; and that they, when sought to be made chargeable therefor, might set up any defense which the sheriff himself could, in answer to the original rule which was taken against him.

A final statutory settlement with a sheriff should be at least prima facie evidence against the sureties, and a judgment against the sheriff for the amount due thereunder is some evidence against the sureties, and in the absence of countervailing testimony, the proceedings and judgment against the sheriff authorize a judgment against the sureties so far as the amount is concerned. Grayham v. County Ct. 9 Dana, 182.

A judgment against a constable for the wrongful taking and carrying away of property under color of office, if not obtained by fraud or collusion, is prima facie evidence against his sureties in an action on the bond. Lowell v. Parker, 10 Met. 309, 43 Am. Dec. 436.

In an action on a constable's bond, judgment against the officer for neglect to return an execution is prima facie evidence of the amount for which the surety is liable. Carpenter v. Doody, 1 Hilt. 465.

A judgment against a sheriff for conversion is only prima facie evidence against his sureties, which may be overcome by competent proof in an action against the sureties on the bond. Connor v. Corson, 13 S. D. 550, 83 N. W. 588.

The record of a recovery against a sheriff alone, for moneys received in his official capacity and converted, is admissible against his sureties without proof of notice of the pendency of the suit against him, and an opportunity to defend, and is prima facie evidence of the breach of the conditions of the bond. State ex rel. Coleman v. Cason, 11 S. C. 392.

A judgment against a sheriff for wrongful levy is prima facie evidence against his sureties, not parties to the action. People use of Norris v. Mersereau, 74 Mich. 687, 42 N. W. 153.

Other courts hold that a judgment against the sheriff is no evidence whatever against the sureties in an action on the official bond.

In an action on the official bond of a constable, a judgment against the officer for official misconduct, in an action to which the sureties are not parties, is not even prima facie evidence against them. The burden is upon the plaintiff to establish the facts constituting the misconduct in an action on the bond. Rodini v. Lytle, 17 Mont. 448, 52 L.R.A. 165, 43 Pac. 501. The court said: "If we hold that a judgment against the principal is conclusive or prima facie evidence against the sureties, the sureties are obliged to start in an action with a presumption of liability against them. The ordinary rule of law is that the plaintiff must prove his case by evidence; but, if a judgment against the principal is evidence against the sureties, the affirmative of the case is thrown upon the defendants. They must take the burden of proof. Instead of the plaintiff proving his case, the defendants are placed in a position of being obliged to prove their nonliability. In analogy to a criminal case, the defendants would be obliged to prove their own innocence. Defendants, in such a position, would be required to prove that their principal, the constable, had not been guilty of misconduct in his office. They would be obliged to prove that he had faithfully performed the duties of his office. It appears to us, however, that the proof should come from the other side; that the plaintiff should be required to prove against the sureties that the constable had not faithfully performed the duties of his office."

In Lucas v. The Governor, 6 Ala. 826, Goldthwaite, J., in referring to the decisions holding a judgment against a sheriff to be prima facie evidence against the sureties, said that it was impossible to perceive on what principle they rest. "Doubtless," said he, "there are cases where the acts or admissions of the sheriff have the effect to bind his sureties; but it will probably be ascertained, whenever these are necessary to be examined, that the acts and admissions are a part of, or immediately connected with, his official duty. The case of a judgment against him is certainly not of this description; and we can conceive of no reason why it should have any effect against his sureties, unless they are concluded by it. If such a judgment is prima facie evidence, anyone will perceive the difficulty there is rebutting it; and why should any greater effect be given to a judgment obtained by default against a sheriff, or, by his confession, against his surety, when it is certain that his confession, by itself, would not be so? The judgment against the sheriff is not essential in this state, to enable the party to proceed against the surety, and therefore seems to have no bearing in an action upon his bond. It may be remarked that the case of a sheriff is entirely different from that of an administrator and guardian, inasmuch as a part of their duty is the settlement with the court."

A judgment against a sheriff for a breach of his duty is not evidence against the sureties on his official bond, to prove the breach thereof. M'Dowell v. Burwell, 4 Rand. (Va.) 317.

A judgment in an action against a sheriff for a false return to an execution does not affect his sureties when a common-law action is brought on the bond. Lucas v. The Governor, supra.

A judgment against a sheriff on a motion to pay over money is not sufficient evidence as against the surety to establish a breach of the bond, or the amount of damages, since the surety is not a party thereto. Carmichael v. The Governor, 3 How. (Miss.) 236.

A judgment in an action on an official bond of a constable, where it is unnecessary to sue the principal first, is never conclusive or prima facie evidence in favor of the plaintiff of the facts which are essential to its recovery. Berry v. Schaad, 50 App. Div. 132, 63 N. Y. Supp. 349.

It is well settled in New York that, in an action on a marshal's bond, a judgment against the marshal for a conversion or an unlawful levy is neither conclusive nor prima facie evidence against the surety of the facts essential to the recovery. V. Loewer's Gambrinus Brewery Co. v. Lithauer, 43 Misc. 683, 88 N. Y. Supp. 372.

That a statute makes it necessary to show as a condition of maintaining an action against a surety on a marshal's bond, that a judgment has been recovered against the marshal, and an execution issued and returned wholly or partly unsatisfied, and leave given to prosecute the bond, does not make a judgment against a marshal evidence against the surety of anything more than the fact that the judgment has been obtained. Ibid.

A judgment obtained against a sheriff for a false return is not evidence of such default against the sureties on his official bond conditioned that he shall "well and faithfully, in all things, perform and execute the office of sheriff," since the surety on such a bond has not agreed that his principal shall pay any judgment whatever. In this respect the sheriff's official bond is different from an administrator's bond. People ex rel. Tuthill v. Russell, 25 Hun, 524.

b. Of executors and administrators.

By the weight of authority, it results from the nature of the obligation entered into by a surety on an administrator's or executor's bond, that he is bound and concluded by the judgment against his principal, in the absence of fraud or collusion; and the judgment against the principal in such action is res judicata, and cannot be collaterally attacked in the action on the bond. Ne-vitt v. Woodburn, 160 Ill. 203, 52 Am. St. Rep. 315, 43 N. E. 385, affirming 56 Ill. App. 346.

The surety cannot, in an action on the bond, attack a decree made against an administrator for whose fidelity to his trust he has bound himself. Stovall v. Banks, 10 Wall. 583, 19 L. ed. 1036.

The sureties on an administrator's bond are bound to the extent to which their principal is bound. Greer v. McNeal, 11 Okla. 526, 69 Pac. 893.

The final decree of distribution of the county court is conclusive against the bondsmen as well as the administrator. Sjoli v. Hogenson, 19 N. D. 82, 122 N. W. 1008.

Sureties upon an administrator's bond are bound and concluded by the decree against their principal primarily and to the same extent as their principal is bound. Crook v. Newborg, 124 Ala. 479, 82 Am. St. Rep. 190, 27 So. 432.

An order of the county court requiring an executor to pay over the money due is as conclusive upon the sureties as upon the principal. People v. Stacy, 11 Ill. App. 506.

A decree of the orphans' court against the administrator is conclusive on his sureties. Holley v. Acre, 23 Ala. 603; Garber v. Com. 7 Pa. 265; Com. use of Krebs v. Ruhl, 199 Pa. 40, 48 Atl. 905.

It is well settled in Missouri that a suit on the administration bond can be maintained against the sureties of an administrator who has been ordered to pay over money by the probate court, and that the judgment of that court against the administrator is conclusive against his sureties. State ex rel. Frost v. Creusbauer, 68 Mo. 254.

An order of the court directing the executor to pay over a sum of money, made by a court of competent jurisdiction and unappealed from, and not set aside for fraud or otherwise, if conclusive upon the executor, is conclusive upon his sureties also. State ex rel. Richardson v. James, 82 Mo. 509.

There is but one exception in Missouri to the rule of the conclusiveness which attends a final settlement, and that is when an action is brought, either on the administration bond or otherwise, for waste or mismanagement where the estate proves insolvent (1 Wagner, Stat. p. 118, § 6), in which case the settlement is to be held conclusive only so far as the administrator "has applied the assets pursuant to the apportionment made by the court for the payment of debts." Id. § 7. Woodworth v. Woodworth, 70 Mo. 601.

A judgment against an administrator in a probate proceeding, fixing the indebtedness to the estate, is conclusive against his sureties. Kenck v. Parehen, 22 Mont. 519, 74 Am. St. Rep. 625, 57 Pac. 94.

An order of removal of an administrator, valid as to him, is valid as to his sureties. Kelly v. West, 80 N. Y. 139.

The general settlement of an administrator's account is conclusive upon the sureties on his bond. Altman v. Hofeller, 152 N. Y. 498, 46 N. E. 961.

The final settlement of the accounts of an executor is conclusive upon his bondsmen. Thompson v. Dekum, 32 Or. 508, 52 Pac. 517, 755.

A settlement or allowance of an executor's account, by a county court having jurisdiction thereof, is binding upon the executor's sureties. Wallber v. Wilmanns, 116 Wis. 246, 93 N. W. 47.

A surrogate's order fixing the amount of an administratrix's defalcation binds the sureties as well as the administratrix. Powder v. Bermeester, 34 N. Y. S. R. 716, 12 N. Y. Supp. 25.

A certificate which determined the claimant's right to costs in an action brought by him against the estate is a binding adjudication against the sureties of the administrator. Re Gall, 42 App. Div. 255, 59 N. Y. Supp. 254.

A judgment entered by a county court upon the final accounting of an executor is conclusive against the bondsman as well as the executor, and as against the bondsman imports verity, and is not merely prima facie evidence of its contents. Joy v. Elton, 9 N. D. 428, 83 N. W. 875.

The sureties on an administrator's bond cannot attack collaterally a judgment of the probate court against the administrator upon a final settlement and accounting by their principal, for whose fidelity to his trust they have obligated themselves. Greer v. McNeal, 11 Okla. 526, 69 Pac. 893.

Prior to 1844, a judgment against an administrator in North Carolina was no evidence whatever against the sureties, not parties thereto, as to the assets. State ex rel. Brown v. Pike, 74 N. C. 531.

The North Carolina statute of 1844 (Battle's Revisal, Chap. 43, § 10) provides "that in actions brought upon official bonds of administrators and others there named, 'when it may be necessary for the plaintiff to prove any default of the principal obligors, any receipt or acknowledgement of such obligors, or any other matter or thing which by law would be admissible and competent for or toward proving the same as against him, shall in like manner be admissible and competent against all or any of his sureties who may be defendants with or without him in said action.'" Under this statute a judgment against the principal is conclusive against the surety. Ibid.

The general law is that a judgment against an administrator or executor for a debt, or a decrease of a balance in his hands, is conclusive upon the sureties in his bond, though they are not parties. Crim v. England, 46 W. Va. 480, 76 Am. St. Rep. 826, 33 S. E. 310.

A judgment against the executors of a deceased executor is conclusive against the sureties on his bond, although they were not 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

parties to the action. Biggins v. Raisch, 107 Cal. 210, 40 Pac. 333.

A decree of the distribution entered in the superior court, and the order of the court in passing upon and proving the account of an executor, are, in the absence of fraud, binding upon the sureties, although they were not parties to the proceeding. Treweek v. Howard, 105 Cal. 434, 39 Pac. 20.

A decree of the orphan's court vacating a prior decree of distribution, and ordering a new distribution, is binding on the administrator's sureties, though they were not heard in the proceeding in which it was made. Yung's Estate, 199 Pa. 35, 48 Atl. 692.

A judgment against an administrator in settlement of his accounts is conclusive against a surety who was a party to the proceeding. Clark v. Newman, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1339, 49 S. W. 310.

Where the surety on the executor's bond is cited to appear and show cause why the complainant should not have leave to sue on the bond, and has acquiesced in the decision, he is bound thereby, and cannot thereafter attack the decree against the executor. Clark v. Fredenburg, 43 Mich. 263, 5 N. W. 306.

A judgment in settlement of an administrator's account is conclusive upon the surety. Williamson v. Howell, 4 Ala. 693. The court said that it was the duty of the surety where, as in this case, his principal was insolvent, to attend the settlement and protect his rights, and his failure to do so could be considered in no other light than gross laches.

Where after a decree has been rendered fixing the amount due from an executor to a legatee, and an application to sue on the bond is made by the legatee, and notice thereof given to the sureties on the executor's bond, and where, at the time of the application, the sureties had opportunity to apply for leave to appeal, but did not do so, it was held that they could not in an action on the bond attack the correctness of the decree against the executor. Holden v. Lathrop, 65 Mich. 652, 32 N. W. 879.

But in Robbins v. Burrridge, 128 Mich. 25, 87 N. W. 93, it was held that an order granting leave to sue on the bond is not res judicata of plaintiff's right to maintain an action, although the sureties have notice thereof and appear.

It has been held that the doctrine that the surety is bound by a judgment against his principal does not apply in a case where the surety of an administrator has been discharged by a secret agreement between the administrator and the distributees of the estate, that he might use the moneys of the estate to carry on his private business. Brooks v. People, 15 Ill. App. 570.

Nature of obligation.

In a California case it is said that as a general rule sureties upon official bonds are not concluded by a decree or judgment against their principal, unless they have had their day in court or an opportunity to be heard in their defense; but administration bonds seem to form an exception to this general rule, and the sureties thereon, in respect to their liability for the default of the principal, seems to be classed with such sureties as covenant that their principal shall do a particular act. To this class belong sureties upon bail and appeal bonds, whose liability is fixed by the judgment against their principal. This distinction seems to be founded upon the terms of the obligation into which the sureties upon an administration bond enter, which are that their principal shall faithfully perform all the duties imposed upon him by the nature of his trust, and will account for and pay over all money which may come into his hands pursuant to the orders and decrees of the probate court. The account must be rendered to and settled by the court, and the money must be paid out and distributed by and pursuant to the orders and decrees of the court, and the undertaking of the sureties is that their principal will do all this. Irwin v. Backus, 25 Cal. 214, 85 Am. Dec. 125.

In holding that a decree of a probate court settling the amount due the estate from an executor cannot be questioned in an action on the bond, the court, in Probate Judge v. Quimby, 89 Me. 574, 36 Atl. 1049, said that the sureties in signing the bond in effect stipulated that their principal should abide and perform decrees of the court upon all questions between him and the estate within the court's jurisdiction. They did not stipulate for any opportunity to object to any proceedings. They intrusted the representation of their principal's rights and interests to the principal himself. As well might the sureties upon an appeal bond question the judgment of the appellate court, as the sureties upon a probate bond question the decree of the probate court in cases within its jurisdiction. This language was cited with approval in Shaw v. Humphrey, 96 Me. 397, 90 Am. St. Rep. 349, 52 Atl. 798.

In Perkins v. Moore, 16 Ala. 9, it is said: "When we reflect that the orphans' court has full jurisdiction to make final settlements of decedents' estates, and to decree the payment of the assets to those entitled either as distributees or legatees, it must be apparent that when such decree is rendered, it is conclusive on the administrator; and if he then refuse to pay the amount thus ascertained, such refusal must be a breach of the condition of his bond, which is, that he will perform all the duties required of him by law as such executor. And if there has been a breach of the bond, and the amount ascertained to which the party aggrieved by the breach is entitled, by a judicial proceeding to which the administrator was a party, there can be no reason for requiring further proceedings before the bond can be put in suit."

the settlement of his accounts to such persons as the court shall direct," his failure to make payment according to the decree of the probate court is a breach of the bond, and such decree is conclusive upon his sureties. White v. Weatherbee, 128 Mass. 450.

"A judgment for a specific sum of money due from the administrator to the estate is conclusive upon his sureties, the obligation of the bond being "should faithfully administer said estate, account for, pay, and deliver all money and property of said estate, and perform all other things touching said administration required by law, or the order or decree of any court having jurisdiction." This obligation does not arise out of the relation of principal and surety, but springs from the express stipulation of the bond. State use of Griffith v. Holt, 27 Mo. 340, 72 Am. Dec. 273.

✓ In an action on an executor's bond, the sureties are concluded by an order of the court to pay over money, not because they were parties to the record, as was their principal, with the right to appeal or prosecute a writ of error, but because, by the stipulations of their bond, they bound themselves to the performance of whatever should be required of their principal by the order or sentence of any court having jurisdiction. Taylor v. Hunt, 34 Mo. 205.

Where an executor or administrator is required by the statute to give a bond, with sufficient sureties, on condition (1) to return to the judge a true and perfect inventory of the estate of the deceased, upon oath, within three months from the date of the bond; (2) to administer the estate according to law; (3) to render an account within a year; and (4) to pay and deliver the rest and residue of the estate which shall be found remaining upon the account to such person or persons as the judge, by his decree according to law, shall limit and appoint,—the sureties are concluded by the decree on the settlement of an executor's account, since they by such bond are privies thereto. Probate Judge v. Sulloway, 68 N. H. 511, 49 L.R.A. 347, 73 Am. St. Rep. 619, 44 Atl. 720.

✓ Whenever any order is made by a surrogate in respect to the administration of an estate cognizable by him, which concludes the administrator, the sureties of the latter are also concluded by it, the condition of the bond being that their principal "shall obey all orders of the surrogate of the city of New York touching the administration of the estate committed to her." Baggott v. Boulger, 2 Duer, 160.

In the absence of fraud or collusion, a decree of a surrogate directing an administrator to pay a debt is conclusive upon his sureties, under a bond by which they undertake that he shall obey the orders of the surrogate touching the administration of the estate committed to him. Thayer v. Clark, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 391, affirming 48 Barb. 243.

✓ A judgment against executors in their official capacity, and the return of an execution "no property found," are conclusive of a devastavit, not only against the defendants in the judgment, but also against the sureties on the bond. Grimmet v. Henderson, 66 Ala. 521. The court said: "The sureties have, by the execution of the bond, assumed the office of guarantors for the faithful performance of the executorial duties of their principals. (This includes the duty to pay on demand all debts ascertained judicially to be due by the principals in their capacity as executors, provided the estate is not declared to be insolvent.) The failure to pay such judgment is a breach of the bond, and the sureties, as well as the principals, are estopped from asserting anything to the contrary."

But in Banks v. Speers, 97 Ala. 560, 11 So. 841, it was said that the statements in the last-mentioned case were obiter, the court refusing to follow the decision on this point.

A distinction is taken as to administration bonds founded upon the terms of the obligation, as used in South Carolina and other states,—those being that the administrator should account, meaning account before the probate court,—which was held equivalent to an obligation by the surety to pay, such decree as that court might render. Pico v. Webster, 14 Cal. 202, 73 Am. Dec. 647.

Privity of surety.

A judgment against an executor is conclusive on the sureties as to the breach of the bond and the amount of damages, since the sureties are privy in contract to the judgment, standing in the same relation to their principal as bail to theirs. Willey v. Paulk, 6 Conn. 74.

A surety is concluded by a surrogate's decree from contesting the validity of a debt upon which it is founded, so long as it remains unreversed. Sureties are bound by the decree of the surrogate in such a case, because by their contract they have made themselves privy to the proceedings against their principal, and when the principal is concluded, the sureties, in the absence of fraud or collusion, are concluded also. Casongj. v. Jerome, 58 N. Y. 315.

When persons become sureties upon the bond of an administrator, they make themselves privy to the proceedings against their principal, and when he, without fraud or collusion, is concluded, they are concluded also. Gerould v. Wilson, 81 N. Y. 573, affirming 16 Hun, 530.

The sureties are bound by a decree of the surrogate requiring their principal to pay to parties entitled a certain sum of money. They are bound because they are privy to the proceedings against their principal, and when the principal is concluded, they, in the absence of fraud, are concluded also. Harrison v. Clark, 87 N. Y. 572.

In an action on an executor's or administrator's bond, a decree of final settlement is conclusive not only upon the executor or administrator, but also, in the absence of fraud or collusion, upon the sureties, because by their contract they have made themselves privy to the proceedings against their principal, and when the principal is concluded, the sureties are concluded also. Bellinger v. Thompson, 26 Or. 320, 37 Pac. 714, 40 Pac. 229.

But in Lipscomb v. Postell, 38 Miss. 476, 77 Am. Dec. 651, it was held that there is no such privity existing between an executor and the sureties on his official bond as to render a judgment against the executor conclusive against the sureties, in the absence of special language in the bond by which the sureties agree to be so bound.

Statutes.

The binding effect of a decree against an administrator in Alabama is provided for by statute, which makes it the duty of the administrator, imposed by his bond, to make settlement of his administration. Hence, the state of the accounts ascertained and decreed against the personal representative himself is alike conclusive on him and his sureties, in the absence of fraud and collusion. Martin v. Tally, 72 Ala. 23.

Under a statute providing that failure of an administrator to pay over moneys to any person entitled thereto shall be deemed to be a devastavit, and an action upon such executor's or administrator's bond, and against his or their executors, may be forthwith instituted and maintained, and the failure aforesaid to pay such moneys or dividend shall be a sufficient breach to authorize a recovery thereon, an order of the court directing the payment of money to an heir is conclusive upon the administrator's sureties, since the sureties by their bond so agree. "This," said the court, "answers every objection of hardship or injustice which might appear to exist by holding him concluded by a proceeding which he was not notified to defend. By entering into the bond, he not only assumed that the administrator should act with fidelity and discretion in the management of the estate, but he also took the responsibility that he should properly defend any proceeding against him which might be instituted in the probate court. The administrator might do or omit a thousand acts for which the security would be liable, but of which he might be entirely ignorant, or if known, he might be unable to control in the least degree. The hardship in the one case is no greater than in the other. If he was not willing to take the responsibility of the administrator's conduct and discretion to that extent, he should not have become his security." Ralston v. Wood, 15 Ill. 159, 58 Am. Dec. 604.

A judgment against an executor for an amount found due from him to the estate is by statute, in Illinois, made evidence of a devastavit, and is conclusive upon the sureties in an action on the bond, except as to the question of fraud. Housh v. People, 66 Ill. 178.

Under a Kentucky statute providing that "in all suits against executors or administrators, on their bonds or otherwise, for devastavits, they shall be at liberty to plead plene administravit; and under such plea shall be at liberty to show the real amount of assets which were in their hands to be administered when the original judgment was rendered against them, for which sum judgment may be rendered, and 'for no more,' a judgment against an administrator by default in an action suggesting a devastavit is not conclusive against the sureties in an action on the bond. Fauntleroy v. Lyle, 5 T. B. Mon. 266.

In New Hampshire by express provisions of statute, as well as by the well-settled rules of law, a decree of the orphans' court upon the final settlement of executors' and administrators' accounts is conclusive, and cannot be questioned in an action on the bond. The Ordinary v. Kershaw, 14 N. J. Eq. 527.

What cannot be relitigated.

Sureties are concluded by orders of the probate court fixing the amount due by an administrator. Stewart v. Morrison, 81 Tex. 396, 26 Am. St. Rep. 821, 17 S. W. 15; Gray v. MacFarland, 29 Tex. 163.

A judgment of a county court charging an administrator with a certain sum is conclusive against his sureties in an action on the bond. Holden v. Curry, 85 Wis. 504, 55 N. W. 965.

✓ The judicial ascertainment by the probate court of the amount of an administrator's indebtedness, when not procured by fraud or collusion, is conclusive against his surety. Jones v. Ritter, 56 Ala. 270. To the same effect, McDonald v. People, 222 Ill. 325, 78 N. E. 609, affirming 123 Ill. App. 346.

✓ A judgment against an administrator recovered without fraud or collusion is conclusive upon the sureties in respect to all matters of defense affecting "the amount due" on the claim upon which it was founded. Bourne v. Todd, 63 Me. 427.

A decree of a probate court determining the sum due from an administrator to the estate on the final accounting of the administrator is, in the absence of fraud, conclusive upon his sureties. Perkins v. Scott, 9 Ohio C. C. 207, 6 Ohio C. D. 226.

An adjudication by a probate court on the final settlement of the administrator's accounts, as to the amount of the administrator's liability, is conclusive evidence against his sureties in an action on the bond. George v. Elms, 46 Ark. 260.

In an action against sureties on an administrator's bond, to recover the amount adjudged to be due the estate, the sureties cannot defend on the ground, that the probate court erred in finding that any amount was due from the administrator. Bonner v. Gorman, 71 Ark. 480, 77 S. W. 602.

An adjudication of a probate court as to the amount of the liability of an administrator for dower is conclusive against his sureties in an action on the bond. Briggs v. Manning, 80 Ark. 304, 97 S. W. 289.

In a suit on a probate bond, founded on the failure of a trustee to pay over the assets remaining in his hands or due from him on the settlement of his account in the probate court, it is not competent, either for the principal or the sureties, to attack collaterally the decree of the probate court fixing the amount due on account. Re Glover, 167 Mass. 280, 45 N. E. 744.

✓ The sureties upon an administrator's bond are, in the absence of fraud, concluded by the decree of the probate court duly rendered upon a final settlement and accounting by their principal, as to the amount of the principal's liability although the sureties on the bond are not parties to the accounting. Greer v. McNeal, 11 Okla. 526, 69 Pac. 893.

✓ Sureties upon a probate bond are, in the absence of fraud or collusion, concluded by the decree of the probate court rendered upon an accounting by their principal, as to the amount of the principal's liability; and this is the rule even though the sureties be not parties to the accounting. Meyer v. Barth, 97 Wis. 352, 65 Am. St. Rep. 124, 72 N. W. 748.

✓ A judgment of a surrogate's court finding that there was a certain sum of money in the hands of an administrator subject to distribution, which judgment is unreversed, is conclusive against the administrator's sureties, not only as to the amount in his hands, but that the same was at that time liable to distribution. Frank v. People, 147 Ill. 105, 35 N. E. 530.

A judgment or order of the court directing an executor to pay over a sum ascertained to be in his hands on the final settlement of the account, as assets belonging to the estate, is conclusive upon him and his sureties in an action on the bond. Dix v. Morris, 66 Mo. 514.

The amount found due from an administrator or executor to the estate on the settlement of his accounts in the probate court is, in the absence of fraud or collusion, binding not only upon him, but also upon his sureties, in an action upon the administration bond, unless an appeal has been taken or the judgment has been reversed upon a proceeding in error. Slagle v. Entrenkin, 44 Ohio St. 637, 10 N. E. 675.

A surety is estopped from controverting the validity of a decree establishing the amount of debt to be paid by the administrator. Salyer v. State, 5 Ind. 202.

An administrator's sureties in an action on the bond cannot inquire into the validity of the decree against their principal, in the absence of any claim that there was fraud or collusion in securing it. Jenkins v. State, 76 Md. 255, 23 Atl. 608, 790.

When a suit has been brought on the bond, neither the administrator nor his sureties can contest the validity of the order of the court authorizing it. Choate v. Jacobs, 136 Mass. 297.

The sureties on an administratrix's bond cannot inquire into the validity of a decree setting aside a deed and decreeing payment of a certain sum to the grantor, where the decree is not attacked on the ground of fraud or collusion, and it is not claimed that there was any error in the ascertainment of the amount directed to be paid. Jenkins v. State, supra.

A surety of an administrator in an action on the bond cannot be heard to question the validity of a decree of the probate court settling the account of his principal and making distribution, on the theory that the probate court had not due and legal proof that the proper notice thereof had been given, where a statute (Code § 1638) provides that "the account must not be allowed by the court until it is first proved that notice has been given as required by this chapter, and the decree must show that such proof was made to the satisfaction of the court, and is conclusive evidence of the fact." McClellan v. Downey, 63 Cal. 520.

In a suit on an administration bond, the regularity of the proceedings upon which the ordinary founded his decree for a sum of money due by the administrator is not open to inquiry by the sureties. Lyles v. Brown, Harp. L. 31.

When the sureties on an administrator's bond agree that their principal shall faithfully execute his duty, and obey the orders of the surrogate touching the administration, they are so far concluded by the decree fixing the amount due from the administrator that they cannot impeach it for errors or irregularity by an appeal on their own motion, nor collaterally, but they have the right to impeach it for fraud. Annett v. Terry, 35 N. Y. 256.

A decree rendered on final settlement in favor of a distributee is conclusive upon both administrator and sureties as to the sufficiency of assets. Kyle v. Maye, 22 Ala. 692.

Where the defense of insufficiency of assets was pleaded and relied on in the original action against the administrator, the judgment there obtained is conclusive against his sureties in an action on the bond. McKim v. Haley, 173 Mass. 112, 53 N. E. 152.

Where the administrator is directed by a judgment to pay over a certain sum, the sureties, in the absence of fraud, cannot inquire into the justice of the claim upon which it was founded. Tucker v. Stewart, 147 Iowa, 294, 126 N. W. 183.

A judgment or decree against an executor in favor of a creditor, payable out of assets, is conclusive evidence upon the executor and his sureties as to the existence and justness of the demand. Crim v. England, 46 W. Va. 480, 76 Am. St. Rep. 826, 33 S. E. 310.

A decree of an orphans' court against an administrator cannot be impeached either by the administrator or his sureties, on the ground that the parties in whose favor the decree was rendered as distributees were not distributees, since a judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive upon the rights of the parties as to all matters that were or could have been properly litigated in that suit. Lamkin v. Hoyer, 19 Ala. 228.

conclusive against the administrator is equally conclusive against the sureties, both as to claims against the estate and as to assets in the administrator's hands. Watts v. Gayle, 20 Ala. 817. The rule is that the sureties, in the absence of fraud, cannot litigate any questions except those which arise upon the factum of the bond or its legal sufficiency.

A decree of the probate court against an administrator de bonis non by virtue of his office as sheriff, in the absence of fraud, prevents the sureties from contesting their liability on the ground that their principal was appointed administrator in his individual capacity, and gave bond with new sureties. Ragland v. Calhoun, 36 Ala. 606.

The sureties of an action on the bond cannot raise the question whether or not the debt for which the judgment was rendered against the administrator was that of the administrator. Hobbs v. Middleton, 1 J. J. Marsh. 176. The court said that, the responsibility of securities being incidental and collateral to that of the principal, a judgment in favor of a creditor, against the administrator, concludes the securities as to the existence and character of the debt thus ascertained, and cannot be questioned or reviewed in a suit on the official bond.

Where the issue was made by an executor as to whether the widow had accepted the provisions of the will, it was held that the judgment rendered thereon concluded the surety. Frazer v. Frazer, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 473, 76 S. W. 13.

A judgment having been rendered against an administrator in favor of a corporation, the administrator having pleaded the non-existence of the corporation, the surety in an action on the bond cannot deny the legal existence of the corporation, since, as to all those matters of defense going to the merits of the debt as between the original parties, the judgment against the administrator must be taken to be conclusive in a suit on the administration bond, where there has not been fraud or collusion. Heard v. Lodge, 20 Pick. 53, 32 Am. Dec. 197.

The sureties of an administratrix are bound by an order of the surrogate setting aside a decree discharging her, and requiring her to pay a certain sum of money to persons entitled, although they had required the administratrix, as a condition of the signing of the bond, to deposit the moneys of the estate in their hands, and had paid them back after the original decree discharging her, and although they had no notice of the application to set aside the original decree. Deobold v. Oppermann, 111 N. Y. 531, 2 L.R.A. 644, 7 Am. St. Rep. 760, 19 N. E. 94. The court said that the sureties were privies of the administratrix, and were precluded from questioning any lawful order of the surrogate in a proceeding wherein she was a party.

In an action for the breach of an administrator's bond, evidence of matter relating to the conduct of the administration prior to the decree is properly rejected as immaterial and res judicata. Mortenson v. Berghthold, 64 Neb. 208, 89 N. W. 742.

A final decree of the orphans' court, reaffirmed on the petition for relief presented by the sureties of the administrator, and not appealed from, is conclusive against the administrator and his sureties as to their liability for the proceeds of the sale of the real estate of the testator, and they cannot, in an action on the bond, defend on the ground that the real estate was sold prior to the period designated by the will. Hartzell v. Com. 42 Pa. 453.

The decree is conclusive that the administrator has failed fully to account, although not that he is in default in any other particular, and as to the amount set out in the decree. Norton v. Wallace, 2 Rich. L. 460.

In the absence of fraud or collusion, an administrator's sureties cannot impeach a judgment against the administrator for a debt of the intestate, on the ground that before it was recovered, the debt had been paid by the administrator. Boyd v. Caldwell, 4 Rich. L. 117.

Neither an administratrix nor her sureties can dispute a verdict which finds that she did not administer the whole assets, and it is no excuse that the verdict was without defense on her part. Greenside v. Benson, 3 Atk. 248.

What sureties may litigate.

A decree against an administrator on the official settlement of his account is not conclusive upon his sureties as to the factum of the bond and the sureties' liability upon it. Martin v. Tally, 72 Ala. 23.

In an action on an administrator's bond after a decree of the probate court directing him to pay over a sum adjudged to remain in his hands, the sureties may show in defense either that the bond was not made, or that the decree was not made; or, if made, that the same has been obeyed; or that the same was obtained by fraud or collusion; but they cannot show that the court has erred in making the decree, or that no assets ever came into the possession of the administrator, although the court has so found and adjudged. If any error has been committed a remedy is afforded by appeal. Until the order or decree is reversed, it is equally conclusive upon the administrator and his sureties. Irwin v. Backus, 25 Cal. 214, 85 Am. Dec. 125.

The recovery of a judgment against a personal representative, on a debt of his testator or intestate, is not conclusive upon the representative's sureties, that there were sufficient assets of the estate to pay the liability thus ascertained. Banks v. Speers, 97 Ala. 560, 11 So. 841.

In holding that the surety is not precluded by a judgment against the executor, from showing deficiency of assets, the court, in Hayes v. Seaver, 7 Me. 237, said: "It is clear that the executors suffered a judgment to be rendered against them which they might have successfully resisted; and inasmuch as the defendant, their surety, was 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

not a party, he ought not to be barred by that judgment thus negligently or collusively suffered by his principals, even were it de bonis propriis, but may now be permitted to avail himself of the same matter in his defense which they might have urged against the original suit or the scire facias."

The surety of an administrator's bond is not estopped by reason of a judgment against his principal, from denying his liability for the proceeds of land sold under a judgment or decree, although he may have been a party to the action and have excepted to the report, no judgment having been rendered against him or sought in that action. Stuart v. Hathaway, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 438.

A judgment against an administrator is not conclusive against his surety as to the persons entitled to surplus assets, even though it be conclusive as to the amount. Helm v. Donnelly, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 517.

The sureties are not concluded by a judgment against the administrator, from showing that, prior to the commencement of the action in which the judgment was rendered, the administrator's authority had become extinguished. Bourne v. Todd, 63 Me. 427.

If an administrator fails to plead the statute of limitations, a judgment against him does not preclude his surety from setting up that defense, not being a party to the suit against his principal, and having no opportunity to avail himself of the defense which the statute intended for his benefit. Dawes v. Shed, 15 Mass. 6, 8 Am. Dec. 80.

A surrogate court decree against the administrator does not conclude his sureties on the question of jurisdiction. Browning v. Vanderhoven, 4 Abb. N. C. 166.

A judgment of the court may be looked into by the sureties on an administrator's bond, in order to see that it was rendered against the principal. Shelton v. Cureton, 3 M'Cord, L. 412.

A judgment at law against an administrator de bonis testatoris, on a contract originating with himself, though for the benefit of the estate, will not estop his sureties in a subsequent suit in equity from charging him with the payment of such judgment. Thompson v. Mann, 65 W. Va. 648, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1094, 131 Am. St. Rep. 987, 64 S. E. 920.

An absolute judgment against an administrator is not conclusive that he had assets with which to discharge a demand, where fraud is alleged against the administrator and heirs. Griffin v. Inferior Ct. Justices, 22 Ga. 590.

Judgment not conclusive.

It is the rule in some jurisdictions that a verdict or judgment against an administrator is not conclusive against his sureties. Henrico Justices ex rel. Craddock v. Turner, 6 Leigh, 116.

An administrator's sureties are not concluded by the decree on the settlement of the estate adjudging the amount in his hands for distribution. Gambill v. Campbell, 12 Heisk. 737.

To bind a surety of an administrator by a judgment ascertaining a balance in his principal's hands, it must appear that he was a party to the action. Creutz v. Artzman, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 422.

A judgment against an administrator is not conclusive against his surety, not a party thereto, in an action on the bond. Canal & Bkg. Co. v. Brown, 4 La. Ann. 546.

A surety not a party to the proceedings against his administrator is not concluded by the decree against the latter for a devastavit, but may show that his principal, having received nothing, should have been amenable for nothing. The Ordinary v. Carlile, 1 McMull. L. 100.

In the absence of special arrangements, a judgment or award against a principal debtor is not binding on a surety, and is not evidence against him in an action in which he is sued by the creditor, the judgment being as to the surety res inter alios acta. Zimmerman v. Kemp, 30 Ont. Rep. 465.

There is nothing in the nature of the obligation of a surety on an administration bond to take the case out of the general rule. Ibid.

The contract of the surety being that the executor "shall well and truly pay over and deliver the legacies," etc., "so far as the law will charge him," he is not concluded by a judgment against his principal. The contract will be strictly construed. Lipscomb v. Postell, 38 Miss. 476, 77 Am. Dec. 651.

A surety is not concluded as to the amount due a distributee from an administrator, by a recovery in a suit against the latter. Kaminer v. Hope, 9 S. C. 253.

In an action against an executor's sureties, an account upon which a decree against the executor was rendered is not conclusive against the sureties, who have the right to surcharge it, or to demand a new one. Hobson v. Yancey, 2 Gratt. 73.

But the fact that the decree was de bonis testatoris, and not de bonis propriis, is a matter which cannot avail the sureties. Franklin v. Depriest, 13 Gratt. 257.

The record of a recovery by a creditor of the estate against the administrator is not prima facie evidence in a suit by a creditor against the administrator's sureties. Chairman of Mecklenburg County Ct. v. Clark, 11 N. C. (4 Hawks.) 43.

Where a surrogate's decree is defective through failure of service of citation upon, and failure of appearance of, necessary parties, it is not binding upon the sureties, although jurisdiction was obtained as to the principal; and it is immaterial that the parties omitted to join in an action on the bond. Keegan v. Smith, 20 Misc. 305, 45 N. Y. Supp. 663.

And where a statute makes the sureties necessary parties to a voluntary accounting, a decree of judicial settlement of an administrator's account is not binding on the sureties who were not cited and who did 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

not appear. Cookman v. Stoddard, 132 App. Div. 485, 116 N. Y. Supp. 901.

In an action of debt upon an administrator's bond suggesting a devastavit, the surety is not concluded by the omission of the administrator to defend the action against him by pleading and proving that he had fully administered, under a statute providing that "no security for an executor or administrator shall be chargeable beyond the assets of the testator or intestate, on account of any omission or mistake in pleading of the executor or administrator." Williams v. Hinkle, 15 Ala. 713.

If the executor neglect to make the defense of the insolvency of the estate, such defense is nevertheless open to the sureties. Burgess v. Young, 97 Me. 386, 54 Atl. 910.

But it has been held that the mere fact that an administrator omitted to prefer charges against an estate which he might have made will not authorize his surety to go into chancery for a resettlement, although the administrator may be insolvent. Williamson v. Howell, 4 Ala. 693.

Prima facie evidence.

In some jurisdictions the rule is that a judgment against an administrator is prima facie evidence against his sureties, but not conclusive against them. Bennett v. Graham, 71 Ga. 211.

A decree against an administrator in an action on his bond is at least prima facie evidence of the sum due, and when the legality of the decree is not contested, and no claim is made that it was obtained by fraud or that the amount decreed was not due, it is conclusive. Lyles v. Caldwell, 3 M'Cord, L. 225.

A judgment against an administrator fixing the amount of assets in his hands unaccounted for is prima facie evidence against his sureties, who can impeach it only by proof of collusion or mistake. O'Connor v. State, 18 Ohio, 225.

In a suit against a surety on an executor's bond, the judgment or decree of the probate court is only prima facie evidence against him. Lipscomb v. Postell, supra.

A decree against an administrator is only prima facie evidence against his sureties. The Ordinary v. Condry, 2 Hill, L. 313.

A decree in equity against the principal is only prima facie binding upon the sureties. Dunagan v. Dunagan, 38 Ga. 554.

A decree of settlement of an administrator's account is only prima facie evidence against his sureties. To render the judgment conclusive, the surety must have been a party and have had an opportunity of being heard. Todd v. Lewis, 2 Handy (Ohio) 280. The court said: "We do not suppose that sureties to the bond of an administrator are necessary or proper parties to the settlement of accounts made by him with the probate court. The effect of any proper defense in such a case would be to increase the balance against the administrator,—the interest of the sureties would be that it should be diminished. When an administrator offers for settlement an account showing a balance in his hands, a defense interposed by his surety that there was no such balance would present a novel issue to a probate court. It will probably be found the better practice not to complicate the settlement by any such issue, leaving the surety, when any proceeding is instituted against him, to show, if he can, that there was error or fraud in the settlement. This course will generally be found to be the most just and convenient."

A judgment or decree against an administrator is at least prima facie evidence against the surety in an action on the bond, and the surety cannot contend that he is not bound by the decree against his principal, if he has made no effort to attack it. American Bonding & T. Co. v. United States, 23 App. D. C. 535.

A judgment against an executor is receivable against the surety as prima facie evidence of the amount due from the executor, subject to be inquired into and corrected on proper allegation and by legal evidence. Verret v. Belanger, 6 La. Ann. 109.

A judgment against the principal debtor is prima facie proof of the amount for which the surety on the administrator's bond is liable, and until rebutted by sufficient evidence no other proof is required. Ferguson v. Glaze, 12 La. Ann. 667.

The plaintiff in an action on an administrator's bond makes out a prima facie case by the production of the judgment in his favor against the administrator, together with the execution and the officer's return thereon. Bourne v. Todd, 63 Me. 427.

In Norton v. Wallace, 2 Rich. L. 460, it is said that it certainly was in the beginning stretching legal principles as far as they would bear, to hold that it was only prima facie evidence; for the general rule is invariable that "until the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, upon the same matter, is reversed in a course of regular proceedings on it, a resort to any other tribunal, or to the same tribunal, for its judgment on the same controversy, is inadmissible."

A judgment against an administrator in an action in which the sureties are not parties is only prima facie evidence against them. Barksdale v. Butler, 6 Lea, 450.

A judgment in favor of a creditor and a distributee in a garnishment proceeding, when conclusive upon the administrator, is prima facie binding upon his sureties. Brown v. Wiley, 107 Ga. 85, 32 S. E. 905.

A judgment against an administrator is prima facie evidence in a suit against his sureties, that there are assets in the administrator's hands sufficient to discharge the judgment. Bird v. Mitchell, 101 Ga. 46, 28 S. E. 674.

A judgment against an administrator is prima facie evidence merely against his sureties as to the sufficiency of assets to pay debts. Gibson v. Robinson, 90 Ga. 756, 35 Am. St. Rep. 250, 16 S. E. 969.

A judgment against an administrator who was also guardian for the heirs, for the amount due to the widow, in which it was incidentally declared that a certain sum remained in the hands of the administrator for distribution, was held only prima facie evidence against the sureties on the guardian's bond, who were not parties thereto. Com. ex rel. Bracken v. Bracken, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 785, 32 S. W. 609.

In an action against the sureties on an administrator's bond, a judgment previously obtained against the administrator is admissible in evidence, but it is not conclusive as against the sureties, with respect either to the fact or the extent of the breach by the administrator of the obligation of the bond, since to hold them bound thereby would be to hold that they may be condemned without being heard. Wiemann v. Mainegra, 112 La. 305, 36 So. 358.

Although the judgment against the administrator is evidence against him of a debt due by the intestate, and is evidence also of assets in his hands to discharge it, and although it is also evidence of the debt due as far as relates to his securities, yet it is not evidence against them that he has assets to discharge it, so as thereby to subject them to the payment of the debt in case nulla bona is returned on an execution against the administrator. Chairman of Washington County Ct. v. Harramond, 11 N. C. (4 Hawks) 341. The court said that whether the administrator has wasted the assets or not is an inquiry in which the securities are interested, and the judgment ought not to be introduced as evidence of the affirmation, because they are neither parties or privies to that judgment.

An equity decree against an administrator is only prima facie evidence against a surety in an action on the bond, and he may impugn the decree so far as to permit him to introduce evidence to show that his principal was charged with a larger number of working hands than he had control of in his fiduciary capacity. Norton v. Wallace, 1 Rich. L. 507.

The recovery of a judgment or decree against the principal on a bond, although the sureties were not parties to the suit, is prima facie binding upon them. They can relieve themselves of such binding effect of the recovery against the principal only by showing that the amount recovered was in excess of the amount which the plaintiff in the judgment or decree was entitled to recover, or that he was not entitled to recover at all. Jenkins v. State, 76 Md. 255, 23 Atl. 608, 790.

Under a statute providing that no executor or surety shall be chargeable beyond assets by reason of any omission or mistake in pleading, and that the surety may offer any defense admissible in an action against the executor suggesting a devastavit, a decree against an executor finding a sum of money in his hands from assets is prima facie evidence against the sureties on his bond. Crim v. England, 46 W. Va. 480, 76 Am. St. Rep. 826, 33 S. E. 310.

Deceased representative of principal.

A decree against the personal representative of a deceased administrator is not binding upon or evidence against his sureties. Stallworth v. Farnham, 64 Ala. 259. The court said that it is a judgment or decree against their principal, for whose acts they have agreed to be liable, rendered against him in his representative capacity, that is evidence against and binding on them, and the foundation of an action at law against them; and not a judgment or decree against the personal representative of the principal, for whose diligence and good faith they have not consented to be answerable. To the same effect, Means v. Hicks, 65 Ala. 241.

In the absence of fraud or collusion, a surety is bound by a judgment or decree rendered against his principal in the course of his administration, as he is bound by such acts as his principal is required by law to perform, but the surety is not bound by any judgment or decree against or acts done by the personal representative of his principal, for whose fidelity he has not promised to answer. Street v. Henry, 124 Ala. 153, 27 So. 411.

An administratrix of a deceased executor and testamentary trustee cannot voluntarily account for a devastavit of the latter, so as to conclude the sureties on the bond. Re Williams, 26 Misc. 636, 30 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 76, 57 N. Y. Supp. 943.

Probate court settlement of a deceased administrator's accounts, made before the appointment of an administrator of the deceased administrator, is not binding upon the sureties, neither the principal nor the administrator being legally before the court at the time of the settlement. State v. Drake, 52 Ark. 350, 12 S. W. 706.

Judgments on settlements and liabilities.

In an Alabama case it is said, upon the question of the conclusiveness of a judgment against an executor or administrator upon his sureties, that "a distinction was taken" in the Alabama courts, "at an early day, between decrees rendered against the representative in the orphans' or probate court on settlements made therein, and judgments rendered against him on debts or liabilities of his testator or intestate. In cases falling within the first class—decrees on settlements in the probate court—it has been uniformly ruled that the sureties were bound and concluded by the decree rendered precisely and to same extent as their principal was bound. . . . One reason given for this ruling, and a very strong one, was and is that in settlements in the probate court, the receipt of assets by the representative, the amount received, and the surplus after allowing all proper disbursements, are the very questions considered and passed upon. They constitute the basis of the decree. And the form of the decree is another reason. It is not that the sum be levied and collected of the property and the effects of the testator or intestate in his hands to be administered. It is that he pay the amount decreed; for the presumption is that he has converted the assets into money. In suits against the personal representative to enforce a debt or liability of his testator or intestate, the issue is different. The question in such case is the decedent's liability vel non; and the inquiry of assets in the representative's hands is not one of the issues presented. The recovery is not against the administrator personally, but to be levied of the goods and chattels of the decedent in his hands to be administered. Hence, in all our early decisions it was held that such recovery did not conclude or estop the sureties from denying that the administrator had come into possession of assets with which to discharge the indebtedness." Banks v. Speers, 97 Ala. 560, 11 So. 841.

A judgment against a personal representative to enforce a debt or liability of his intestate is not binding on the sureties on his bond, so as to preclude or estop them from denying that the administrator had come into the possession of assets with which to discharge the indebtedness. Woodall v. Wright, 142 Ala. 205, 37 So. 846.

c. Of guardians.

It is generally held that a judgment against a guardian is conclusive not only as against him, but as against the sureties in an action on the bond. Deegan v. Deegan, 22 Nev. 185, 58 Am. St. Rep. 742, 37 Pac. 360.

A probate court judgment against a guardian is conclusive against the sureties upon his official bond; whatever binds and concludes the guardian equally binds and concludes the sureties. Brodrick v. Brodrick, 56 Cal. 563.

An order of the probate court entered against a guardian, finding the amount of money in his hands upon the settlement of his accounts, and the amount due to persons lawfully entitled, is conclusive upon his sureties. Jacobson v. Anderson, 72 Minn. 426, 75 N. W. 607.

A judgment of a probate court having jurisdiction of the matter fixing the amount due by a guardian is conclusive both against the guardian and his sureties. Bopp v. Hunsford, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 340, 45 S. W. 744.

Fraud or collusion not being asserted, an adjudication of the amount due the ward from the guardian is conclusive on his sureties. Chase v. Wright, 116 Iowa, 555, 90 N. W. 357.

A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction against a guardian for an amount due his ward, affirmed by consent upon appeal, is conclusive in an action on the bond. McCleary v. Menke, 109 Ill. 294.

A surrogate's decree determining the amount due from a guardian is conclusive upon his sureties. Eberle v. Schilling, 32 Misc. 195, 65 N. Y. Supp. 728.

An order of the county court requiring a guardian to pay over a sum of money in his hands is conclusive upon the guardian and his security, except for fraud or mistake, as to the amount then actually in the hands of the guardian. Gillett v. Wiley, 126 Ill. 310, 9 Am. St. Rep. 587, 19 N. E. 287.

The settlement of a guardian's account is conclusive upon the sureties. Altman v. Hofeller, 152 N. Y. 498, 46 N. E. 961.

The settlement of a guardian's accounts and his discharge by the court cannot be attacked in a suit on the bond. State ex rel. Favorite v. Slaughter, 80 Ind. 597.

A judgment against a guardian on final settlement, directing the payment of a sum of money to his ward, is conclusive upon his sureties. State ex rel. Yeoman v. Hoshaw, 86 Mo. 193.

The surety of the committee of a lunatic is concluded by the judicial settlement of the committee's account. Com. use of Todd v. Rhoads, 37 Pa. 60.

A surrogate's decree in an accounting proceeding against the administrator of a deceased guardian is binding upon the sureties on the guardian's bond, although they were not parties thereto. Van Zandt v. Grant, 67 App. Div. 70, 73 N. Y. Supp. 600, affirmed in 175 N. Y. 150, 67 N. E. 221; Hornung v. Schramm, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 327, 54 S. W. 615.

The order and determination of the probate court as to the amount due from a guardian to his ward, made after due notice to the guardian, is final and conclusive upon the sureties on the guardian's bond in an action against them thereon. Cross v. White, 80 Minn. 413, 81 Am. St. Rep. 267, 83 N. W. 393.

A final settlement of the accounts of a guardian, made in the orphans' court, showing the amount of his indebtedness to his wards is conclusive alike on the guardian and his securities, although the sureties had no notice of the proceedings in the orphans' court, and were not present and did not give their consent to the rendition of the judgment against them, unless the securities can impeach it for fraud. Chilton v. Parks, 15 Ala. 671.

A judgment of the court establishing the amount of a guardian's indebtedness, and ordering him to pay the sum over immediately to his successor, is conclusive upon his sureties without notice to them. Botkin v. Kleinschmidt, 21 Mont. 1, 69 Am. St. Rep. 641, 52 Pac. 563.

It is not necessary to bring a guardian's sureties before the county court by citation, in order to make a decree of that court on final settlement of the guardian's account conclusive against the sureties as to the amount due from their principal. Fahey v. Boulmay, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 279, 59 S. W. 300.

Where there is a final settlement of the guardian's accounts upon due notice and final judgment rendered, which may be enforced by attachment or action on the bond, the guardian's sureties are concluded thereby, the condition of the bond being for the faithful discharge of the guardian's duties according to law. State ex rel. Hyslop v. Bilby, 50 Mo. App. 162.

An order of the probate court settling the guardian's final account is conclusive upon his sureties, although they had no notice thereof. Rice v. Wilson, 129 Mich. 520, 89 N. W. 336. The court said: "The bonds of executors, administrators, and guardians are placed by the courts upon a different basis from those given by sheriffs, treasurers, etc., for the performance of their duties. The distinction is probably based upon the theory that the former are intrusted with estates which are under the control of the courts; that they must render accounts to such courts, and have them determined and the amount fixed before suit upon the bond. One of the conditions of the bonds is that they shall render accounts, and, if such guardians, etc., do not pay the judgments found against them by the court, the sureties will. These bonds stand on the same basis as do bail and appeal bonds in suits at law. In each case there must be a judgment against the principal before the bail can be sued. Not so, however, with bonds of sheriffs, treasurers, etc. It is no condition of their bonds to pay any judgment that courts may render against them. The universal method pursued is to sue the principal and sureties in the same suit."

It has been said that the decree against the guardian is conclusive on the sureties, because they are privies in contract. For the faithful performance of all the duties required of the guardian by law, they are bound by the terms of the bond; and a full settlement of his guardianship in the court of probate or the court of chancery, as the ward may elect the one or the other forum, is the duty enjoined upon him by the law. The decree rendered against him is in the nature of a judicial admission made by him; is an act done in the performance of his trust and duty, and for this reason is binding and conclusive on the sureties; and not upon the theory that they are parties to the record, directly or indirectly. Hailey v. Boyd, 64 Ala. 399.

A guardian's sureties are bound by the judgment of the supreme court setting aside a settlement of the guardian's account for fraud, and fixing the amount due from the guardian to the ward. The sureties by their contract have so connected themselves with the obligation of the guardian, and with the proceedings to bring him to account, and with the judgment rendered, to make it binding upon them as to all questions necessarily involved. Douglass v. Ferris, 138 N. Y. 192, 34 Am. St. Rep. 435, 33 N. E. 1041.

The final settlement of a guardian's accounts on the determination by the probate court of the amount due his wards, in the absence of fraud or collusion, concludes the sureties in an action on the bond. Braiden v. Mercer, 44 Ohio St. 339, 7 N. E. 155. The court said: "By their bond the sureties contract with reference to the action of a court, and that their principal will obey its orders and conform to such action. Can they say they are strangers to such proceedings? Upon their principal's failure to obey the orders of the court, there is clearly a breach of the bond. The relation they assume to such court and its action so far makes them privy to the proceedings affecting their principal as to deny to them the right, when called upon to answer for the breach of the bond, to call in question the grounds upon which the court based its action, and to have the same cause retried."

Under a bond providing that "if the guardian should, upon removal from office or at the expiration of his trust, settle his accounts in said court, or with the ward or his legal representatives, and pay over and deliver all the estate, title papers, and effects remaining in his hands or due from him on such settlement, to the person or persons lawfully entitled thereto, then the obligation to be void," etc.,—an order by the court that the guardian pay over to his successor the balance found to be due the ward is conclusive upon the sureties. Ream v. Lynch, 7 Ill. App. 161.

A surety who makes himself a party to the final settlement of the guardian's account is bound thereby. McWilliams v. Kalbach, 55 Iowa, 110, 7 N. W. 463.

A decree of a probate court against a guardian for a sum due his ward is conclusive against his sureties as to every matter of defense which could have been urged against its rendition, and on an application for supersedeas, neither the surety or his principal can go behind it and show that in fact the principal was not liable for the sum decreed against him, either because he had never received the assets with which he was charged, or, having received them, had accounted for them. Gravett v. Malone, 54 Ala. 19.

An order of the probate court as to the amount due from a guardian to his ward is conclusive upon his sureties as to the amount actually in the hands of the guardian, and is impeachable only for fraud or mistake. Ryan v. People, 165 Ill. 143, 46 N. E. 206, affirming 62 Ill. App. 355. To the same effect, Badger v. Daniel, 79 N. C. 372; Niehoff v. People, 171 Ill. 243, 49 N. E. 214, affirming 66 Ill. App. 689; Schoenleber v. Burkhardt, 94 Wis. 575, 69 N. W. 343.

A judgment of a county court as to the amount due from the guardian to his ward on final settlement is conclusive upon his sureties, and not prima facie only as to the amount due, in the absence of any allegation of fraud or collusion. Brooks v. People, 15 Ill. App. 570.

The settlement of a guardian's account adjudging the amount due the ward is conclusive both on the principal and the sureties, so as to preclude the sureties from setting up the claim that the guardian squandered the money before their appointment. Knepper v. Glenn, 73 Iowa, 730, 36 N. W. 763.

The sureties on a guardian's bond cannot show in an action on the bond that the moneys with which the guardian was charged in the final report, and which were ordered to be paid to his successor, were largely expended for necessities which, upon a proper showing, might have been sanctioned by the court. Knox v. Kearns, 73 Iowa, 286, 34 N. W. 861.

The decree of a surrogate's court entered on the accounting by the executrix of a general guardian is, unless impeached for fraud, conclusive as against the sureties of the guardian, as to the amount due from his estate to the ward. Martin v. Hann, 32 App. Div. 602, 53 N. Y. Supp. 186.

A judgment establishing the liability of the estate of the ward for taxes in a suit by the guardian to restrain their collection is res judicata as to that question in a subsequent action against the guardian and his sureties to collect the unpaid taxes. Baldwin v. Maryland, 179 U. S. 220, 45 L. ed. 160, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 105.

But a surety cannot be deprived of the right to litigate the question of suretyship, or, if it existed, the question whether it continued at the time the decree was rendered against the guardian. Gravett v. Malone, 54 Ala. 19. The court said: "The settlement is made without notice to him, and is conclusive on him only because it is an act his principal, the guardian, is required by law to perform, and the due performance of which is within the condition of his bond."

The judgment roll in an action brought by wards against their general guardian, adjudging that proceedings for the sale of the wards' estate were fraudulent and void, and setting such proceedings aside, and proceedings before a surrogate for his removal, assuming that the bond was intended to provide against wrongful and fraudulent conduct of the guardian, are incompetent evidence to prove such misconduct, as against a surety who was neither a party nor a privy to such proceedings for action. Clark v. Montgomery, 23 Barb. 464.

But a decree of the orphans' court against a guardian is not conclusive against his sureties as to items accruing after their discharge. Hamner v. Mason, 24 Ala. 480.

Judgment not binding.

But it has been held that an accounting in a probate court, without notice to the guardian or surety, is not conclusive upon the latter in an action on the bond. Gilbert v. Gilbert, 13 Ohio C. C. 29, 7 Ohio C. D. 58.

An order of the probate court granting leave to sue on a guardian's bond is not res judicata of the liability of the sureties. Perkins v. Cheney, 114 Mich. 567, 68 Am. St. Rep. 495, 72 N. W. 595.

A decree of a probate court against a guardian on the settlement of his accounts, also rendered against the sureties on his bond, on the mistaken theory that the statute permitting execution of the decree against both guardian and sureties authorizes a decree against the sureties, will not support a garnishment proceeding against the sureties, or a judgment against the garnishee, who admits an indebtedness to them. Smith v. Jackson, 56 Ala. 25.

Prima facie evidence.

In some jurisdictions it is held that a judgment against a guardian is prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence against his sureties. Bradwell v. Spencer, 16 Ga. 578.

Proceedings upon which a judgment is rendered finding the amount due by a guardian to his ward are prima facie, not conclusive, evidence of indebtedness as against the sureties in an action on the guardian's bond. Weaver v. Thornton, 63 Ga. 655.

A guardian's surety is only prima facie bound by a judgment against the estate of the ward, to which he was not a party. Fidelity & D. Co. v. Rich, 122 Ga. 506, 50 S. E. 338.

A final settlement of a guardianship creates a prima facie liability on the part of the guardian's sureties. State use of Brent v. Grace, 26 Mo. 87.

A decree against a guardian is only prima facie evidence of a devastavit. The surety may "look into it." Bryant v. Owen, 1 Ga. 355. The court said: "The surety now before this court was not a party to this suit in equity; he had no notice, so far as the record discloses, of its pendency; of course, he was not heard in his own defense in that suit. It is contrary to natural justice, and also to all the analogies of the law, that one should be estopped by a decree to which he was not a party, and of which he had no notice. Such a rule would most effectually oust the security of his day in court. His rights would, by such a rule, depend upon the diligence or the fidelity of others. The principal might collude with the complainant, and permit an iniquitous decree to be rendered against himself, in order to charge his surety. Human nature is, unfortunately, not too good for that; or his carelessness or neglect might work irreparable injury to the surety."

A judgment against a tutor upon an account of tutorship is only prima facie evidence against the tutor's surety. Fuselier v. Babineau, 14 La. Ann. 777.

A decree directing a guardian to pay over a certain sum of money is prima facie evidence against his sureties, although they are not parties to the action. They can relieve themselves of such binding effect of the recovery against the principal only by showing that the amount recovered was in excess of the amount which the plaintiff in the judgment or decree was really entitled to recover, or that he was not entitled to recover at all. Parr v. State, 71 Md. 220, 17 Atl. 1020.

A decree of the chancery court on the final account of a guardian is only prima facie evidence against his surety, who may exonerate himself from liability for any charges or omissions in the final account which were not legal as against him. State use of Baird v. Hull, 53 Miss. 626. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Where the bond of a curator in the statutory form provides that he shall discharge all his duties according to law, a final settlement of the probate court having the binding effect of a judgment is not conclusive against the sureties, but prima facie correct only. State use of Smith v. Martin, 18 Mo. App. 468. The court said that the decisions holding judgments against the principal conclusive against the sureties turned wholly upon the language of the particular bond.

But in M'Kellar v. Howell, 11 N. C. (4 Hawks) 34, it was held that, in an action against the securities on a guardian's bond, the record of a judgment against the guardian in a suit brought against him alone is not competent evidence against the sureties.

d. Of assignees.

A judgment against an assignee has been held binding upon him and his sureties. Cook v. Lehmer, 9 Ohio C. C. 632, 6 Ohio C. D. 726.

By signing the bond, the surety, it has been said, covenants that his principal will faithfully execute the trust imposed upon him by his appointment as assignee, and in such a case, the surety, in the absence of fraud, is bound by the judgment against the principal, and without regard to any right to appeal. State ex rel. Glidden & J. Varnish Co. v. National Surety Co. 76 Mo. App. 227.

Whether or not sureties were parties to an action in which the amount of defalcation of an assignee, their principal, was adjudged, they are bound thereby. Hindman v. Lewman, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 181, 63 S. W. 478, rehearing denied in 23 Ky. L. Rep. 179, 61 S. W. 470.

The sureties of an assignee for the benefit of creditors, who has been directed by the final decree to pay a claim of a specific creditor, are bound thereby. They cannot, in an action on the bond, set up that the decree was erroneously made against the assignee. Their remedy, if any, is by appeal from the decree of distribution. Little v. Com. 48 Pa. 337.

In an action on the bond, the sureties of an assignee are concluded by the findings of the county court as to the amount unaccounted for that came to the hands of the assignee, and which he was ordered by the county court to pay over; and they are not entitled to have such matters retried. Moulding v. Wilhartz, 169 Ill. 422, 48 N. E. 189.

A judgment for the amount ascertained to be due in a settlement suit against an assignee for creditors is conclusive as to the amount against his sureties, although they had no notice thereof. National Surety Co. v. Arterburn, 110 Ky. 832, 62 S. W. 862.

Where, by the decree of the probate court upon the final account of the assignee, he is ordered to pay over a balance remaining in his hands to the assignor, the sureties will be concluded by the decree, although, in executing the assignment, there may have been collusion between the assignor and assignee to defraud the creditors, unless an appeal has been taken, or the judgment has been reversed upon a proceeding in error. Garver v. Tisinger, 46 Ohio St. 56, 18 N. E. 491.

In an action on an assignee's bond for the recovery of the amount found due the successor of the assignee on the settlement of his accounts, the sureties are concluded by the settlement, and, in the absence of fraud or collusion, can neither question the correctness of the settlement, nor demand a rehearing of the accounts; nor will they be heard to assert that the assets with which the assignee is charged in his accounts were not the property of the assignor. Walsh v. Miller, 51 Ohio St. 462, 38 N. E. 381. The court said: "It is the settled law of this state that sureties on the bond of a guardian or assignee are in privity with their principal, and so bound and concluded by the findings and judgments of the probate court in the settlement of the trust, that they cannot question their correctness, or dispute the amount found due from the principal."

It has been said that in proceedings under a voluntary assignment by a failing debtor, for the benefit of his creditors, there is a general likeness or analogy to those involved in the settlement of decedent's estates and guardianships. It is well settled that interlocutory orders or actions by the court relating to reports or matters connected with decedent's estates and guardianships cannot be attacked collaterally by way of suits on bonds of administrators and guardians. As to all matters embraced in such reports or settlements, the action of the court is deemed to be prima facie correct, and must stand until reversed or set aside in some direct way or proceeding by the court having control over them. And as to the making of all reports and the action of the court thereon, those interested must take notice, unless the statute makes provision that notice be given. To allow a review of the action and decrees of the court in such cases, whether interlocutory or final, by way of suits upon the bond given by the trustee, would be to admit and invite examination and re-examination of every report made by the trustee as often as any captious interested person might become dissatisfied. State ex rel. Puett v. Musser, 4 Ind. App. 407, 30 N. E. 944.

But in Pierpoint v. McGuire, 13 Misc. 70, 34 N. Y. Supp. 150, it was held that a judgment against an assignee for creditors is prima facie evidence against the sureties in an action on the bond.

In Macready v. Schenck, 41 La. Ann. 456, 6 So. 517, it was held that a judgment against a liquidator of a partnership is prima facie evidence against the surety on the bond, to show breach of contract and liability, but that adverse proof is admissible.

In People v. White, 28 Hun, 289, it was held that the proceedings taken by creditors against an assignee for the benefit of creditors are not admissible against the sureties on the assignee's bond conditioned only for the faithful discharge by their principal of his duty as such assignee, and that he shall duly account for all moneys received, since neither in language nor by implication have the sureties covenanted to be bound by the result of the proceeding against the assignee to which they were not parties, and of which they had no notice.

e. Of receivers.

In E. Martin & Co. v. Kirby, — Nev. —, 117 Pac. 2, it was held that if a receiver is bound by an order in a receivership proceedings, his surety is likewise concluded thereby.

Upon the settlement of a receiver's accounts, the order of the court directing him to pay over the balance in his hands to persons entitled thereto is not only binding upon the receiver, but is also binding upon his sureties as to the amount due on account of his receivership. Clark v. First Nat. Bank, 57 Mo. App. 277.

The amount found due from a receiver in a chancery accounting is conclusive upon the surety in an action upon the receiver's bond, where the surety had notice of the accounting and an opportunity to intervene. Ball v. Chancellor, 47 N. J. L. 125.

An order of the court directing the receiver to pay a sum of money is conclusive upon the surety on his bond, although not a party thereto, under a bond conditioned upon the faithful discharge by the receiver of the duties of his trust, since the failure to pay is within the terms of the bond and a breach of its terms. Thomson v. McGregor, 13 Jones & S. 197.

The condition of a receiver's bond being that he should faithfully conduct himself in his office as receiver, faithfully perform his duties as required by law and in obedience to the directions of the court, and truly and faithfully account for and pay over the moneys of the company which should come into his hands,—an order of the court, after due proceedings and a full hearing, ascertaining the sum due and to be paid by the receiver, is competent evidence against his sureties as well as himself, both of a breach of his bond and of an amount due from him upon such breach, for which they are responsible. Com. v. Gould, 118 Mass. 300.

But it has been held that the sureties on a receiver's bond conditioned upon the faithful discharge of his duties as receiver are not concluded in an action on the bond, by a judgment against the receiver. Coe v. Patterson, 122 App. Div. 76, 106 N. Y. Supp. 659, rehearing denied in 123 App. Div. 914, 108 N. Y. Supp. 1127.

A judgment against a receiver directing him to pay over a certain sum of money is competent evidence for the purpose of showing a breach of his bond, although it may not be evidence as to the amount of property received by him. Thompson v.

Denner, 16 App. Div. 160, 44 N. Y. Supp. 723.

On the settlement of a receiver's account, the decree of the court requiring him to pay over a certain sum to a special commissioner for disbursements is conclusive upon his sureties as to the liability and its amount. State use of Beard v. Abbott, 63 W. Va. 189, 61 S. E. 369.

A judgment fixing the amount of assets for which a receiver fails to account is not binding upon his sureties, who were not parties thereto, as to the amount of the default; but it is evidence that the receiver is in default and that he has failed to account. Carl v. Meyer, 51 App. Div. 5, 64 N. Y. Supp. 1077.

Where a receiver refused in an action against him to interpose the defense of the statute of limitations, and refused to allow his indemnitors to do so, it was held that the latter were not concluded by the judgment from setting up such defense. Chapin v. Thompson, 4 Hun, 779.

In Preston v. American Surety Co. 104 Md. 40, 64 Atl. 292, it was held that a decree against a receiver fixing the amount for which he had not accounted, and directing a suit to be brought against a surety therefor, is not conclusive, but prima facie, evidence only against the surety, not a party thereto and ignorant of the proceedings on which the decree was based.

f. Miscellaneous.

It has been held that the sureties of a public officer are not concluded by the settlements made by him with the court. Nolley v. Callaway County Court, 11 Mo. 447.

In Foxcroft v. Nevens, 4 Me. 72, it was said that the default of the principal on an official bond can have no effect to charge the sureties.

A judgment against an officer establishing a defalcation beyond the penalty of his bond is, in the Federal courts at least, prima facie evidence against his sureties to show the breach of the bond. Moses v. United States, 166 U. S. 571, 41 L. ed. 1119, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 682.

A judgment against a principal alone for the amount of public money which he has failed faithfully to expend and account for is prima facie evidence against the sureties in an action on the bond. Ibid.

A judgment against a government official for the amount of his defalcation, or for the major part of it, is competent evidence against his sureties in an action on the bond, though not conclusive. Howgate v. United States, 3 App. D. C. 277.

A judgment against a United States internal revenue collector for his default is binding upon his sureties. United States v. Ingate (C. C.) 48 Fed. 251.

In Arkansas a judgment by a county court in favor of the plaintiff is conclusive evidence against the sureties of a collector in an action on the bond. Jones v. State, 14 Ark. 170.

An order of a court directing a surrogate's clerk to pay over a sum of money has been held at least prima facie evidence against his sureties, having no notice of the proceedings preliminary to such order. State use of St. Louis v. Thornton, 8 Mo. App. 27.

It is now the rule in Nebraska that in an action on the official bond of an officer, a judgment against the latter for breach of trust in converting money of the plaintiff to his own use is only prima facie evidence against his sureties. Such an adjudication is conclusive evidence of the liability of the sureties only in case they agreed to abide by any judgment that might be rendered against their principal. Barker v. Wheeler, 60 Neb. 470, 83 Am. St. Rep. 541, 83 N. W. 678, overruling Thomas v. Markmann, 43 Neb. 823, 62 N. W. 206, and Lewis v. Mills, 47 Neb. 910, 66 N. W. 817. The court said that, upon the question whether their principal had been guilty of misconduct in office, they were entitled to be heard, and that it was contrary to natural justice that they should be concluded by a judgment to which they were not parties.

In Alabama it has been held that a judgment against an officer for defalcation is not prima facie evidence against his sureties, either as to the fact of the embezzlement or as to the amount thereof, in the absence of a statute applicable thereto. Firemen's Ins. Co. v. McMillan, 29 Ala. 147.

A settlement made in a county court by the administrator of a county treasurer, of an indebtedness due the county, has been held binding upon the sureties on the treasurer's bond, although made without notice to them, the sureties by their contract and by force of law covenanting for the faithful performance of their principal's duty, and to settle in accordance with the judgment of that tribunal, if no appeal is prosecuted from its findings. Wycough v. State, 50 Ark. 102, 6 S. W. 598.

A judgment of the probate court on the final settlement of the administrator of a partnership estate, rendered after the death of the surety, when there was no one to be affected by the notice of the proceedings and no one to represent the estate at the hearing in the probate court, or to take an appeal if desired, has been held not conclusive upon the estate of the surety. State ex rel. Taaffe v. Goggin, 191 Mo. 482, 109 Am. St. Rep. 826, 90 S. W. 379. The court said: "Proceedings in the probate court are somewhat in the nature of proceedings in rem, and when the notices required by law have been given, all persons interested are chargeable with notice and have the right to be heard. The sureties on the administrator's bond are interested in his final settlement, and are entitled to be heard before a judgment which is to be binding on them is rendered, and have the right to appeal if they feel aggrieved. If they do not, after due notice of the purpose of the administrator to make final settlement has been given, appear in court, but let the judgment of final settlement go against their principal, and take no part in the proceedings until the period for appeal has elapsed, they have no cause to complain, because they have neglected their opportunity, and the judgment is conclusive on them."

But in State ex rel. Christy v. Donegan, 12 Mo. App. 190, a judgment against the administrator of a partnership estate, rendered upon a final settlement and order of distribution then made upon him, was held conclusive against the sureties upon his bond, and not merely prima facie evidence against them, as to the amount due by the partnership administrator.

It has been held that the trustees' bondsmen cannot question the auditor's account duly ratified by the court, finding a certain sum due from the trustees. State use of Whitelock v. Banks, — Md. —, 24 Atl. 540.

But in New York, where the bond of a testamentary trustee is conditioned upon the faithful execution of the trust, a judgment against the executrix of the trustee is not conclusive upon the sureties of the trustee as to the amount of the damage due to the alleged breach of the trust. Thomson v. American Surety Co. 170 N. Y. 109, 62 N. E. 1073.

The sureties on a trustee's bond conditioned upon the faithful performance by the principal of his duties as trustee are not concluded by a judgment against the representatives of their deceased principal for moneys due a beneficiary. People ex rel. Collins v. Donohue, 70 Hun, 317, 24 N. Y. Supp. 437. The court said: "We here find that neither by the nature of the contract nor the express terms of the bond does the surety obligate himself to be bound by the judgment of the court; and when it is sought to charge him, after the death of the principal, with the latter's unfaithfulness, he should not be precluded by a judgment obtained against the representatives of the deceased principal, in an action to which he was not a party and of which he had no notice."

A judgment obtained against a principal on a statutory bond, official in character, is prima facie sufficient to warrant a recovery against his sureties. It is therefore unnecessary for the plaintiff to furnish proof of the contract upon which such judgment was rendered. Ihrig v. Scott, 13 Wash. 559, 43 Pac. 633.

When the principal and sureties on an official bond are sued together, the judgment as to the principal is res judicata as to the sureties, and, within the limit of the amounts for which they are held under the terms of their bond, they are bound to make good the entire judgment against the principal, including the penalty. Eastin v. School Directors, 40 La. Ann. 705, 4 So. 880.

A North Carolina statute (Acts 1844) rendered competent against the sureties to official bonds, and those given by executors, administrators, and guardians, whatever evidence would be competent against the principals, and this was declared to be conclusive, where the evidence was a judgment 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

against the latter. In 1881, the statute was amended by making the evidence "prima facie only" against the surety. (Code § 1345.) Moore v. Alexander, 96 N. C. 34, 1 S. E. 536.

IV. Indemnity bonds and obligations.

a. In general.

The rules with reference to the evidentiary value of judgments against the principal in actions on indemnity obligations are well summarized in a New York case in which it is said that covenants to indemnify against the consequences of a suit are of two classes: 1. Where the covenantor expressly makes his liability depend on the event of a litigation to which he is not a party, and stipulates to abide the result; and, 2. Where the covenant is one of general indemnity merely against claims or suits. In cases of the first class, the judgment is conclusive evidence against the indemnitor, although he was not a party and had no notice, for its recovery is the event against which he covenanted. In those of the second class, the want of notice does not go to the cause of action, but the judgment is prima facie evidence only against the indemnitor, and he may be let in to show that the principal had a good defense to the claim. Bridgeport F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 34 N. Y. 275.

In Grommes v. St. Paul Trust Co. 147 Ill. 634, 37 Am. St. Rep. 248, 35 N. E. 820, it is said that the courts holding the judgment conclusive evidence against the surety are those in which the contract of the surety obligates him to be responsible for the result of a suit against his principal, or where he has been made privy to the suit against the principal by notice, and has been given an opportunity to defend it; that the general tendency of the decisions is in favor of the position that, in the absence of such notice and opportunity to defend, or of such assumed responsibility for the result of a court proceeding, the judgment against the principal is not conclusive against the surety, but can be introduced against him only as evidence of its own existence, and not as evidence of any of the facts upon which its recovery rests. Citing 2 Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, §§ 630-632, 2 Black, Judgm. §§ 586, 592; 1 Freeman, Judgm. § 180.

In Chamberlain v. Preble, 11 Allen, 370, the court said: "A faithful performance of the covenant to warrant and defend requires the covenantor, on notice, to appear and take upon himself the defense of the estate, when assailed by a paramount title. After suit brought and notice to him, the covenantor stands in a different relation to the party who has a right to look to him for indemnity. If he does not assume the defense, it is at least his duty to communicate all information in his power as to the validity of the plaintiff's title. If he fails to do so, if he stands by and permits a recovery for want of evidence of which he has knowledge, he cannot be permitted to show that the result would have been otherwise if the evidence had been produced, and so avoid the effect of the recovery in a suit against him. If he pays no attention to the notice, and turns his back upon the suit, he cannot, when called upon to respond, be permitted to prove that the defendant in the original suit would have prevailed if the defense had been conducted with a fuller knowledge of material facts."

Nor can it make any difference that the facts or some of them, in a proper case, were agreed to by the parties, instead of being passed upon by the jury. Ibid.

The obligors on a bond given to the obligee to secure the payment of damages for his land taken by a railroad company are bound by a judgment therefor, although not parties thereto, since, by the terms of their bond, they by implication agree to be represented by the railroad company and to abide by the judgment against it. Hunt v. Card, 94 Me. 386, 47 Atl. 921.

A surety covenanting for the payment of rent by his principal, the lessee of a hotel about to be built under a contract by which the time when the rent is to become due is to be fixed by arbitrators, is bound by an award which binds his principal, except that he is at liberty to show fraud or collusion, or perhaps that there was good defense which his principal neglected to interpose, this being a case in which the surety makes his liability depend upon the result of litigation between other parties. Binsse v. Wood, 37 N. Y. 526, affirming 47 Barb. 624.

Under a statute which declares that the stockholders of a corporation are jointly and severally liable for the payment of all debts or demands contracted by the corporation, and that no suit shall be commenced upon such debt or demand against a stockholder until judgment shall have first been obtained against the corporation, execution issued, and returned unsatisfied in whole or in part, or the corporation shall have been dissolved,—a judgment against the corporation is not even prima facie evidence of the genuineness of the debt. Moss v. McCullough, 5 Hill, 131.

When one covenants for the results or consequences of a suit between other parties, the decree or judgment in such suit is evidence against him, although he was not a party. Rapelye v. Prince, 4 Hill, 121, 40 Am. Dec. 267.

Privity of surety.

It has been held in a number of the more recent decisions, that an engagement by one man to be responsible for another creates such a privity between them as to render a recovery against the latter prima facie evidence in a suit brought on the guaranty given by the former. Spencer v. Dearth, 43 Vt. 98.

Where one party is liable to indemnify another against a particular loss, it is 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

because, by law or by contract, the primary liability for such loss is upon the party indemnifying, and in such instances the party bound to indemnify is in privity with the party to be indemnified, and he therefore has a direct interest in defeating any suit whereby there may be a recovery as to the subject-matter of the indemnity, against the party to be indemnified. Drennan v. Bunn, 124 Ill. 175, 7 Am. St. Rep. 354, 16 N. E. 100.

If the party indemnifying, warranting, guarantying, etc., has notice of the suit and a chance to defend, this makes him privy to the suit, and the judgment is evidence against him. Kettle v. Liipe, 6 Barb. 467.

When one has expressly or impliedly agreed to indemnify and save harmless another, and has notice of the suit in which the recovery is had, he is bound by the result of that suit, and the record concludes him, upon the principle that he is regarded as a privy to the suit. Thomas v. Hubbell, 18 Barb. 9.

In an action on a guaranty to secure the plaintiff as commission merchants for advances which they might make for the benefit of a certain firm, it was held that the guarantors were privies to the contract upon which the judgment in the original action was founded, so as to make it admissible and conclusive to show a breach of the bond and the amount of damages. De Forest v. Strong, 8 Conn. 514.

When a person is responsible over to another, either by operation of law or by express contract, and he is duly notified of the pendency of a suit and requested to take upon himself the defense of it, he is no longer regarded as a stranger, because he has the right to appear and defend the action, and has the same means and advantages of controverting the claim as if he were the real and nominal party upon the record. In every such case, if due notice is given such person, the judgment, if obtained without fraud or collusion, will be conclusive against him, whether he has appeared or not. Littleton v. Richardson, 34 N. H. 179, 66 Am. Dec. 759; Veazie v. Ponobscot R. Co. 49 Me. 119; Davis v. Smith, 79 Me. 351, 10 Atl. 55; Fowler v. Jersey Shore, 17 Pa. Super. Ct. 366.

When the warrantor is properly vouched, he becomes in effect the real party in interest to the ejectment. Paul v. Witman, 3 Watts & S. 409.

With notice, judgment is conclusive.

Where one stands in the position of indemnitor to another who is liable over to a third party, his liability may be fixed and determined in the action brought against such third party, by notice of the pendency of such action and an opportunity offered him to defend it. Davis v. Smith, 79 Me. 351, 10 Atl. 55. To the same effect, Port Jervis v. First Nat. Bank, 96 N. Y. 550.

In holding that the record of a judgment against the indemnitee is evidence against the indemnitor, the court, in Weld v. Nichols, 17 Pick. 538, said: "In a promise to indemnify, especially against a demand which the parties think is not well founded, the party indemnified is bound, in good faith, not to yield to the demand, until compelled by law to do so. He is therefore bound to show that he has paid under a judgment, and for this purpose the judgment is the proper evidence. It is like the ordinary case of one suing on a covenant of seisin or warranty, who must ordinarily produce the judgment by which he has been evicted. If the defendant has had due notice of the suit, and full means to aid in the defense, such judgment will in general be conclusive of the existence of the claim against which the covenant was made. The covenantee, or party indemnified, may, if he please, yield to the claim and pay without a judgment; but he does it at the risk of being obliged in his suit for indemnity, to prove the existence and truth of such claim."

The same rules in respect to notice, which apply to the indemnitor, are applicable also to his surety in like cases. Bridgeport F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 34 N. Y. 275.

If, by operation of law, a third person is answerable to a defendant for whatever a plaintiff may justly recover, and has due notice of the suit, a judgment obtained without fraud against the defendant is, in an action brought by him against such third person to enforce his liability, conclusive evidence of the facts determined by it. Lebanon v. Mead, 64 N. H. 8, 4 Atl. 392.

If it was through the fault of the party sought to be held liable over for damages due to personal injuries, that the plaintiff in the original action was hurt, the defendant in the subsequent action is concluded by a judgment in the first action, if he knew the suit was pending and could have defended it. Chicago v. Robbins, 2 Black, 418, 17 L. ed. 298.

The judgment is conclusive against the party sought to be held liable over, where he has had an opportunity to defend. Washington Gaslight Co. v. District of Columbia, 161 U. S. 316, 40 L. ed. 712, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564.

The person in fault is concluded by a judgment against a municipal corporation if he knew that the suit was pending and had an opportunity to defend it. Chicago v. Robbins, 2 Black, 418, 17 L. ed. 298.

After notice and a request to defend, the indemnitor is concluded by the judgment in the first suit. Drennan v. Bunn, 124 Ill. 175, 7 Am. St. Rep. 354, 16 N. E. 100.

If the indemnitor has notice of the pendency of the action, and of the intention of the defendant therein to look to him for indemnity in case of a recovery, and is not denied an opportunity to defend, he is bound by the result of such action. Port Jervis v. First Nat. Bank, 96 N. Y. 550.

If the party who is ultimately responsible has notice of the pendency of an action against his indemnitee, and is given an opportunity to defend, and neglects it, he is 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

bound by the result of the action, and estopped from controverting, in an action subsequently brought against him by such indemnitee, the facts which were litigated in the original action. Ibid.

One who, at the request of another, enters into a contract as his surety, is bound by a suit brought against the party whom he is bound to indemnify, even in the absence of a provision in his contract to that effect, since the law implies a promise to indemnify; and where the indemnitor has notice of the suit against the indemnitee, he is bound by the judgment therein. Konitzky v. Meyer, 49 N. Y. 571.

Even a judgment by default has been held conclusive between the parties thereto and their privies, and effectually to bind an indemnitor who had notice of the action with an opportunity to defend the same. Morlette v. Bostwick, 56 Misc. 140, 106 N. Y. Supp. 1102.

If the indemnitor takes charge of the litigation, the judgment is equally conclusive. Cal. Civ. Code, § 2778. Showers v. Wadsworth, 81 Cal. 270, 22 Pac. 663.

The Georgia Civ. Code of 1910, § 5821, provides: "Where a defendant may have a remedy over against another, and vouches him into court by giving notice of the pendency of the suit, the judgment rendered therein will be conclusive upon the party vouched, as to the amount and right of the plaintiff to recover." Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Macon R. & Light Co. 9 Ga. App. 628, 71 S. E. 1076.

The Code is merely declaratory of the principle announced by the supreme court in the case of Western & A. R. Co. v. Atlanta, infra. McArthur v. Ogletree, 4 Ga. App. 429, 61 S. E. 859.

Prima facie evidence.

In some jurisdictions a judgment against the principal is held to be prima facie evidence against the surety.

As between the principal and indemnitor, in a case of general indemnity against claims or suits, the judgment against the obligee is only prima facie evidence; and in a suit upon such obligation, the indemnitor may show that his principal had a good defense to the original action which he neglected or refused to interpose, or that there was collusion between the plaintiff and defendant in such action; and if either is established, it will defeat a recovery. Chapin v. Thompson, 4 Hun, 779.

A judgment in favor of the United States on an official bond is, at least, prima facie evidence against the obligors on the bond of indemnity given to the surety. Lee v. Wisner, 38 Mich. 82.

Where a builder contracts with the owner to indemnify him for injury occasioned to an adjoining building, the record of a suit against the owner for damages caused by the builder is admissible in an action by the owner against the builder and his sureties. Leppert v. Flaggs, 101 Md. 71, 60 Atl. 450.

Where a mortgage was assigned, and the sureties covenanted that the assigned security should produce a certain sum with interest, over and above all costs and expenses of suing upon it or foreclosing the mortgage, and that they would pay any deficiency, it was held that the proceedings in chancery for the foreclosure of the mortgage were evidence against the sureties, although they were not parties thereto. Rapelye v. Prince, 4 Hill, 121, 40 Am. Dec. 267.

A judgment arising out of matters connected with a contract guaranty is prima facie evidence against the guarantor on the question of liability. Kearney v. Sascor, 37 Md. 284.

In Pierce v. Wright, 33 Tex. 631, the record of a suit against the signer of a promissory note was held admissible in an action on a bond obligating the defendant to save the plaintiff harmless.

With notice, prima facie evidence.

Some of the cases held that even with notice the judgment against the principal is only prima facie evidence against the sureties.

The general rule is that a judgment against a principal is prima facie evidence against the surety with notice of the proceeding. McPharlin v. Fidelity & D. Co. 162 Mich. 141, 127 N. W. 307.

Where an action is brought against a principal and sureties on an indemnity bond, and a judgment is obtained against the defendants, which is set aside as to the sureties on their motion upon a second trial, the judgment against the principal is prima facie evidence against the sureties. Ibid.

A judgment against a warrantee if fairly obtained, and especially if obtained upon a notice to a warrantor, is admissible against the latter in a suit against him on his contract of warranty of indemnity. Clark v. Carrington, 7 Cranch, 308, 3 L. ed. 354.

Where the purchaser of goods seeks to hold his vendor liable over for damages recovered against him on account of defects in the goods, the judgment is admissible in his favor, notice having been given to his vendor and the latter having participated in the trial. Carleton v. Lombard, A. & Co. 149 N. Y. 137, 43 N. E. 422.

In an action by a municipal corporation for damages paid at the suit of a person injured by a defect in a street caused by the negligence of a railroad company, the record of the suit is admissible against the company, where it was requested to defend. Western & A. R. Co. v. Atlanta, 74 Ga. 774.

Without notice, prima facie evidence.

Failure to give notice is often held to render a judgment otherwise conclusive against the surety, prima facie evidence only.

With notice, the former judgment is conclusive against the security; and without it, it is prima facie only. Napier v. Neal, 3 Ga. 208.

If notice and opportunity to make a defense are not given to the indemnitor, judgment is but prima facie evidence of his liability on the bond. Stewart v. Thomas, 45 Mo. 42; Knickerbocker v. Wilcox, 83 Mich. 200, 21 Am. St. Rep. 595, 47 N. W. 123.

The judgment is prima facie evidence of the amount of the indemnitor's liability. Grant v. Maslen, 151 Mich. 466, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 910, 115 N. W. 472.

Where notice was not given to the indemnitor, and he did not participate in the original suit, it was held that judgment rendered therein was not conclusive upon him, but that it was admissible as part of the plaintiff's case. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Howard County, 111 Md. 176, 73 Atl. 656.

If the indemnitee wishes to make a judgment against him conclusive against the indemnitor, he should give the latter notice and an opportunity to defend. The omission to give notice does not go to the right of action, but leaves the onus upon the indemnitee of showing that the judgment was recovered for a claim or demand against which the indemnitor was bound to indemnify him. Aberdeen v. Blackmar, 6 Hill, 324.

If a thing determined in a prior case is the same thing which works the breach of covenant complained of, then, whether the covenantor was well warned or not, the judgment is a piece of lawful evidence in the action upon the covenant, the difference being that if it turn out that the covenantor was not adequately warned,—was not in substance a party,—the judgment, instead of being final as against him, is merely prima facie evidence of the validity of the title it purports to validate, and is disputable. Mason v. Kellogg, 38 Mich. 132.

The record of a judgment of ejectment against an indemnitee's tenant is prima facie evidence against the indemnitors, although they had no notice of the action upon which it was founded. Taylor v. Barnes, 69 N. Y. 430.

Where the condition of the bond is that the indemnitor shall pay a sum of money due to a third person, or save the indemnitee harmless, notice of the suit against the indemnitee is unnecessary. A verdict recovered against the indemnitee is at least prima facie, not to say conclusive, evidence against the sureties on the bond to show the amount of damages. Lee v. Clark, 1 Hill, 56.

An award of arbitrators against an owner primary liable for breach of contract is not binding upon one liable over, who has had no notice thereof. Saveland v. Green, 36 Wis. 612.

Where the owner conveyed land subject to a mortgage which the grantee assumed and agreed to pay, and the mortgage was foreclosed in an action against the grantor only, it was held that the proceedings and judgment in foreclosure were properly received in evidence in an action by the grantor against the grantee to show the amount of the mortgage debt, the sale of the property, and the amount of the deficiency, although the grantee was not a party thereto, and had no notice of the suit. Comstock v. Drohan, 8 Hun, 373. The court said: "Where one person has become obligated to protect another against the consequences of his or her default in payment, a judgment regularly recovered against the party entitled to such protection is prima facie evidence of the facts established by it, in his favor in an action against the person bound to make the indemnity."

But where notice is expressly stipulated for, the want of it will, of course, defeat the action. Bridgeport F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 34 N. Y. 275.

Judgments held not conclusive.

It is only when the indemnitor has been notified and has had an opportunity to defend that he will be concluded by a judgment against the indemnitee, as to all questions determined therein which are material to a recovery against him by the indemnitee. Henderson v. Eckern, 115 Minn. 410, 132 N. W. 715.

If the indemnitor is not notified of the suit against the indemnitee, the judgment is not conclusive against him; but if he is notified and refuses to defend the action, he is estopped by the judgment. French v. Parish, 14 N. H. 496.

A judgment based on the breach of an agreement by a corporation to perform certain acts is not conclusive against the company's guarantors. Broadus v. Russell, 160 Ala. 353, 49 So. 327.

Where a sublessee has recovered a judgment against the lessee for damages resulting from failure of the landlord to perform a covenant in his lease, the landlord, who was not a party thereto, cannot technically be said to be concluded thereby, either as to the issues involved or the amount recovered. Feland v. Berry, 130 Ky. 328, 113 S. W. 425.

In an action on a bond to pay a debt and hold the indemnitee harmless, a judgment against the principal is not conclusive and does not operate as an estoppel against the surety, and he will be permitted to interpose any valid defense that would defeat plaintiff's case existing at the time the judgment was obtained. Browne v. French, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 445, 22 S. W. 581.

The guarantors of the payment of a bond and mortgage are not estopped from interposing the defense of extension of time of payment, by a judgment against the mortgagor, where they were not parties to the action in which it was rendered. Kane v. Cortesy, 100 N. Y. 132, 2 N. E. 874.

Where the assignor of a judgment guaranteed to the assignee a certain sum in case of the latter's failure to collect the judgment after prosecuting the judgment debtor to insolvency, and the judgment debtor set up payment and was successful, it was held that the record of the suit did not conclude the assignor, who had no notice thereof, from showing that the judgment assigned was a valid and subsisting judgment and that, had proper diligence been used in the conduct of the suit, the defense of payment would not have been successful. Woodward v. Moore, 13 Ohio St. 136.

An abutting owner who is not permitted to appear and defend an action against the city is not bound by the judgment entered against it. Lewiston v. Isaman, 19 Idaho, 653, 115 Pac. 494.

But where the party sought to be made liable over was sued as a joint defendant in the original action, and appeared therein, and the action against him was discontinued, he is not bound by the judgment rendered therein, in the absence of any notice to defend the action in its changed form. Boston v. Brooks, 187 Mass. 286, 73 N. E. 206.

Upon no principle can the party indemnifying be held liable where he has not had notice of the suit and an opportunity to defend given him. Thomas v. Hubbell, 18 Barb. 9.

In Eaton v. Lyman, 26 Wis. 61, it was held that grantor will not be bound by a judgment of eviction against his grantee, even after proper notice, if after judgment he is not permitted to pay costs and take a new trial as provided by statute. The court said: "Where a grantee seeks to conclude a grantor in an action on the covenants of the deed, by the result of the suit in which the grantee was ousted under an alleged paramount title, it should appear not only that the grantor was notified of the suit and requested to defend it, but that he was allowed to do so to the utmost extent of the law, if he desired to. Otherwise a defendant in ejectment might acquiesce in an erroneous result of a trial, and refuse his grantor an opportunity to correct it by appeal, and still conclude him by the judgment in an action on his covenants. This would be clearly unjust. And it would be equally so to allow the grantee to acquiesce arbitrarily in the result of a first trial in ejectment, and conclude his grantor by it, refusing the latter the privilege of taking the second trial allowed by the statute, and conducting the litigation farther."

The doctrine that where a person against whom suit is brought to recover damages is entitled to indemnity from another in case of being compelled to pay such damages, such other is bound by the judgment against such person if he be notified of the pendency of the suit and has an opportunity to defend against the same, does not apply to a case in which the indemnitor is first sued. If the indemnitor be first sued, the judgment in a subsequent suit by the same plaintiff against the indemnitee will not affect the plaintiff as to any question litigated in such first suit. Schaefer v. Fond du Lac, 99 Wis. 333, 41 L.R.A. 287, 74 N. W. 810.

Judgment no evidence whatever.

Other courts hold that the judgment, in the absence of notice, is no evidence whatever against the indemnitor.

If the property owner has had no notice of the suit against the city for damages sustained by reason of an unsafe sidewalk, a judgment against the city does not establish a liability against him. Catterlin v. Frankfort, 79 Ind. 547, 41 Am. Rep. 627.

The indemnitor not having had notice of the suit against the indemnitee, a judgment obtained therein is as to the indemnitor res inter alios acta. American Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Stoneman, 53 Minn. 212, 54 N. W. 1115.

A decree against the principal in an action to compel an accounting is not evidence against a guarantor unless he has had notice thereof and an opportunity to defend. Douglass v. Howland, 24 Wend. 35.

The record of a judgment against a tenant for rent is not evidence against one who has become surety for the rent, who was not a party to the action, and who had no notice to defend it. Giltinan v. Strong, 64 Pa. 242, reversing 7 Phila. 176.

In an action on a bond conditioned to support the poor of a town for a certain period, and to indemnify and save the town harmless from all "expenses, loss, or costs on account of such poor," a judgment against the town for the support of a pauper is as to the indemnitors having no notice thereof res inter alios acta. Castleton v. Miner, 8 Vt. 209.

In an action on a bond indemnifying a surety on the bond of a tax collector, a judgment against the tax collector's surety at the suit of the receiver general is no evidence of the amount of damages sustained by the collector's surety. King v. Norman, 4 C. B. 884, 17 L. J. C. P. N. S. 23, 11 Jur. 824. The court said that the judgment could not be used for such a purpose without holding that a stranger to a judgment, who has had no opportunity to cross-examine witnesses or to dispute the conclusions to be drawn from the evidence, can be bound by verdict where the judgment is after the verdict, or can be bound by an agreement made without his privity or intervention between the parties to the judgment where it is a judgment founded on agreement.

To what extent, evidence.

Where the judgment is conclusive or admissible against the sureties, the question arises of how far it may be conclusive or prima facie evidence against them.

It has been held that where a party has the right of recovery over secured to him, either by operation of law or express contract, and he has given the person so responsible due notice of the suit, the judgment, if obtained without fraud or collusion, will be conclusive evidence against such person of every fact established by it. Spencer v. Dearth, 43 Vt. 98.

A judgment against an indemnitee is conclusive upon the indemnitor as to the amount of the demand and the costs, where the indemnitor was notified of the suit and assumed to defend it, and where it was his own fault and his failure to fulfil his agreement in connection with the defense of the suit, which made the costs. Wright v. Whiting, 40 Barb. 235.

A judgment against the voucher is conclusive upon the vouchee as to such matters as the latter could have proved in defense of the judgment against the voucher. McArthur v. Ogletree, 4 Ga. App. 429, 61 S. E. 859.

Where one of the parties to a pending action claims that a third person is liable over to him in the event he loses in the suit, and vouches that person by notifying him of the pendency of the suit and giving him opportunity to appear therein, the judgment in that suit is conclusive on the person vouched as to the correctness of the judgment, but is not conclusive of the fact that there is such a relationship between the person vouched and the person vouching that a right of action over exists. Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Macon R. & Light Co. 9 Ga. App. 628, 71 S. E. 1076.

In case of eviction by force of judgment at law, with notice of the suit to the warrantor, the judgment, unless obtained by fraud, is plenary evidence of a paramount title. Hamilton v. Cutts, 4 Mass. 348, 3 Am. Dec. 222.

A judgment of eviction cannot be impeached in an action against the grantor on his covenants, who has been duly notified, merely by proof of mistake in the defense of the original suit, if the judgment is valid and free from fraud or collusion. Chamberlain v. Preble, 11 Allen, 370.

A judgment in an ejectment action is conclusive evidence of the breach of the covenant of title, if the grantor was duly notified of the suit against the grantee, and, where notice is not given, the defendant in the action on the covenant is precluded only from proving a good title to the land conveyed. The record is prima facie evidence of what is equivalent to an eviction, and also that the plaintiff did not fail to recover in consequence of any act or neglect of his. This is sufficient to support an action, unless the defendant shows good title in himself at the time of his conveyance to the plaintiff. Pitkin v. Leavitt, 13 Vt. 379.

If a covenantor to warrant and defend title be notified of the pendency of a suit in ejectment against the covenantee, the judgment against the latter is evidence against the former that the recovery was obtained by paramount title, and if the notice was sufficient, the judgment will be conclusive, unless it was obtained in consequence of some fact which occurred after the date of the covenant. Davenport v. Muir, 3 J. J. Marsh. 310, 20 Am. Dec. 143.

When a grantee has been evicted by virtue of a judgment recovered against him, that judgment is legally admissible to prove the fact of eviction, but not to prove the superior title of the recovering party. If the grantor, however, had notice of the suit and opportunity to appear and defend, it is evidence against him to prove the title of the recovering party. Hardy v. Nelson, 27 Me. 525

It is maintained in many cases that a judgment against a warrantee is prima facie evidence of both eviction and the infirmity of the title, even though the warrantor had no notice of the former litigation, in a suit by the warrantee against the warrantor upon the covenants in the deed. Ryerson v. Chapman, 66 Me. 557.

The record of a judgment against the maker of a note is admissible against the guarantor to prove that such judgment had been rendered, especially where the notice of the pendency of the action was given him; but whether the judgment was upon the merits of the case, whether the same point was in issue, is a necessary matter of inquiry, and open to proof by parol evidence. Robinson v. Lane, 14 Smedes & M. 161.

In an action by an indorsee against one who has indorsed and delivered to him a negotiable promissory note in the usual course of business, to recover the amount which he has been adjudged to pay in consequence of a forgery of the signature of a prior indorser, the plaintiff having given to the defendant timely notice of the pendency of the suit in which such judgment was recovered, and an opportunity to defend,—such former judgment is conclusive with respect to the forgery. First Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 68 Ohio St. 43, 67 N. E. 91.

In Conner v. Reeves, 103 N. Y. 527, 9 N. E. 439, affirming 35 Hun, 507, the court said: "The covenantor in an action on a covenant of general indemnity against judgments is concluded by the judgment recovered against the covenantee, from questioning the existence or extent of the covenantee's liability in the action in which it was rendered. The recovery of a judgment is the event against which he covenanted, and it would contravene the manifest intention and purpose of the indemnity to make the right of the covenantee to maintain an action on the covenant to depend upon the result of the retrial of an issue which as against the covenantee, had been conclusively determined in the former action, 'always, however, saving the right, as the law must in every case where the suit is between third persons, to contest the proceeding on the ground of fraudulent collusion for the purpose of charging the surety.'"

Where the undertaking of a surety was that buildings should be erected by his principal upon certain real property, and the same turned over free from encumbrance, proper records showing the filing of claims for mechanic's liens, and a decree establishing the same as claimed, are admissible as proof of the existence of liens against the property in a suit against the surety on his undertaking, notwithstanding the fact that such surety was neither named in, nor made a party to, the proceedings evidenced by such records. Comstock v. Cameron, 41 Neb. 814, 60 N. W. 105.

upon which it was founded, where the conditions of the bond sued upon bind the obligors to keep the obligees harmless and indemnified "from and against all and every claim, demand, judgment, liens, mechanics' liens, costs, and fees of every description incurred in suits or otherwise, against the building erected under said contract, and to repay to the obligees all sums of money which they may pay to other persons on account of work and labor done or materials furnished on or for said building." Oberbeck v. Mayer, 59 Mo. App. 289.

In an action by the owner of a canal to hold contractors liable for damages sustained by property owners due to the negligent carrying on of the work of construction, under a contract by which the contractors agreed to save the canal owner harmless, judgments obtained against the indemnitee for such neglect are admissible against the indemnitors, and are conclusive in so far as, and to the extent to which, they were rendered on account of the work done or omitted to be done by the contractors or indemnitors, where it appeared that the contractors had notice of the commencement of the action, and were requested to defend, but neglected to do so. Lake Drummond Canal & Water Co. v. West End Trust & S. D. Co. 73 C. C. A. 227, 142 Fed. 41.

But the judgment cannot be extended beyond the issue necessarily determined by it, nor is the person who is responsible over precluded from setting up any defense which, from the nature of the action or the pleadings, he could have interposed in the first litigation, had he been a formal party to it. Fowler v. Jersey Shore, 17 Pa. Super. Ct. 366.

One who guarantees that all wines supplied to his principal "shall be duly paid for" is not bound as to the amount of his liability by an award of arbitrators provided for in the agreement between his principal and the seller. Ex parte Young, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 824, L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 668, 45 L. T. N. S. 90.

Where the amount of the judgment was determined by agreement without securing the consent of the indemnitor, this was held to reduce the judgment from conclusive to prima facie evidence only of his liability and the amount thereof, and to afford him the opportunity of showing either that the judgment was procured by fraudulent collusion, was not founded upon a legal liability, or that it exceeded such liability. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Southern R. News Co. 151 Mo. 373, 42 L.R.A. 380, 74 Am. St. Rep. 545, 52 S. W. 205.

Personal injuries.

It is a well-settled general rule that, when one who has a right to recover over is sued, the judgment regularly rendered against him is conclusive upon the person liable over, provided notice of the suit be given to the latter and full opportunity afforded him to make defense. But when the liability over is not as broad as the original liability, the plaintiff in the suit to recover over, if he relies on the adjudication made in the former case, must show that the very ground of liability against the indemnitor was found to exist, and was necessarily adjudicated, in the original suit. The estoppel created by the first judgment cannot extend beyond the questions necessarily determined by it. B. Roth Tool Co. v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co. 88 C. C. A. 569, 161 Fed. 709.

If a property owner through whose negligence a person is injured by reason of a dangerous sidewalk is notified of the action against the city for damages, he is concluded by the judgment against the corporation as to all questions adjudicated in that action. McNaughton v. Elkhart, 85 Ind. 384; Elkhart v. Wickwire, 87 Ind. 77.

A judgment obtained against a municipal corporation for injuries caused by a defect or obstruction in a highway is conclusive evidence of its necessary facts, if a subsequent action be brought by the municipality against a third person who was the author of the defect or nuisance, and who, having been legally notified of the first suit, is liable over. Fowler v. Jersey Shore, supra.

A judgment against a city for damages due to a dangerous street obstruction erected by an abutting owner is conclusive against the latter duly vouched into court, as to the amount and the right of the plaintiff to recover in the suit against the city, and as to all defenses that either the municipality or the party vouched could have set up in the first suit, and which were actually set up and passed upon in that suit. Byne v. Americus, 6 Ga. App. 48, 64 S. E. 285.

Where a railroad company through whose negligence in maintaining the approach to a bridge, a person was injured, had timely notice of the bringing of a suit against a village therefor, and was notified to take charge of the defense, it was held that a judgment against the village was conclusive against the company, so far as the right of the injured person to recover was concerned. Port Jervis v. Erie R. Co. 59 Misc. 623, 111 N. Y. Supp. 851.

Where a railroad company liable over to a city for damages arising from personal injuries received by falling into an unguarded excavation has been duly vouched to appear and defend, the judgment against the municipality is conclusive upon the company on the question of its negligence, if that fact was necessarily determined in the original action. District of Columbia v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. 1 Mackey, 314.

One who has been prosecuted to judgment upon a cause of action based upon the negligent act of another who owed a duty to him, where such other party has been called in to defend, and has actually assumed the conduct of the defense, may sue such other party for indemnity, and rest his case in respect of the question of negligence upon proof of the former adjudication, it being shown that it was in consequence of such negligence that the former 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) judgment was rendered. Lawrence v. Stearns, 79 Fed. 878.

Where a judgment has been obtained against a town for injuries due to a defect in a highway caused by the negligence of a railway company, which had notice of the suit and an opportunity to defend its interests, the judgment is conclusive in an action by the town against the company, on the question whether the highway was defective in the manner alleged. Waterbury v. Waterbury Traction Co. 74 Conn. 152, 50 Atl. 3.

A judgment against a city for the maintenance of a dangerous sidewalk is conclusive as to the dangerous condition of the walk, upon the property owner who permitted the condition to exist, and who was called in to defend. Bloomington v. Roush, 13 Ill. App. 339.

When a suit is brought against a city for damages caused by the act of one who obstructs or excavates in the street, and such person has notice of the suit, the judgment will be conclusive against him in an action by the city to recover the amount it has been compelled to pay, so far as relates to all matters necessarily included in the adjudication,—such as that the person was injured at the place alleged, without fault on his part, and that damages were sustained to the amount of the judgment, and that the excavation was wrongfully and negligently permitted to remain uncovered and unguarded. Todd v. Chicago, 18 Ill. App. 565.

A judgment against a city for an injury received by reason of a defective highway is conclusive against a tenant of the abutting land in an action over by the city, as to the defective condition of the highway, as to the care used by the injured person, and as to the amount of his damage, where the tenant has had notice of the action upon which the judgment was founded. Boston v. Worthington, 10 Gray, 496, 71 Am. Dec. 678.

A judgment for the plaintiff in an action against a city for injuries received by the overturning of a sleigh in one of its streets, due to the negligence of a railroad company in laying its tracks, is conclusive against the company in an action over, as to the extent of the damages, as to the dangerous character of the street, and as to the freedom of the person injured from contributory negligence, where the company was requested to defend, but declined. Troy v. Troy & L. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 657.

A judgment against a city for personal injuries caused by an obstruction placed in a street by a contractor is conclusive against the contractors and their sureties in an action over against them by the city, as to the amount of damages, the existence of the defect or obstruction in the street, and as to the freedom of the person injured from contributory negligence, where both the contractors and the sureties had timely notice of the suit, and that it was brought for the purpose of obtaining judgment against the city for an act of the contractors, and that they were required to come in and defend. New York v. Brady, 151 N. Y. 611, 45 N. E. 1122.

The party liable over to a city against which a judgment has been recovered for injuries due to negligence, who has been given due notice of the original action, is concluded as to any matter which might have been urged as a defense against such liability, and evidence that the person injured was guilty of contributory negligence is not receivable. The primary liability, however, must be established. Rochester v. Montgomery, 72 N. Y. 65.

A judgment against a city for personal injuries caused by the collapse of a temporary bridge in a highway, due to the negligence of contractors employed by an abutting owner, is conclusive in an action over by the city against the defendant, who was properly vouched in, as to the amount of damages, the extent of the defect, and as to the fact that the injured person was free from negligence. New York v. Corn, 133 App. Div. 1, 117 N. Y. Supp. 514.

A judgment obtained against a borough for personal injuries due to a defective highway is conclusive evidence of the existence of the defect in the highway, and of the injury to the individual hurt while in the exercise of due care, and of the amount of the damages. Fowler v. Jersey Shore, 17 Pa. Super. Ct. 366.

Where a judgment was obtained against a city for personal injuries caused by a defective sidewalk, it was held conclusive of the existence of the defect in the street, and of the primary liability of the city therefor, and of the fact that the plaintiff in the original action was injured without contributory negligence, and of the amount of the judgment, in an action by the city to hold the contractor and his sureties liable on a bond to indemnify the city, where notice of the original action and an opportunity to defend were given to the contractor and his sureties, and nothing remained to be proved by the city except that the contractors were responsible for the defect for which the recovery was had. Seattle v. Regan, 52 Wash. 262, 132 Am. St. Rep. 963, 100 Pac. 731.

In an action against an indemnitor to recover over after a judgment against a city for the killing of a boy as the result of defective wire insulation, contributory negligence of the deceased is not a defense, in the absence of bad faith on the part of the city in not presenting that defense in the original action. Owensboro v. Westinghouse, C. K. & Co. 91 C. C. A. 335, 165 Fed. 385.

In an action by a town against those by whom an excavation causing an injury was made, the verdict and judgment after notice, are conclusive evidence of the existence of the defect in the highway, the injury to the individual while he was in the exercise of due care, and the amount of the injury. Portland v. Richardson, 54 Me. 46, 89 Am. Dec. 720.

the first action and the party sought to be held liable over, the latter is primarily liable for the damages occasioned to the person injured, must be determined by evidence outside of the record of the first action. The judgment is not conclusive as to the liability of the defendant in the second action. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. v. Compania Transatlantica Espanola, 134 N. Y. 461, 30 Am. St. Rep. 685, 31 N. E. 987.

Where there was a judgment against a city for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the city in permitting a plank to be taken up from the sidewalk so as to make it dangerous, a judgment for the plaintiff obtained therein was held not conclusive on the property owner on the question of the latter's negligence, the negligence of the city being the only question at issue in the original action. Lansing v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 129 Mich. 403, 89 N. W. 54.

A judgment against a city for personal injuries claimed to be due to the negligence of a railroad company in failing to remove snow from its tracks is competent evidence against the company in an action over by the city against it, and an estoppel except as to the question whether the injury happened by the negligence of the railroad company. Troy v. Troy & L. R. Co. 3 Lans. 270.

When indemnity is sought by a city which has been adjudged liable for damages arising from negligence of a contractor primarily liable therefor, a judgment against the city, in an action against the contractor, is evidence that the city was liable for the damages, and, when notice has been given to defend, of the amount of damage arising from the injury; but it does not establish which of the parties is primarily liable. New York v. Brady, 70 Hun, 250, 24 N. Y. Supp. 296, second appeal, 77 Hun, 241, 28 N. Y. Supp. 324.

As a general rule, when indemnity is sought by one who has been adjudged liable for damages arising from negligence for which another, as between themselves, is primarily liable, the judgment in the action against the former is evidence in the action brought for indemnity, that the defendant in the first action, plaintiff in the second, was liable for the damages, and, when notice has been given to defend, of the amount of the damages arising from the injury; but it does not establish which of the wrongdoers is primarily liable, unless that question was in issue and decided. Lexington v. Aetna Indemnity Co. 155 N. C. 219, 71 S. E. 214.

A judgment against a city for personal injuries due to a dangerous condition of the street concludes the person liable over, who has been given reasonable notice and opportunity to defend, as to all matters necessary to establish the liability of the city, to the person injured, and as to any matter which might have been urged as a defense by the city against such liability. Unless, however, it appears that evidence showing the liability of the alleged indemnitor was necessarily involved in the determination of the original action, and passed upon by the trial court in rendering judgment, the defendant is not concluded upon the point that, notwithstanding the liability of the city, he was not at fault, and has not failed in any duty which he owed to the city or the person injured, and he may plead and show such facts as a defense upon the trial. Grand Forks v. Paulsness, 19 N. D. 293, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 123 N. W. 878.

The party sought to be held liable over is not estopped by the first judgment from showing that he was not the owner of the premises upon which the accident occurred, and that he was under no obligation to keep them safe, and that the accident did not result from his neglect of duty. Fowler v. Jersey Shore, 17 Pa. Super. Co. 366.

Where a city was held liable for personal injuries received by a person falling over a plank negligently extended over a sidewalk, the judgment is not res judicata as to the ultimate liability of the contractor alleged to have been responsible for the obstruction. The judgment against the city is conclusive only as to the fact of the injury, that the city was guilty of negligence, and as to the amount of the recovery. In this case the contractor was sued jointly with the city, and the action was dismissed as to him, on the plea of the statute of limitations. Richmond v. Sitterding, 101 Va. 354, 65 L.R.A. 445, 99 Am. St. Rep. 879, 43 S. E. 562.

The person sought to be made liable over to a municipal corporation is not estopped by a judgment against the corporation, from showing that he was under no obligation to keep the street in which the accident happened in a safe condition, and that it was not through his fault that the accident occurred. Chicago v. Robbins, 2 Black, 418, 17 L. ed. 298.

If the lot owner has notice of the action against the city for injury due to a defective sidewalk, the judgment is conclusive upon him as to the fact, cause, and extent of the injury, but not as to the responsibility of the lot owner for such cause. Lincoln v. First Nat. Bank, 67 Neb. 401, 60 L.R.A. 923, 108 Am. St. Rep. 690, 93 N. W. 698.

b. Sheriff's bonds.

Bonds indemnifying sheriffs, constables, and similar officers in particular cases are governed by the same rules that apply to other indemnity contracts, in respect to the effect of judgments against such officers in actions against their indemnitors.

If the indemnitor of a sheriff on the levy of an execution has seasonable notice of the suit against the sheriff for a wrongful levy, judgment obtained therein is conclusive against him; but if he has not had such notice, judgment is only prima facie evidence against him. Train v. Gold, 5 Pick. 380.

The judgment against a constable is conclusive in an action by a constable against his indemnitor, the latter having had notice of the original action and an opportunity to defend. Miller v. Rhoades, 20 Ohio St. 494.

A judgment against a sheriff is conclusive as to his right to recover from his indemnitors. Moore v. McSleeper, 102 Cal. 277, 36 Pac. 593.

A judgment against a sheriff for wrongful seizure of property is conclusive against his indemnitors. Woodworth v. Gorsline, 30 Colo. 186, 58 L.R.A. 417, 69 Pac. 705.

The indemnitors, having notice to defend, are concluded by the judgment against a sheriff, their principal, under the California Civil Code, § 2778, subd. 5. Showers v. Wadsworth, 81 Cal. 270, 22 Pac. 663.

In an action on a sheriff's indemnity bond, a judgment against the sheriff is binding upon the obligors who participated in the defense of the action against the sheriff. Meyer v. Purcell, 214 Ill. 62, 73 N. E. 392, affirming 114 Ill. App. 472.

Where the surety indemnifies an officer in a sale of property under execution, a judgment is conclusive against the surety having notice of the suit against the officer. Jones v. Henry, 3 Litt. (Ky.) 427. The court said: "The meaning of the undertaking is that he will undertake for the officer to pay all that shall be recovered for the act against the consequences of which the officer is indemnified, and thus the obligor stipulates to become party and to be bound by all legal proceedings against the officer; and to avoid the effect of this stipulation, it would be incumbent upon him to show that there was some fraud or collusion in obtaining the recovery, or at all events that he had no notice of it."

A judgment against a sheriff for the escape of a prisoner is conclusive evidence for the plaintiff in an action on a bond taken for his security on the granting of the liberties of the jail to the prisoner on execution. Kip v. Brigham, 7 Johns. 168.

Where a judgment has been recovered against a sheriff for an escape, the postea is evidence without the judgment to prove actual damages at least, if not the escape; and the sheriff may recover the amount of the debt and the costs in the original suit, and also the costs of the action against him for the escape. Ibid.

In an action on a bond given as security for jail liberties, the record of a recovery against the sheriff for an escape, after notice to the sureties and their assumption of the defense, is conclusive that the plaintiff in an action on the bond has been damnified, and to that extent. Ibid.

In a Nebraska case the court says: "The conclusion we have reached is that in an action against the sureties on a bond given to a sheriff to indemnify him against judgments to which he shall be a party, the judgment recovered against the officer is conclusive against the sureties, although they had no notice of the pendency of the action in which the judgment was obtained. When it is shown that their principal defended the suit for the officer, the obligation being to indemnify the sheriff "from all harm, trouble, damages, costs, suits, actions, judgments, and executions that shall or may arise, come, or be brought against him." Pasewalk v. Bollman, 29 Neb. 519, 28 Am. St. Rep. 399, 45 N. W. 780. The court further said: "The sureties undertook to save the officer harmless from any judgment that might be recovered against him by reason of the levying of the executions. It was no part of the agreement that the sureties should be notified of the pendency of the action. If the sureties desired notice of the proceedings to obtain the judgment, they should have stipulated for it in the bond if indemnity; not having done so, the failure to receive such notice does not affect their liability. They agreed absolutely to be bound by any judgment rendered against the officer."

In a suit on a bond indemnifying a sheriff against damages to third persons claiming title to property levied upon under attachment, and to save him harmless from any judgment which might be obtained against him with reference thereto, the sureties are concluded by a judgment against the sheriff, in the absence of any question of fraud or collusion. Flack v. Thaxter (com. pl.) 44 N. Y. S. R. 107, 17 N. Y. Supp. 350, affirming 39 N. Y. S. R. 197, 14 N. Y. Supp. 366.

The indemnitor of a constable making sale of a chattel upon execution, not having notice of the suit against the constable in which title was established in a third person, is not bound by the judgment obtained therein on that question. The judgment is no evidence against him on the question of title. Burrill v. West, 2 N. H. 190.

A judgment against a constable for not collecting an execution would not be conclusive against a town in an action over to hold it liable, if the town had no notice of the suit. Bramble v. Poultney, 11 Vt. 208.

Where no notice is given to the sheriff's sureties of an action against him for a false return, the judgment is only prima facie evidence of the amount to be recovered. State use of Fulton v. Colerick, 3 Ohio, 487. The court said: "We take the distinction to be that where the sureties have notice of the suit, and may or do make defense, the judgment against the principal is conclusive against them. Where such notice is not given, the judgment against the principal is prima facie only. It may be impeached for collusion or for mistake. But until so impeached, it is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover the amount for which it is rendered."

A judgment against a constable for the wrongful taking of goods in replevin is only prima facie evidence against his sureties in an action on the official bond, where the sureties had no notice of the suit against their principal, and while, in the absence of other evidence, it will authorize a recovery against them, they have the right not only to attack the judgment for fraud or collusion, but also to open up an inquiry on the merits. State use of Story v. Jennings, 14 Ohio St. 73.

as to the question whether the sureties gave the indemnity, whether the judgment was fairly obtained, or whether it was rendered for the matter to which the indemnity applied. New Haven v. Chidsey, 68 Conn. 397, 38 Atl. 800. In this case the judgment did not show whether the neglect of the duty complained of was a breach of the bond in suit or of another bond.

In an action on a bond indemnifying the sheriff on the sale of goods on execution, it was held that the record of the suit against the sheriff was proper evidence to show that the very thing had happened which the surety contracted that his principal should not allow to happen, but that it was not conclusive of the amount, for the surety might have shown that the amount was increased by reason of some fault of the sheriff for which the bond was not intended to secure him. Huzzard v. Nagle, 40 Pa. 178.

Actions against deputies.

A judgment against the sheriff for the default of his deputy, who defended the action, is conclusive upon the deputy's sureties, although they had no notice of the suit, under a bond to indemnify and save the sheriff harmless from all actions, costs, damages, and expenses on account of the wrongful conduct of the deputy. Chamberlain v. Godfrey, 38 Vt. 380, 84 Am. Dec. 690.

The sureties on a deputy sheriff's bond indemnifying the sheriff for a default of the deputy are bound by the judgment against the sheriff for such default, if notice thereof is given to the deputy, although not to them. Fay v. Ames, 44 Barb. 327. The court said: "The defendants being jointly bound to indemnify the plaintiff, they were in privity of contract with each other, and are to be regarded and treated, quoad the contract and the rights and liabilities connected with and growing out of it, as one person. In such a case notice to one is notice to all, on the same principle as where two or more persons are shown to be jointly bound by a contract, the acts and admissions of either are binding upon all the others, to the same extent as upon the one doing the acts or making the admissions. . . . If, in addition to giving notice to the deputy, notice had been given to the sureties also, it would have been little more than an idle and useless ceremony, as it is to be presumed that all they would or could have done would have been to refer the matter to their principal, the deputy, and cast the burthen of the defense upon him, as the sheriff has done."

A judgment against a marshal for the taking of insufficient bail by his deputy is conclusive against the sureties on the bond of the deputy, where notified of the original suit and authorized to defend. Hand v. Taylor, 4 Ind. 409.

In a proceeding by a high sheriff against his deputy for failure to collect an account for county tax levies, which went into his hands, it is not incumbent upon the sheriff to do more than produce the record of the judgment showing that he had been subjected to liability in consequence of the default of his deputy; and it appearing that the deputy was informed of the motion against his principal, and failed to defend it, he is estopped to deny his delinquency or his liability. Lee County v. Fulkerson, 21 Gratt. 182.

In an action by a sheriff against his deputy and the sureties of the deputy on the official bond of the deputy, to recover the amount of a judgment rendered against the sheriff for the default of the deputy in not duly accounting for money made by the latter under execution, a judgment rendered against the sheriff, the deputy having attended the trial and made full defense to the action, is binding and conclusive upon him and his sureties, in the action of the sheriff against them, where the bond provides that the deputy "shall, in all things, well and truly and faithfully discharge the duties of his said office of deputy sheriff during his continuance therein," and also that he "shall, in all respects, indemnify and save harmless the sheriff and all other persons, whom any loss and damage in any wise arising from the conduct of the said deputy in the said office." Crawford v. Turk, 24 Gratt. 176. The court said that the deputy's sureties have no right to require the sheriff to do more than to notify the deputy to defend the action, and having done that, the sheriff may leave the defense of the action to the deputy; and may look to the deputy and his sureties for full and complete indemnity against any judgment which may be recovered in the action, and against the costs of defending it. The court declared that, according to the true intent and meaning of the bond, it binds the sureties as well as the deputy, to pay such a judgment in exoneration of the sheriff. Without doing so, the deputy will not in all respects indemnify and save harmless the sheriff from all loss and damages in any suit arising from the conduct of the deputy in his said office, for which he and his sureties expressly bound themselves, jointly and severally, to the sheriff.

In an action on a bond to indemnify a sheriff for the misconduct and default of his deputy, a judgment against the sheriff is admissible against the sureties, both as to the liability and the amount thereof, where they had notice of the pendency of the action. Kettle v. Lipe, 6 Barb. 467.

A judgment against a sheriff or his representative, for a default of his deputy, in the absence of all other proof, furnishes prima facie evidence against the deputy and his sureties of the facts therein recited. Cox v. Thomas, 9 Gratt. 323.

Where judgment has been obtained against a sheriff for the default of his deputy, and the deputy has had notice of the suit, such judgment is prima facie evidence of the deputy's default as against the deputy's sureties, in an action on the dep-uty's bond. Westervelt v. Smith, 2 Duer, 449.

A judgment against a sheriff in an action for a default of his deputy, of which the deputy had notice, but of which the deputy's sureties had not, is at least prima facie evidence against the sureties in an action on the bond, of the plaintiff's right to recover, and as to the amount he is entitled to recover. Stephens v. Shafer, 48 Wis. 54, 33 Am. Rep. 793, 3 N. W. 835.

In Beall v. Beck, 3 Har. & M'H. 242, a judgment in favor of a sheriff against his deputy for the default of the latter was held inadmissible in a subsequent action against the deputy and his surety on the bond.

The sureties on a deputy sheriff's bond are not concluded by a judgment against a sheriff in a suit of which they had no notice or opportunity to defend, although their principal had notice of the suit. Thomas v. Hubbell, 35 N. Y. 120.

The sureties on a deputy's sheriff's bond conditioned that he will do his duty as such officer, who have no notice of an action against the sheriff for the deputy's default, are not concluded by the judgment rendered therein. Thomas v. Hubbell, 15 N. Y. 405, 69 Am. Dec. 619, reversing 18 Barb. 9.

A judgment against a sheriff for failure to account for part of the revenue taxes is not admissible against a deputy and his sureties, the latter not being parties thereto; and a statute which gives a remedy by motion to a sheriff against his deputy makes the deputy equally liable to the same extent, whether the commonwealth has obtained a judgment against the principal or not. Johnson v. Thompson, 4 Bibb. 294.

c. Miscellaneous obligations.

A judgment against the principal is conclusive against a guarantor who had notice of the pendency of the action, and was present at the trial, and could have defended the action had he seen fit to do so. Blanding v. Cohen, 101 App. Div. 442, 92 N. Y. Supp. 93, affirmed in 184 N. Y. 538, 76 N. E. 1089.

If the guarantor of a note has notice of an action against the guarantee, the judgment concludes him. Without notice, it is prima facie evidence only. Ayres v. Findley, 1 Pa. St. 501.

Where a city has been sued for damages caused by a defective sidewalk, and the property owner upon notification appears and assists in the defense, he is bound by the judgment, and cannot, in an action over against him, litigate any of the questions involved in the first suit. McDonald v. Lockport, 28 Ill. App. 157.

If a railroad company, responsible for the dangerous condition of a highway, is notified of an action against a municipal corporation for damages occasioned thereby, and requested to defend, it is bound by the judgment against the municipality as to the cause of the injury and the extent of the damage. Veazie v. Penobscot R. Co. 49 Me. 119.

Where the negligence of the contractor consisted in failure to erect proper barricades or barriers in the street, it was held that a judgment against the city in the original action, of which the contractor had notice, was conclusive in an action over based upon the latter's contract of indemnity, although the city inspector was on the ground during the time the work was in progress, and gave no directions as to the erection of any barricades or barriers, and seemed to be satisfied with the condition of the street, and although the erection of the barricades would have closed the street to traffic, and although it was really for the benefit of the city that the barriers were not erected. Seattle v. Saulez, 47 Wash. 365, 92 Pac. 140.

A judgment against the owner for damages done to a tenant by the negligence of a builder is conclusive against the contractor having notice to defend, in a subsequent action by the owner against the contractor to recover therefor. Katterjohn v. Nahm, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 727, 106 S. W. 1179.

In an action by a property owner against a builder liable over for his negligence in failing properly to guard an area of the building, a judgment against the owner by default is conclusive against the builder, who is shown to have had notice thereof and who agreed to "take care of" it. Mackey v. Fisher, 36 Minn. 347, 31 N. W. 363.

Where the charterers of a steamship, without fault on their part, were adjudged liable for damages caused by the collapse of a pier, such judgment was held to establish the liability over to them of the owners of the pier. Vogemann v. American Dock & Trust Co. 131 App. Div. 216, 115 N. Y. Supp. 741.

A judgment against a master for damages due to the negligence of his servant is evidence against the servant, who was notified and who was a witness in the case in which the master was condemned to pay damages. Costa v. Yochim, 104 La. 170, 28 So. 992.

Where a title guaranteed by covenant is assailed by action, upon a ground which, if adjudged valid, would involve infringement of the covenant, the holder of such title, on being so sued, may give proper notice to the covenantor and require him to defend; and having done this, if the case in which notice is given results adversely to him, and he thereupon sues on the covenant, he will be relieved from making proof, except by the judgment itself, of the truth and force of what was there adjudged. Mason v. Kellogg, 38 Mich. 132.

Where one not a party to an action that involves the title to property is bound to answer to the defendant for the title which he is called on to defend, the latter may call upon the former to defend it in the action; and, in such event, the judgment is conclusive against the third person in favor of such defendant on the question of title. Hersey v. Long, 30 Minn. 114, 14 N. W. 508. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

An eviction by a paramount title is prima facie evidence in favor of the warrantee in a suit on the warranty. And if the warrantee takes the precaution to vouch or call in the warrantor to warrant and defend the title, the recovery in ejectment is conclusive. Paul v. Witman, 3 Watts & S. 409.

If the grantor has notice of the former suit and an opportunity to defend, then, in the absence of fraud or collusion, the judgment in the former suit is conclusive against him. Ryerson v. Chapman, 66 Me. 557.

Upon proper and sufficient notice being given to the covenantor by the covenantee, of a suit of eviction, requiring him to appear and defend, he will be bound by the judgment establishing a paramount title, and no other proof of the paramount title will be required. Williams v. Burg, 9 Lea, 455.

A decree or verdict against a vendor on the warranty of a personal chattel, in favor of the vendee, is conclusive against a prior vendor who has been vouched. Davis v. Wilbourne, 1 Hill, L. 27, 26 Am. Dec. 154. The court said: "The notice to the warrantor makes him a privy to the record, and he is bound by it to the extent to which his rights have been tried and adjudged; and in an action against him at the suit of the warrantee, in addition to the record, all that is necessary to be shown is that his title was in issue, and judgment given upon it."

In an action on a bond to indemnify a plaintiff against mechanic's liens, a surety having interposed an answer for the indemnitee, and having conducted the defense in an action as attorney for the latter and for his principal, is concluded by the judgment in the lien actions. Reed v. McGregor, 62 Minn. 94, 64 N. W. 88.

Where a surety in a contract of indemnity against liens resulting from the failure of his principal, a building contractor, to pay debts incurred in the construction of a building, is notified of an action against the obligee to enforce such liens, and assumes charge of and conducts the litigation to its final determination, the judgment therein is final and conclusive against him as to the nature and extent of the liability of the obligee. Great Northern R. Co. v. Akeley, 88 Minn. 237, 92 N. W. 959.

The sureties are conclusively bound by judgments in a mechanics' lien action, the condition of their obligation being that their principal would pay all claims for labor and material necessary for the construction of the building, and would protect the owner's property from all judgment liens or mechanics' liens, and that if the principal failed, the sureties would be liable. McFall v. Dempsey, 43 Mo. App. 369.

A surety who guarantees the faithful performance of a building contract which requires the contractor to furnish all materials, and who has notice of an action to foreclose a mechanics' lien for materials furnished the contractor, is bound by the judgment obtained in good faith against the latter. Friend v. Ralston, 35 Wash. 422, 77 Pac. 794; Henry v. Aetna Indemnity Co. 36 Wash. 553, 79 Pac. 42.

A judgment in a mechanics' lien action is conclusive against the sureties in an action on the bond to dissolve the lien. Ruggles v. Bernstein, 188 Mass. 232, 74 N. E. 366.

Where the United States government has recovered back money paid to redeem notes, on the ground that they were counterfeit, and the person from whom the vendor purchased the notes was given notice of the suit and of the claim of the government that they were forged, and that the vendor of the government would look to the original vendor for repayment and for indemnity in case judgment should be rendered in favor of the government,—the judgment is conclusive in an action over as to the genuineness of the notes. Heiser v. Hatch, 86 N. Y. 614.

The indemnitors of a garnishee defending a subsequent action brought by a creditor of the garnishee to recover on the same cause of action on which the judgment in the garnishment proceeding was rendered are bound by the judgment therein. Lucy v. Price, 39 Iowa, 26.

The sureties on a contractor's bond are not concluded by a judgment against their principal in an action to which they were not parties, in the absence of a contract so stipulating. McConnell v. Poor, 113 Iowa, 133, 52 L.R.A. 312, 84 N. W. 968.

A judgment against a contractor in an action to establish a mechanics' lien is prima facie evidence of the existence of such lien, as against the sureties. La Fayette Mut. Bldg. Assn. v. Kleinhoffer, 40 Mo. App. 388.

A judgment obtained without fraud against the sureties on a contractor's bond is prima facie evidence in an action on an underwriter's bond as to the liability of the defendants. Brown & H. Co. v. Ligon, 92 Fed. 851.

Even if the contractor is not a party to a decree declaring liens upon the property of the owner, and requiring payment of the amounts thereof, it is admissible in evidence against him in an action on his bond breached by the filing of the liens. Whelan v. McCullough, 4 App. D. C. 58. The court said: "The surety may, of course, be allowed to show, if he can, that the subject-matter of the judgment or decree against the principal was not within the scope or operation of the contract of suretyship, or that there had been collusion or fraud in obtaining the judgment or decree. But if the claims recovered against the principal, or for which he is bound, as in this case, are such as are embraced in the contract of suretyship, in the absence of fraud or collusion, the surety is equally bound as the principal."

As a general rule a judgment against an insurance company, if no fraud or collusion is shown, is evidence against the surety on a bond executed by the company for the benefit of the policy holders. Baxter County 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Bank v. Ozark Ins. Co. 98 Ark. 143, 135 S. W. 819.

A judgment against an insurance company on a policy is prima facie evidence against its sureties on the bond to indemnify policy holders, in the absence of fraud or collusion. Union Guaranty & T. Co. v. Robinson, 24 C. C. A. 650, 49 U. S. App. 148, 79 Fed. 420.

A judgment against an insurance company, if no fraud or collusion is shown, is evidence against the surety on a bond executed by the company for the benefit of the policy holders. But the suit against the company cannot be based upon an issue as to liability not covered by the obligation of the bond itself. Ingle v. Batesville Grocery Co. 89 Ark. 378, 117 S. W. 241.

The sureties on a promissory note are not concluded by a judgment of the county court allowing the claim on the note against the estate of their deceased principal, as to the question whether the claim was presented within the time acquired by law therefor. Curry v. Mack, 90 Ill. 606.

The surety for the seller of a promissory note is not concluded by a judgment procured by an accommodation indorser against the maker fixing the amount due on the note, from setting up the defense of usury, although that defense was litigated in the original suit against the principal, where the surety was not a party to the suit and had no notice of it. Germain v. Wing, 1 Sheldon, 441.

In the absence of fraud or collusion shown, or a clerical error in entering the judgment, a judgment against the principal is conclusive against the surety, though he be not a party to the suit, if he have notice of the proceeding, or, at least, where he has been a party defendant, and has filed an answer, though before trial the suit be dismissed as to him. Stoops v. Wittler, 1 Mo. App. 420.

A record of proceedings in bankruptcy against the maker of a promissory note is res inter alios acta in a subsequent action by the payee against the surety. Kennedy v. Moore, 17 S. C. 464.

A statutory surety for the payment of damages resulting from the negligent conduct of a driver is concluded by the judgment as to the amount of damages, but not as to fraud or as to the question of whether his principal was master. Levick v. Norton, 51 Conn. 461.

A judgment against a debtor is not binding on one who has not contracted to save him harmless from the debt, unless he has been notified to come in and defend. Busell Trimmer Co. v. Coburn, 188 Mass. 254, 69 L.R.A. 821, 74 N. E. 334.

So, on a contract to assume charge of an attachment suit, and to save a plaintiff harmless from all costs, where judgment was rendered against the plaintiff in the attachment action for costs, and where the defendant had notice of the taxation of costs, and made no effort to have them re-taxed, it was held that he could not thereafter, in an action for reimbursement, attack the correctness of the taxation of costs. Morgan v. North Texas Nat. Bank, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 34 S. W. 138.

A decree of foreclosure of a purchase price mortgage is not evidence that the sale was not rescinded, as against a surety not a party thereto, in an action to recover the balance of the purchase money. Arrington v. Porter, 47 Ala. 714.

A mere surety for the payment of a debt, without any agreement, express or implied, to be bound by a suit between the principal parties, is, at common law, no more affected by its event, if against him, than a mere stranger; and the rule is not affected by the fact that the suit was conducted on the part of the principal exclusively by the surety as his agent. Jackson v. Griswold, 4 Hill, 522.

In an action on a contract guarantying payment of rent by a tenant, a judgment against the tenant, after the assignment by him of the lease, does not conclude the guarantor from setting up the claim that he was discharged from liability by the assignment of the lease. Fleck v. Feldman, 54 Misc. 223, 104 N. Y. Supp. 366.

A surety on a bond given for security for the purchase price of land cannot, after an order unappealed from dissolving an injunction given the purchaser for want of title, obtain another injunction on the same ground. Ross v. Woodville, 4 Munf. (Va.) 324.

d. Notice.

The purpose of giving notice to the indemnitor is to bind him by the judgment. Smith v. Compton, 3 Barn. & Ad. 407, 1 L. J. K. B. N. S. 146.

In Duffield v. Scott, 3 T. R. 374, Buller, J., said: "The purpose of giving notice is not in order to give a ground of action; but if a demand be made which the person indemnifying is bound to pay, and notice be given to him, and he refuse to defend the action, in consequence of which the person to be indemnified is obliged to pay the demand, that is equivalent to a judgment, and estops the other party from saying that the defendant in the first action was not bound to pay the money."

Requisites of notice.

The notice should be unequivocal and explicit, but no particular form of words is necessary, and it need not be of record. Williams v. Burg, 9 Lea, 455.

To have the effect of depriving the warrantor of the right to show title, the notice should be unequivocal, certain, and explicit. A knowledge of the action and a notice of attend the trial will not do, unless it is accompanied with express notice that he will be required to defend the title. Paul v. Witman, 3 Watts & S. 409.

The notice must be such in substance as to give the person notified information that he is called upon to come in and defend the suit, or that he is given an opportunity to do so, and that if he does not defend it, he will be held responsible for the result; but the defendant in the original action cannot control the defense in that suit, if he expects to be indemnified by the person notified to come in. Consolidated Hand-Method Lasting Mach. Co. v. Bradley, 171 Mass. 127, 68 Am. St. Rep. 409, 50 N. E. 464.

Express notice to a person liable over to a municipal corporation is not necessary in order to charge him with such liability. Chicago v. Robbins, 2 Black. 418, 17 L. ed. 298.

In Carroll v. Nodine, 41 Or. 412, 93 Am. St. Rep. 743, 69 Pac. 51, it is said: "While notice of the pendency of the suit or action is always necessary to render the decree or judgment binding upon the indemnitor, the better reason and the weight of authority dispenses with any request to take charge of or assume the responsibilities of the defense. Having notice, the indemnitor may, as it is his right, interpose and make such defense as to him might seem most expedient and effective; and, if he did nothing in that direction, it must be considered a matter of his own volition, and a request for him, coupled with a warning of consequences, to do that which duty and interest require him to do, would seem superfluous, and the law, which is founded upon reason, does not require a vain thing."

In order that a railroad company may be bound by a judgment against a city for personal injuries alleged to have been due to the negligence of the company, the company should be asked and afforded an opportunity to defend the action against the city. Seattle v. Northern P. R. Co. 47 Wash. 552, 92 Pac. 411.

It is not necessary in the notice to the person liable over, to offer to surrender to him the sole control and management of the litigation. He is simply entitled to an opportunity to defend and protect his own interests in the same way and to the same extent as if he had been sued jointly with the person sued in the first instance. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. v. Campania Transatlantica Espanola, 144 N. Y. 663, 39 N. E. 360.

Where the sheriff turned over the summons and complaint in an action against him for conversion, to the attorneys of his indemnitors in an attachment action, and they answered and defended, and where he also wrote to the indemnitors informing them of the action, and that their attorneys had put in an answer, to which the indemnitors made no dissent, this was held a waiver of formal notice. Audley v. Townsend, 49 Misc. 23, 96 N. Y. Supp. 439.

Verbal notice.

It has been held that no particular form of words is necessary in order to constitute notice, and that it is not even necessary to give a written notice. It is sufficient that the party against whom ultimate liability is claimed is fully and fairly informed of the claim, and that the action is pending, with full opportunity to defend or to participate in the defense. If he then neglects or refuses to make any defense he may have, the judgment will bind him in the same way and to the same extent as if he had been made a party to the record. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. v. Campania Transatlantica Espanola, supra.

A notice in writing, or even express notice, is unnecessary, but notice may be implied from knowledge of the pendency of the action, and a participation in its defense. Davis v. Smith, 79 Me. 351, 10 Atl. 55; Port Jervis v. First Nat. Bank, 96 N. Y. 550.

In order to bind the warrantor by the result of an action of ejectment against the party holding under him, and to conclude him from showing title when he is sued on his warranty, it is not necessary for the notice to him by the defendant in the action of ejectment to be in writing in any particular form, or that a demand should be made of him to defend the action. If he has reasonable notice and opportunity to defend, he will be bound. Cummings v. Harrison, 57 Miss. 275.

In an action by a buyer to hold a seller liable over on his warranty of title to personal property, it was held that it is unnecessary that the notice should be in writing and formal, so long as it clearly apprises him that an action involving the title has been commenced, and that he will be looked to, to establish title in such action. Hersey v. Long, 30 Minn. 114, 14 N. W. 508.

In Miner v. Clark, 15 Wend. 425, it was held that verbal notice to the warrantor of title, of the commencement of the action of ejectment against the grantee, was sufficient. Bronson, J., in a dissenting opinion, however, said: "If the notice is to have any influence upon the right of the party, it should be given in such form as fully to apprise the person receiving it of what is required of him, and the consequences which are to follow if he neglects to take upon himself the defense of the suit. A verbal notice may be misapprehended by the person to whom it is addressed; and without any intentional error may be proved in a very different form from that in which it was actually delivered. It should be in writing, not only for the purpose of avoiding those consequences, but to enable the party to examine it deliberately, and consult his counsel on the proper course to be pursued. In ordinary legal proceedings, however trifling may be the consequences of neglecting the warning, no person is allowed to be prejudiced, either in his action or defense, by a mere verbal notice. . . . The modern practice of giving notice bears a strong analogy to the old method of vouching the grantor to warranty, when the tenant was sued in a real action. If the grantor did not appear voluntarily, a summons ad warrantizandum issued, informing him of the pendency of the suit, and requiring him to appear and warrant the land to the tenant; and this writ was served by the sheriff. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Real actions have everywhere fallen much into disuse of late years, and in this state most of them have been abolished. The practice of giving notice when the tenant is sued in the action of ejectment seems to have been suggested by the old process of voucher and summons ad warrantizandum. And as in the one case the right of the grantor could only be asserted by means of a writ served by a public officer, he ought not in the other to be prejudiced by anything less definite and formal than a writing which shall advise him of what has been done, and what he is required to do."

It has been held that verbal notice to the covenantor is insufficient. Mason v. Kellogg, 38 Mich. 132. The court said: "Our policy has always favored written memorials of titles to real estate, and in view of the effect which the law attributes to this proceeding, it is sufficiently near being a fact of title to be within the policy. . . . Then the giving notice is virtually a step, and an important step, in the cause. It contemplates the introduction of the covenantor and the entire prosecution of the defense in complete accordance with his views and under his direction. It is essentially a legal proceeding, and it is a well-recognized general rule that every notice of that character must be in writing. . . . And every reason proper to be urged for this rule must apply with great force to the notice in question. If a mere verbal notice is allowed to answer, a wide door is opened to mistake, misapprehension, and misunderstanding, and all manner of uncertainty, and the practice does little less than invite expensive and perplexing contests about a matter which ought to be as simple and certain as the service of a declaration."

A statutory provision, however, that "when a statute required notice to be given, it must be in writing, etc., and served in the manner required by the Code, § 597," has been held not to require notice to the sureties on an indemnity bond, that the sheriff has been sued for a wrongful levy of an execution, to be in writing. Martin v. Buffalo, 128 N. C. 305, 83 Am. St. Rep. 679, 38 S. E. 902.

Sufficiency of notice.

Formal notice is not necessary to bind the indemnitors, and if one of them, who is a counselor of the court, appears for the defendant in the original action, it is enough. Holbrook v. Holbrook, 15 Me. 9. The court said: "It cannot be material to the person agreeing to indemnify, that he should have a formal notice served upon him. The law requires that he should have notice before the judgment can be used against him, because he is the real party in interest. But any notice which will enable him to present any defense which he may have, either in law or on fact, is all that can be useful to him; and the law requires no vain or useless ceremonies in such cases."

Where the indemnitor, together with his witnesses, is present at the trial of the action against the indemnitee, testifies in the case, pays all the expenses of the indemnitee and his witnesses, the judgment is conclusive against him, although he was not in terms requested to take upon himself the defense of the action. Davis v. Smith, 79 Me. 351, 10 Atl. 55.

If a person who is liable over has notice when the writ against the city, in an action for personal injuries due to a defective highway, is returnable, and of the character of the action, and that he will be held responsible, and be required to govern himself accordingly, the notice is sufficient to make a judgment against the city binding on him, although he is not in terms requested to take upon himself the defense of the action against the city. Boston v. Worthington, 10 Gray, 496, 71 Am. Dec. 678.

But notice which merely calls upon the person liable over to come in and defend the pending suit, without indicating the nature of the suit or how the person notified may be interested in it, is insufficient. Lebanon v. Mead, 64 N. H. 8, 4 Atl. 392.

The fact that an attorney at law who is a surety on a promissory note appeared as attorney for his principals in an action brought against the latter to recover on the note, and assisted in managing and conducting their defense, does not make a judgment rendered against the principals conclusive on the attorney or his cosureties in a separate suit on the note, brought against them. Park v. Ensign, 66 Kan. 50, 97 Am. St. Rep. 352, 71 Pac. 230. The court said: "The contract of suretyship imposed no duty upon the sureties to defend their principals, gave the principals no right to represent the sureties, and gave one surety no authority, in any capacity, to charge his fellows by either his knowledge or his conduct."

Where the notice was given to the president and to a director of a railroad company liable over to a municipal corporation for damages caused by an injury due to a dangerous highway, and the director was present at the trial and took notes, but did not participate therein, it was held sufficient to charge the company, although notice was not given until the day before the trial. Veazie v. Penobscot R. Co. 49 Me. 119. The court said that if the company had desired further time for preparation, it should have moved the court for a continuance, or have notified the town that it desired more time, or in some manner have signified its wish for postponement.

A notice to the owner of a building, of an action against a municipality for personal injuries due to a defective awning, specifying the name of the plaintiff, the injury, the place of the injury, the time and the court at which the writ is returnable, and requiring him to defend, and stating that if he does not defend, the municipality will claim reimbursement, is sufficient. Milford v. Holbrook, 9 Allen, 17, 85 Am. Dec. 735.

Where a person was injured by falling into an excavation made by direction of the officers of a bank in a sidewalk, and recovered judgment against a village therefor, and the president of the bank, who was also a trustee of the village as well as a member of the committee of the bank, authorized to superintend the construction of the building, in the course of which the excavation was made, had notice of the suit against the village, consulted with an attorney for the village with reference to the defense thereof, and was informed of the probable liability of the bank to the village in case of the recovery of the injured person in that action, and was a witness on the trial, it was held that this notice was sufficient. Port Jervis v. First Nat. Bank, 96 N. Y. 550.

Where the owner obtained judgment against a contractor for injuries caused by the neglect of a subcontractor, it was held that the judgment was conclusive as to the liability in an action over by the contractor against the subcontractor, where the latter was given notice of the claim of the owner, the notice stating that, unless the subcontractor came in and defended such action, the contractor would permit the court to determine the damages suffered by the owner by reason of the subcontractor's negligence, and that if the contractor had to pay such damages, he would hold the subcontractor liable therefor. Corning v. Spelman, 130 App. Div. 767, 115 N. Y. Supp. 366.

Evidence that the party sought to be held liable over by a city for a judgment against it for personal injuries caused by a person falling into an excavation knew that the action had been commenced against the corporation; that he was informed of the day of the trial, and was requested to assist in procuring testimony, and that he actually wrote to a witness on the subject; that the attorney for the corporation called upon such party soon after the suit was commenced, for the purpose of finding out whether he knew anything about the case that would be of any benefit to the corporation in preparing the defense, and made inquiries of him to that effect; and that the party sought to be held liable over mentioned the name of a person who would be a good witness, and agreed to get an exact statement of what he would testify to if called, together with evidence that a witness met the party sued by the city on the day before the trial of the original action, and told him that the case was about to be tried,—was held sufficient to warrant an instruction that if the defendant in the action brought by the city knew that the original suit was pending, and could have defended it, and it was through his fault that the person who recovered from the city was injured, the defendant was concluded by the judgment, and that express notice of the suit against the city was not required, and that it was unnecessary that the city should have notified the defendant that it would look to him for indemnity. Robbins v. Chicago, 4 Wall. 658, 18 L. ed. 427.

Where the attorney for a city sued for injuries caused by a defective sidewalk wrote to the agents of the property owners, but received no reply, the attorney for the property owners consenting to sit in the case, if the property owners would not be bound in any way by his action, it was held that the notice was sufficient to bind the property owners, and that they were not relieved by the stipulation. Lansing v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 129 Mich. 403, 89 N. W. 54.

In Davis v. Wilbourn, 1 Hill, L. 27, 26 Am. Dec. 154, in referring to the time when notice to the warrantor of title to personal property should be given, the court said that, in cases within the summary jurisdiction, it ought, if practicable, to be given at or before the return of the process. In cases within the general jurisdiction, notice at any time before the expiration of the rule to plead would seem to be in time. The object is to enable the warrantor to come in and defend his title. He ought therefore to have a reasonable time to prepare for it, and the time which the law allows to a defendant furnishes perhaps the safest rule. In the first class of cases, however, the process might be served on the last hour of the last day before the return, so as to render the service of the notice impracticable before the return. In those cases, notice within a reasonable time afterwards would be all that could be expected. So, where the warrantee had entered an appearance and put in his plea to the merits, notice even after the continuance, if the warrantor had sufficient time to prepare evidence for the trial, would probably be sufficient.

Although the notice is short, if the obligors on a bond for the limits appear in season to make defense and have a fair opportunity to defend, the notice is sufficient. Riley v. Seymour, 1 Wend. 143.

Notice to the seller of a promissory note as indemnitor, though short, was held sufficient where the seller at the time of the transfer agreed to appear as a witness for the buyer if called upon, and did so, thus expecting a suit at the time, and impliedly indicating a willingness that the buyer should conduct the defense in the seller's behalf. Carroll v. Nodine, 41 Or. 412, 93 Am. St. Rep. 743, 69 Pac. 51.

It cannot be said that a notice of ten days is, as a matter of law, insufficient, where it appears that the person entitled thereto made no objection that the time was insufficient, and no attempt was made at the trial to show that any prejudice resulted from the omission to give longer notice. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. v. Campania Transatlantica Espanola, 144 N. Y. 663, 39 N. E. 360. The court said that the person liable over is entitled to reasonable notice and a reasonable opportunity to defend, and that this question is not governed by any fixed or arbitrary rule, but must depend upon the facts and circumstances of the case.

It cannot be said as a matter of law that notice of an action against a city for personal injuries, given to a contractor and his sureties sought to be held liable over 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) on a contract of indemnity, eleven days before the trial, is not sufficient to enable them to prepare for and present a defense to the action. Spokane v. Costello, 33 Wash. 98, 74 Pac. 58. The court said: "It must be remembered that the action was primarily against the city, that the city had denied all of the allegations of negligence set out in the complaint, and presumptively had made preparation for a defense based on its denials. It will not be presumed that it neglected that duty, or that it was not otherwise fully prepared to present to the court and jury the facts concerning the transaction as they actually existed. If this were so, there was nothing left for the appellants to do in the way of preparation. If, therefore, as a matter of fact, the city had neglected its duty, or if for any cause the notice given was insufficient, it should have been made to appear affirmatively, before the court would be warranted in saying the judgment was not binding upon the appellants."

Notice given to the warrantor the day before the commencement of the term of the court at which a judgment of eviction was rendered against the warrantee is not seasonable. Somers v. Schmidt, 24 Wis. 417, 1 Am. Rep. 191. The court said: "The object being to enable the warrantor to come in and defend his title, the notice should be given at or before the return of process, or at least before the expiration of the time to plead or answer, and so that he may have reasonable time to prepare for the defense. It does not appear that the knowledge acquired by the plaintiff in error at that late day was, or could have been, of any avail to him, and the inference must be that it was unavailing."

Notice given three months before the final trial, to an indemnitor of a sheriff, on the levy of an execution, is sufficient to bind him. Train v. Gold, 5 Pick. 380.

Notice to whom.

On a bond indemnifying a sheriff against the default or misconduct of his deputy, notice to the deputy of a suit against the sheriff for an omission of duty by the deputy is sufficient to bind the deputy's sureties. Thomas v. Hubbell, 18 Barb. 9.

Notice to two or three joint indemnitors of the commencement of a suit against the indemnitee is sufficient to render the judgment against the indemnitee conclusive against all the indemnitors. Carman v. Noble, 9 Pa. 366.

Notice to the son of the person sought to be held liable over, not shown to have been communicated to the latter, is insufficient. Chester v. Schaffer, 24 Pa. Super. Ct. 162.

Where the plaintiff in an action brought against the city brought another action at the same time for the same cause, against the person sought to be held liable over, and gave information of the action against the city to the attorney of the person afterwards sued by the city, this notice was held insufficient, it not appearing that the attorney was informed of the action against the city for the purpose of giving notice to his client of its pendency, or that he might defend or join in the defense, or that the attorney was requested to inform his client of the action, or that he promised to do so, or that he did so, or that the client was informed of its legal consequence to him, or that he participated in the trial, or had opportunity to do so. Ibid.

When notice unnecessary.

It is no objection to the plaintiff's recovery of costs in an action upon a warranty of title, that the plaintiff give the defendant no written notice to defend, where the defendant took charge of the suit. Jennings v. Sheldon, 44 Mich. 92, 8 N. W. 96.

One who deposited stock to secure a bonding company in giving a bond, and who knew of a suit against the company on the bond, and who testified at the trial, cannot say that he was not notified of the suit and that he had no opportunity to defend it. American Bonding Co. v. Loeb, 47 Wash. 447, 92 Pac. 282.

But it has been held that mere knowledge by the warrantor of an action against the warrantee will not take the place of the notice required of such action, together with the opportunity to defend, so as to make a judgment of eviction binding upon the warrantor. Somers v. Schmidt, 24 Wis. 417, 1 Am. Rep. 191.

Where a person is responsible over to another, and he is notified of the pendency of a suit involving the subject-matter of the indemnity, his liability will be fixed and determined by the judgment rendered therein, and notice to him will be implied where he has knowledge of the pendency of the suit and participates in the defense thereof. Meyer v. Purcell, 214 Ill. 62, 73 N. E. 392, affirming 114 Ill. App. 472.

But a judgment against an indemnitee was held not conclusive except actual notice of the suit pending is had by the person liable over. Grant v. Maslen, 151 Mich. 466, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 910, 115 N. W. 472.

V. Special bonds in legal proceedings.

a. Appeal bonds.

A surety on an appeal bond cannot go behind the judgment of the circuit court. Butler v. Wadley, 15 Ind. 502.

The judgment in the original action is not open to attack in an action on an appeal bond. Supreme Counsel, C. B. L. v. Boyle, 15 Ind. App. 342, 44 N. E. 56.

The surety in an action on an appeal bond cannot question the judgment in the original suit, except for fraud or collusion. Piercy v. Piercy, 36 N. C. (1 Ired. Eq.) 214. To the same effect, Denis v. Veazey, 12 Mart. (La.) 79.

In the absence of fraud or collusion, the surety on an appeal bond containing the usual conditions has no right to open the original judgment, where the principal would not have such right. Ingersoll v. Seatoff, 102 Wis. 476, 72 Am. St. Rep. 892, 78 N. W. 576.

A judgment in an action upon which an appeal bond is given is, unless void, conclusive upon the sureties in an action on the bond. Pierce v. Banta, 9 Ind. App. 376, 31 N. E. 812; Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. Neumeister, 15 Mo. App. 592; Barber v. Rutherford (com. pl.) 12 Misc. 33, 33 N. Y. Supp. 89.

The correctness of a judgment of a surrogate court cannot be questioned in an action upon an appeal bond. Thixton v. Goff, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 764.

A bond conditioned to pay the amount of such judgment as might be obtained in a suit is conclusive upon the sureties, where not obtained by fraud or collusion. Tracy v. Maloney, 105 Mass. 90.

The sureties on a bond to answer the decree in the original suit are, in the absence of fraud, bound by the decree. This liability is, by the terms of the obligation, made to depend upon the issue of the action. Having chosen to bind themselves in a given event which has happened, they are thereby charged. Riddle v. Baker, 13 Cal. 295. The court said: "To hold otherwise would be to hold that the surety in an appeal bond or undertaking could demand a retrial of everything tried in the suit, or, what is the same thing in effect, that a party giving such an obligation could, in the name of the surety, hold himself practically absolved from the judgment, at least without further trial. It would be the interest of a party to make mistakes and be guilty of negligence, since this would afford a pretext for opening the judgment and trying to anew the suit decided against him. In order to hold so dangerous a doctrine, we would have to interpolate new conditions in the bond, and to expunge the terms therein written. We think the surety in such a bond stands in the shoes of his principal, so far as the definitive force of the judgment is concerned, subject to the single exception that, if the judgment be procured by collusion between the plaintiff and defendant, he is not bound."

In Arkansas, an appellant who desires a stay of execution pending an appeal causes a supersedeas bond to be executed, and the sureties on the bond become, in legal effect, parties to the suit, and agree that if the judgment be affirmed, judgment may be rendered against them by the supreme court, for costs, damages, and the amount of the judgment below, etc., the statute authorizing this judgment being part of their contract as fully as if incorporated into the supersedeas bond executed by them. White v. Prigmore, 29 Ark. 208.

Under a statute providing for judgment against sureties on an appeal bond in case of judgment against the appellants, the sureties, by executing the undertaking, are deemed to consent that they shall, under the contingencies specified in the undertaking, be considered parties to the original suit, and liable to judgment for the original cause of action against their principal. Shannon v. Dodge, 18 Colo. 164, 32 Pac. 61.

The surety on a supersedeas bond is not a stranger to the proceeding thereafter conducted on appeal, and is concluded by the decisions and orders of the court. Pennsylvania use of Huidekoper v. Fidelity & D. Co. 180 Fed. 292.

The sureties upon an undertaking on appeal cannot show want of jurisdiction of the appellate court. Hathaway v. Davis, 33 Cal. 161.

A mistake in a bond upon which judgment was rendered constitutes no defense to an action on an appeal bond. Watson v. Johnson, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 336.

Irregularities in the original suit not corrected by appeal cannot be taken advantage of in an action on the appeal bond. Miller v. M'Luer, Gilmer (Va.) 338.

In an action on an appeal bond, the judgment of the supreme court is conclusive as to the validity of the judgment appealed from, and no inquiry can be had in a collateral proceeding as to the merits of the original controversy, nor even as to the validity of the judgment itself. Keithsburg & E. R. Co. v. Henry, 90 Ill. 255.

The sureties on an appeal bond, upon the affirmance of the judgment, are concluded, by their agreement to pay, from again bringing in question any established fact that was necessarily determined by the judgment they agreed to pay. Seymour v. Smith, 114 N. Y. 481, 11 Am. St. Rep. 683, 21 N. E. 1042.

The defense that the original judgment was procured by fraud, and that the verdict was obtained by false testimony to the knowledge of the plaintiff, is not available to the sureties in an action on an appeal bond, and the doctrine that courts of equity will relieve against judgments at law obtained by fraud does not apply to such a case. Krall v. Libbey, 53 Wis. 292, 10 N. W. 386. The court said that the sureties were strangers to the original litigation, and that after judgment they had voluntarily assumed the obligation to pay it if affirmed, and therefore must stand by their agreement.

In answer to a rule against the sureties on an appeal bond, the sureties set up the defense that since signing the bond, they had learned that the whole demand had grown out of an illicit enterprise on the part of both the plaintiffs and defendant, to traffic with the people in rebellion against the government, which was not disclosed in the original suit; but in holding that the sureties could not go behind the judgment, the court said: "The authorities and principles of good morals invoked by the appellants do not, in our opinion, apply to the liability and obligations of sureties on appeal bonds, which are fixed by special laws. Their obligations arise out of the bond, which are that their principal shall prosecute his appeal and satisfy any judgment which may be rendered against him, failing in either of which they are liable in his place. The law does not contemplate that 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the case shall be tried anew on its merits between the appellees and the sureties on the appeal bond." Murison v. Butler, 20 La. Ann. 512.

b. Injunction bonds.

A surety on an injunction bond suing for relief against the judgment on the bond cannot go into the merits of the decree against his principal, nor of the original judgment at law upon which the injunction was issued. McBroom v. Sommerville, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 515.

The sureties on an injunction bond cannot go behind the decree in the injunction suit, and defend on the ground that the agreement upon which it was founded was illegal. Oelrichs v. Spain (Oelrichs v. Williams) 15 Wall. 211, 21 L. ed. 43.

A referee's report fixing the amount of damages in an injunction suit, afterwards affirmed by the court, is conclusive upon a surety on the injunction bond, although he had no notice of the order of reference or of the application for the affirmance of the report. Poillon v. Volkenning, 11 Hun. 385.

The report of a referee assessing damages in an injunction proceeding, having been duly affirmed, is conclusive upon a surety on the injunction bond, although he had no notice of the proceeding. Jordan v. Volkenning, 72 N. Y. 300. But the court said it was a safer and fairer course in all such cases to give notice.

The sureties on an injunction bond assume such a connection with the injunction suit that they are concluded by the decree therein in an action on the bond, so far as the same matters are in question. Towle v. Towle, 46 N. H. 431.

The sureties, by signing the injunction bond, voluntarily assume such a connection with the suit that, in the absence of fraud or mistake, they are concluded by the judgment therein, and estopped in a subsequent action on the bond, to dispute any fact fairly settled by said judgment. The sureties thereby became identified with their principal as privies, if not as quasi parties to the action. Jones v. Mastin, 60 Mo. App. 578.

The undertaking of a surety on an injunction bond being that he "will pay all such costs and damages as shall be awarded against the complainant in case the injunction shall be dissolved," he is bound by a decree assessing damages on the dissolution of the injunction. McAllister v. Clark, 86 Ill. 236.

A surety on an injunction bond conditioned to pay all damages which may be adjudged against his principal by reason of an injunction is bound by the decree dismissing the injunction, although not a party to the injunction proceedings. Shenandoah Nat. Bank v. Read, 86 Iowa, 136, 53 N. W. 96.

An injunction bond being conditioned to pay all damages which should be awarded in a chancery suit, the surety can raise no question as to the correctness of the decree, nor impeach it in a collateral proceeding. Lothrop v. Southworth, 5 Mich. 436. The court said that "if this were not the case,—as the action is against principal and surety jointly,—the result would be that [the principal] would be permitted, under color of [the sureties'] claim of injury, to relitigate the matters settled by the decree by showing it to be erroneous, or by introducing new matter to diminish or obliterate the claim upon which the decree was based. This could not be done to defeat the service of the execution, if property had been found; and it can no better be done upon a proceeding subsequent to, and measurably auxiliary to, the execution. To hold otherwise would be to introduce a dangerous and novel doctrine into the law of remedies; viz., that when an action is brought upon a bond given for the performance of a decree against principal and surety, the whole subject of the decree must be relitigated, if a defense is set up impeaching it, before a joint recovery can be had."

Where the sureties, by their undertaking, engaged that their principal, who obtained the order of injunction, would pay to the parties enjoined such damages, not exceeding a certain sum, as they might sustain by reason of the injunction, if the court should finally decide that he, the principal, was not entitled thereto, "such damages to be ascertained by a reference or otherwise, as the court shall direct," a reference and report upon the damages sustained by reason of the injunction, and a confirmation by the court, are conclusive upon the sureties in the undertaking in an action against them, although they are not parties to the reference, or notified of the proceedings. Methodist Churches v. Barker, 18 N. Y. 463.

c. Attachment bonds.

A judgment against a sheriff is conclusive against the sureties on an attachment indemnity bond. Lovejoy v. Murray, 3 Wall. 1, 18 L. ed. 129.

In the absence of fraud or collusion, the sureties on an attachment indemnifying bond are bound by the judgment against their principal in the attachment action. Mihalovitch v. Barlass, 36 Neb. 491, 54 N. W. 826.

A judgment nunc pro tunc entered after the death of the plaintiff in an attachment action is, in the absence of fraud or collusion, conclusive against the surety on the bond to dissolve the attachment. Tapley v. Goodsell, 122 Mass. 176. The court said: "A surety on a bond to dissolve an attachment does not stand upon the footing of a stranger to the action. The very purpose, as well as the tenor, of his obligation, is to secure the payment of any judgment that may be recovered against his principal. The bond is not affected by contingencies which might have discharged the attachment if no bond had been given. Neither death nor bankruptcy of the principal discharges the surety from his obligation to satisfy a judgment lawfully rendered against the principal or his representatives; but such judgment, in the absence of fraud or collusion, is conclusive against the surety."

In an action in attachment, defendants undertaking for the recovery of the amount of judgment in favor of plaintiff, and against the defendant in attachment, the sureties are concluded by the judgment, and will not be heard, in the absence of fraud, collusion, or manifest mistake, to question its correctness, or inquire into the action of the court either upon a preliminary motion or in rendering the final judgment. Jayne v. Platt, 47 Ohio St. 262, 21 Am. St. Rep. 810, 24 N. E. 262. One of the conditions of the bond sued on was that the principal would "perform the judgment of the court in this action." The court said: "In general, the obligation in official bonds is that the surety will be responsible in case the officer fails to faithfully discharge the duties of the office. The question in issue, in an action on the bond against the sureties, is, Has there been dereliction of official duty within the meaning of the bond, and has the party complaining been damnified? In this class of cases the question is different. It is: Did the plaintiff recover judgment, and for what amount, and did the defendant satisfy it? Proof that a judgment was rendered for the plaintiff in attachment, which the defendant has not satisfied, shows a breach of the bond. And of such judgment, it would seem, that the record itself is not only the best, but the only, evidence, and, until impeached for fraud, collusion, or manifest mistake, ought to be held conclusive."

Where a rule is taken against a surety on a release bond, he cannot set up in defense that the affidavit was insufficient and false; that the bond was insufficient in amount; that the property seized was not the property of the defendants, but of one of them; that the bond was signed on the representation and assurance that a legal defense would be made, which was not set up, and that the plaintiffs were parties to the fraud practised, the obligation of the surety being that he will satisfy such judgment to the value of the property attached, as may be rendered against the defendant in the suit pending. Fusz v. Trager, 39 La. Ann. 292, 1 So. 535. The court said: "The preponderance of the jurisprudence on the rights and obligations of sureties on release bonds in attachment proceedings against residents is to the effect that such sureties, when ruled to be held liable, cannot be heard to set up any defense which the defendant himself could not raise; and that, where the judgment rendered on the merits condemns him, the surety is concluded by it, even if it were true that it is not justified by the evidence; provided, it was regularly rendered, has become final and executory, and remains unsatisfied, and the signature of the surety to the bond is genuine."

Although the defendant in the original attachment action might have pleaded in bar his bankruptcy, not having done so the judgment against him is valid, and, in the absence of fraud or collusion, is conclusive both against him and against the surety on his bond to dissolve the attachment. Cutter v. Evans, 115 Mass. 27.

But in Johnston v. Sexton, 86 C. C. A. 260, 159 Fed. 70, it was held that the sureties on an attachment bond are not concluded by a judgment against their principal in an action to which they were not parties, from showing that the recovery was for wrong committed by the principal apart from the attachment.

The surety on an attachment bond not a party to the attachment action is not concluded by a judgment on a counterclaim for damages for the wrongful suing out of the attachment, the obligation on the bond being to pay all damages which the defendant may sustain by reason of the wrongful suing out of the attachment. Bunt v. Rheum, 52 Iowa, 619, 3 N. W. 667.

The sureties on the bond of a claimant in an attachment suit are concluded by a judgment against their principal dismissing the claim and requiring the return of the property. The surety in such a case is bound by what binds the principal. He has nothing to do with the trial of the right of property, his obligation being to deliver the property to the officer if the claim made by his principal shall be determined against him. Higdon v. Vaughn, 58 Miss. 572.

But although the indemnitors assume the defense of an attachment action against the attaching officer, they may nevertheless show that the judgment was rendered by reason of illegal acts subsequent to the attachment or for misconduct in the service of other writs, or for wrongful conversion of the attached property or its proceeds. Boynton v. Morrill, 111 Mass. 4.

In Hosie v. Hart, 141 Mich. 679, 105 N. W. 32, it was held that in an action on an attachment bond, the judgment in the attachment action, valid on its face, is admissible, and prima facie establishes the defendant's liability.

But in Lartigue v. Baldwin, 5 Mart. (La.) 193, it was held that the record of a suit in which judgment was obtained against a principal in an attachment bond is not evidence against the surety thereon. The court said: "There is no rule of our laws better understood than that which allows to the surety the right of availing himself of the same means of defense (save those that are merely personal) which the principal debtor could resort to. That principle is founded on the sacred maxim that no one ought to be condemned without being heard, and consequently that no person shall be bound by a judgment to which he was no party."

d. Replevin bonds.

The surety on a replevin bond is bound by the result of the litigation with his principal. Wells v. Griffin, 2 Head, 568.

The sureties on a redelivery bond are bound by the judgment in the replevin suit. O'Loughlin v. Carr, 9 Kan. App. 818, 60 Pac. 478.

A surety will not be heard in an action on the bond to attack a judgment in replevin, while it remains unreversed or unvacated, and therefore valid against his principal. Christiansen v. Mendham, 26 Misc. 662, 56 N. Y. Supp. 655.

A judgment in replevin which is binding upon the principal is valid and binding against his sureties. Christiansen v. Mendham, 45 App. Div. 554, 61 N. Y. Supp. 326.

In an action upon a replevy bond in garnishment, neither the principal nor his sureties, who are his sponsors, can go behind the judgment. McCoslin v. David, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 53, 54 S. W. 404.

A judgment in a replevin suit constitutes a breach of the bond, and, when admitted in evidence in a suit on the bond, is conclusive of the rights of the parties, except the right saved to the plaintiff by statute to plead and prove his title in mitigation of damages. Rankin v. Kinsey, 7 Ill. App. 215.

The sureties on a replevin bond, although not parties to the action, are concluded by the judgment therein by force of their undertaking. Lee v. Grimes, 4 Colo. 185.

Until the verdict for the plaintiff, the sureties on a replevin bond in attachment are in no danger of a judgment against them. Before that they are not called on to speak in their defense. They cannot as sureties, and in their names, plead to the action or interpose any defense, for the action is not against them. Their liability is only for a delivery of the property replevied, or payment of its value as assessed. Their concern with the case commences at the point where their responsibility begins, and right to a judgment against them arises, i. e., at the finding of the issue in favor of the plaintiff. They may then show any thing which furnishes a legal reason for not entering judgment against them on the finding of the issue in favor of the plaintiff. They may contest original liability on the bond, or show a discharge from its obligation, but they cannot complain of mere errors in the action against their principal. They cannot make any defense to the action, except such as will discharge them. Atkinson v. Foxworth, 53 Miss. 733.

A surety, by signing a replevin bond, makes his principal on the bond his agent to compromise a claim for damages arising out of the replevin, and upon such compromise the court has authority to enter up judgment against the principal and surety on his bond. Nimocks v. Pope, 117 N. C. 315, 23 S. E. 269.

One who becomes a surety for the performance of the judgment of a court in a pending case is represented by his principal, and is bound by the judgment against his principal within the limits of his obligation. William W. Bierce v. Waterhouse, 219 U. S. 320, 55 L. ed. 237, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 241.

The sureties on a replevin bond assume such a connection with the original action that they are concluded by the judgment in so far as the same issues are involved. Kennedy v. Brown, 21 Kan. 171.

A surety on a replevin bond conditioned for the redelivery of the property attached is connected in privity with the proceedings in the original action, and the record of the judgment is conclusive against him. Collins v. Mitchell, 5 Fla. 384.

The sureties on a replevin bond stipulating for the payment, in case of defeat in the replevin action, of "such sum of money as may, from any cause, be recovered against the said plaintiff,"—the judgment in the replevin action is conclusive against them in a suit upon the bond. Cantril v. Babcock, 11 Colo. 143, 17 Pac. 296.

Where the sureties bind themselves to abide the judgment in the replevin suit, it is too late in an action on the bond, to plead the return of the property, which should have been pleaded in the replevin suit. Buckmaster v. Beames, 9 Ill. 443.

The surety in replevin who contracts with reference to the action of his principal in prosecuting the replevin suit is concluded by judgments and orders made in that suit showing a breach of the bond. Schott v. Youree, 142 Ill. 233, 31 N. E. 591, affirming 41 Ill. App. 476.

In an action upon a bond given in a suit for the recovery of personal property, and conditioned for the delivery of the said property to the plaintiff, if such delivery should be adjudged, and for the payment to him of such sum as may for any cause be recovered against the defendant in this action, the judgment against the principal is conclusive evidence of the breach of the bond, and of the damages sustained by reason of such breach. Thomson v. Joplin, 12 S. C. 580.

The same matters litigated in an original action cannot be re-examined in a suit on the replevin bond. Colorado Springs Co. v. Hopkins, 5 Colo. 206; William W. Bierce v. Waterhouse, supra.

In an action on a redelivery bond, the sureties are concluded as to any defense which should have been properly interposed in the replevin action. Boyd v. Huffaker, 40 Kan. 634, 20 Pac. 459.

In an action on a replevin bond, the sureties cannot set up and have retried matters that were controverted in the replevin actions and settled by the verdict. Cox v. Hartranft, 154 Pa. 457, 28 Atl. 304.

It has been held that a replevin judgment is conclusive as to the right of possession and return of the property. Warner v. Matthews, 18 Ill. 83.

A replevin judgment is conclusive in an action on the bond as to the ownership of the property. McMurchy v. O'Hair, 67 Ill. 242.

The question of ownership and the right of possession are res judicata in an action against a surety on a replevin bond. Woods v. Kessler, 93 Ind. 356.

Where the title to personal property is in dispute, and replevin is brought by a third party against the vendee, the vendee must notify his vendor to come in and defend, or else the latter will not be concluded by the judgment. Axford v. Graham, 57 Mich. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

422, 24 N. W. 158. The court said the reason why judgments are held conclusive against both parties and their privies is because an opportunity has been afforded to the parties thus concluded to assert or defend their rights before the court rendering the judgment.

Both the principal and sureties on a replevin bond are estopped in an action on the bond, from denying the regularity of the proceedings in the replevin action, and they cannot be heard to say that there was no consideration for the bond. McFadden v. Fritz, 110 Ind. 1, 10 N. E. 120.

That the property in dispute in a replevin action was turned over to a receiver upon an order of the court cannot be shown in an action against the sureties on a redelivery bond. Boyd v. Huffaker, 39 Kan. 525, 18 Pac. 508.

In an action in a summary proceeding on a replevin bond, it is not competent for the surety to question the validity of the judgment against the principal on any other ground than fraud or mistake. In such case the judgment is as conclusive against the surety as against the principal. Richardson v. People's Nat. Bank, 57 Ohio St. 299, 48 N. E. 1100.

A judgment in a replevin suit as to the value of ice taken is conclusive upon the sureties on the bond as to the value of the property at the time and place taken. Washington Ice Co. v. Webster, 125 U. S. 426, 31 L. ed. 799, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 947.

The question of the value of property taken as adjudicated in the replevin suit is not open to re-examination by the sureties on the redelivery bond. William W. Bierce v. Waterhouse, 219 U. S. 330, 55 L. ed. 239, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 241.

But it has been held a complete defense to sureties sued upon a replevin bond that the court was without jurisdiction to render the judgment in replevin, or that such judgment was obtained by fraud. McBrayer v. Jordan, 73 Neb. 483, 103 N. W. 50.

In Harbaugh v. Albertson, 102 Ind. 69, 1 N. E. 298, however, it was held that a surety on a replevin bond cannot set up lack of jurisdiction of a justice of the peace over the persons of the parties who voluntarily have submitted thereto.

c. Sequestration bonds.

The judgment in a sequestration action is binding on the sureties on the sequestration bond as to the ownership of the property, where the undertaking of the sureties is that they will pay the damages if the sequestration should in that suit be decreed to have been unlawfully issued. Jones v. Doles, 3 La. Ann. 588.

Where the principals in a sequestration bond are bound in solido, a judgment regularly obtained against either will be binding on the surety. Herrick v. Conant, 4 La. Ann. 276.

The sureties on a bond given to release property sequestered have a right, when sued on the bond, to prove that the sequestration was invalid and illegal, and that the property sequestered does not belong to the defendant in the sequestration suit. Carroll v. Hamilton, 30 La. Ann. 520.

In an action on a sequestration bond, the judgment in the original suit to obtain possession of the property is not conclusive as to the rights of the parties and the amount of damages, where it appears from the opinion of the court in the original action that judgment was affirmed in favor of the defendant therein, on the ground that the courts will not lend their aid in the enforcement of contracts reprobated by the law. Clarke v. Scott, 2 La. Ann. 907.

f. Miscellaneous bonds.

A judgment against a special bail is conclusive against the sureties on the indemnity bond having notice of the suit against their principal. Beers v. Pinney, 12 Wend. 309.

The bail or security takes the fortunes of his principal, and is bound equally with him by the judgment in the main action. The bail can no more go behind the judgment, or attack it by affidavit of illegality, after it is duly entered against both, than can the principal. Jackson v. Guilmartin, 61 Ga. 544.

A judgment against a debtor in an action for fraud is conclusive upon his surety on a bond given on his release from arrest, and he cannot go behind it to inquire into the reasons upon which it was based. Keane v. Fisher, 10 La. Ann. 261.

In a suit upon a recognizance, the sureties are concluded from alleging that the original plaintiff, when in a state of intoxication, was induced to consent to a judgment for costs against him, procured by the plaintiff in the bond action. Parkhurst v. Sumner, 23 Vt. 538, 56 Am. Dec. 94. The court said: "It is a universal rule in regard to judgments, that all matters which might have been urged by the party before the adjudication are concluded by the judgments as to the principal parties and all privies in interest or estate,—and among privies are no doubt included bail."

No fraud or collusion being shown, a judgment against the principal is conclusive evidence of the debt thereby ascertained, both against him and against his surety on a recognizance subsequently taken upon his arrest on execution. Way v. Lewis, 115 Mass. 26.

A judgment for assault and battery, false imprisonment, and malicious prosecution prevents the raising of the question of good faith in a proceeding against the surety upon breach of a recognizance given upon the debtor's arrest on execution. McChristal v. Clisbee, 190 Mass. 120, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 702, 76 N. E. 511, 5 Ann. Cas. 769.

A surety on a release bond is concluded by a judgment which concludes his principal. McCloskey v. Wingfield, 32 La. Ann. 38.

A judgment for damages against the claimant and his surety on a damage bond is conclusive upon both, unless procured by fraud, or unless the proceedings constituting the claim case are, upon their face, fatally defective. The court said that the surety for the claimant, when he signed the bond, put himself in a boat which the claimant was to steer in behalf of both, and if there was injudicious or unskilful navigation, he must take the consequences. Mitchell v. Toole, 63 Ga. 93.

The surety on a bond given by a defendant in an action of trover for the eventual condemnation money is bound by the judgment against the defendant, and cannot, after judgment, raise any question which could have been raised by the principal before judgment. Waldrop v. Wolff, 114 Ga. 610, 40 S. E. 830.

The final decree of a court in the original action must be taken as the only evidence of the eventual condemnation money to be recovered in an action on the bond. Lockwood v. Saffold, 1 Ga. 72.

Formerly, it was necessary to bring suit against the sureties on the bond, but the Georgia Code expressly provides that where a bond is given in a judicial proceeding, conditioned to pay the condemnation money, judgment may be entered up against the surety, and it shall not be necessary, as heretofore, to bring suit on the bond. Civil Code, 2978. Price v. Carlton, 121 Ga. 12, 68 L.R.A. 736, 48 S. E. 721.

The surety on an eventual condemnation money bond given a defendant in a distress warrant proceeding based upon a judgment in an action for an equitable accounting, in which it was adjudged that a certain sum was due as rent from the defendant in the distress warrant proceeding, is bound by the judgment. Ibid.

The security on a claim bond is bound by the judgment and verdict therein for damages and costs. Upon affirmance, he cannot go behind it by affidavit of illegality. Harvey v. Head, 68 Ga. 247.

In a suit on a forthcoming bond, neither the legality of the levy nor the authority of the officer to make it is an established fact. Oliver v. Warren, 124 Ga. 549, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1020, 110 Am. St. Rep. 188, 53 S. E. 100.

The claimant's surety on a dissolution bond in a garnishment proceeding is bound by the judgment against his principal, and cannot subsequently be heard to attack the right of the plaintiff to the fund garnished, on any ground put in issue, or that, under the rules of law, could have been put in issue, by the claimant in the previous case in which the judgment was rendered. Jordan v. Thornton, 5 Ga. App. 537, 63 S. E. 601.

In an action on a bond to secure the performance of award under a statutory submission to arbitration, the obligor may defend on the ground that the judgment based upon the award is void, although it is unreversed, since, being neither a party nor a privy to that judgment, he could not sue out a writ of error to reverse it. Ladlin v. Field, 6 Met. 287.

Conceding that the record of a judgment against a principal is not evidence to establish the debt against the surety for an unliquidated demand, the rule does not apply where, by agreement, conduct, and active participation of the surety in the award of arbitrators, the case is taken out of the rule. Hostetter v. Pittsburgh, 107 Pa. 419.

In a scire facias against the indorser of a writ, the judgment in the original action, so long as it remains unreversed, concludes the defendant from setting up that the plaintiff, in taxing costs, fraudulently procured the allowance by the clerk of various sums to which he was not entitled. Sherburne v. Shepard, 142 Mass. 141, 7 N. E. 719.

The indorser of a writ in the original cause cannot, upon scire facias against him to enforce a liability for costs, dispute the validity of the judgment. Pullman's Palace-Car Co. v. Washburn, 66 Fed. 790, affirmed in 21 C. C. A. 598, 33 U. S. App. 628, 76 Fed. 1005.

The sureties on a bond for costs are concluded by the decree for costs against their principal. McClaskey v. Barr (C. C.) 79 Fed. 408.

A judgment for costs against the principal alone, and not against the sureties, is conclusive against the latter in an action on the cost bond, the condition of which is that the surety will pay the costs which have accrued or may thereafter accrue. Calhoun v. Gray, 150 Mo. App. 591, 131 S. W. 478.

On a scire facias on a recognizance for costs, the surety cannot defend by showing an irregularity in obtaining judgment against his principal. Stedman v. Ingraham, 22 Vt. 346.

VI. Liquor bonds.

It has been held that a judgment of a criminal court convicting the prisoner of a violation of the liquor law is conclusive on his sureties, where the statute provides that "whenever a person so licensed shall be convicted of a violation of any of the provisions of part 6 of this act, and no appeal is pending, said bond shall thereupon become forfeited." Welch v. McKane, 55 Conn. 25, 10 Atl. 168.

Where the express condition of a liquor dealer's bond is that the sureties shall pay any judgment against their principal for actual or exemplary damages awarded in a court of competent jurisdiction, they cannot, in an action on the bond, retry the merits of the action against their principal, on the theory that they have had no day in court. They can show only that the judgment was not rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, or that it is void for fraud or collusion. People use of Clinton v. Laning, 73 Mich. 284, 41 N. W. 424.

A judgment against a liquor dealer for the offense of selling the liquor to minors, in violation of the law, is conclusive upon 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

his sureties. State v. Nutter, 44 W. Va. 385, 30 S. E. 67.

A judgment against a liquor dealer for selling drink to plaintiff's husband is conclusive against his sureties in an action on the bond. Point Pleasant v. Greenlee, 63 W. Va. 207, 129 Am. St. Rep. 971, 60 S. E. 601.

But it has been held that in an action on a liquor dealer's bond conditioned upon his faithful observance of the law, the sureties are not estopped by his confession of guilt or conviction of a violation of the law, from showing that there has been no breach of the bond. Paducah v. Jones, 126 Ky. 809, 104 S. W. 971.

A judgment against a saloonkeeper under the Illinois Dramshop act is held prima facie evidence of the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff in an action against his sureties, especially where the sureties have been notified of the suit and have actually appeared and aided in the defense, and the fact that the statute permits exemplary damages to be recovered in the original suit does not affect the rule. Wanack v. People, 187 Ill. 116, 58 N. E. 242, affirming 87 Ill. App. 371.

In an action to recover the penalty of a liquor dealer's bond, the record of the criminal case and of the principal plea of guilty, is, in Mississippi, only prima facie evidence in a civil action as to the breach of the bond, either as against the sureties or the principal. Albrecht v. State, 62 Miss. 516. This case was decided under the rule that a verdict and judgment in a criminal case, though admissible to establish the fact of the mere rendition of the judgment, cannot be given in evidence in a civil action to establish the truth of the facts on which it was rendered.

And in Tennessee the surety on a liquor dealer's bond, though not a party to a criminal prosecution which resulted in the conviction of the principal, of the offense of keeping a disorderly house, was held privy thereto, and the record of the conviction prima facie evidence against him in an action on the bond. Webb v. State, 4 Coldw. 199.

VII. Confession of judgment.

Consent judgments are not binding on third persons, and therefore any third person sought to be affected by such a judgment has a right to show its character. Carroll v. Hamilton, 30 La. Ann. 520.

A default judgment against a principal on a bond for the payment of claims for labor and materials will not prevent his sureties, who were parties to the action, from disputing on appeal facts which were necessary to establish their liability. United States use of Fidelity Nat. Bank v. Rundie, 52 L.R.A. 505, 46 C. C. A. 251, 107 Fed. 227.

An award against a principal founded on his acknowledgments, and not confined to debts covered by an indemnity bond, is not evidence against his sureties, who were not parties to the submission and who did not attend before the referee. Simonton v. Boucher, 2 Wash. C. C. 473, Fed. Cas. No. 12,877.

A judgment confessed by a principal for a liability to a partnership is admissible in evidence to charge one guarantying the faithful discharge of the engagements of the principal. Drummond v. Prestman, 12 Wheat. 515, 6 L. ed. 712.

In commenting on the last-mentioned case, the court, in Firemen's Ins. Co. v. McMillan, 29 Ala. 147, said: "It will be observed that the judgment in that case was by confession of the principal. It was a voluntary undertaking on his part, of record, to pay the sum confessed to the creditor; and the guarantor, by his letter of guaranty, stipulated to guarantee the conduct of his son, the principal, and to hold himself liable 'for the faithful discharge of all his engagements' to the plaintiff, 'both now and in the future.' The payment of this judgment, which the son had confessed, might, perhaps, have properly been regarded as one of 'the engagements' the son had entered into, within the scope and covered by the undertaking of the guarantor as contained in the letter of guaranty. If such be the extent of the guarantor's undertaking, it is very clear the judgment confessed by the son was not only prima facie evidence, but, in the absence of fraud or collusion between him and the creditor, was conclusive against the father."

On a motion against a sheriff for the default of his deputy, a judgment confessed in open court is evidence against the deputy's sureties of his default, unless disproved by them. Jacobs v. Hill, 2 Leigh, 393.

The sureties of a constable, upon a suit or motion against him for moneys received, are not concluded by a confession of judgment by their principal after his retirement from office. The sureties may show that they are not liable because their principal did not in his official character receive the money, and they may show that by collusion they were sought to be fixed with the individual responsibility of their principal. Atkins v. Bailey, 9 Yerg. 111.

The confession of judgment by a sheriff is prima facie evidence against his sureties, but they may show that it was made by mistake or by fraud or collusion, or that the sum confessed is greater than he was really liable for, or that the confession was for liabilities which they had not undertaken to guarantee. The Treasurers v. Bates, 2 Bail. L. 362.

Where a sheriff with the assent of his deputy, but without the knowledge of the deputy's sureties, confesses judgment for the default of his deputy, the judgment is admissible against the sureties upon a motion by the sheriff against the deputy and his sureties, and charges the sureties unless disproved by them. Jacobs v. Hill, supra.

Where a bond has been executed to secure a sheriff against apprehended litigation as to the title of property seized under an execution, a judgment against the sheriff by consent, in the absence of fraud or collusion or any suggestion that there was a defense to the action against the sheriff, presumptively, at least, establishes the liability of the sureties. The sureties are at liberty to show that the judgment was not founded upon any legal liability to the plaintiff in the action, or that it exceeded such liability. Conner v. Reeves, 103 N. Y. 527, 9 N. E. 439, affirming 35 Hun, 507.

Where a guardian in the settlement of his accounts with his ward admits an indebtedness to him, the account receiving the approval of the probate court, this is admissible against the sureties on the guardian's bond, but is not conclusive. State use of Wagenmann v. Rosswaag, 3 Mo. App. 11. The court said that "no reason is perceived why like any other admission or act of a party for whom sureties engage, it may not be evidence tending to prove the defalcation in respect of which sureties are responsible. The sureties of a guardian do not occupy different relations to their principal, or to those who are interested in the good conduct of their principal, from that which is occupied by other sureties towards their obligees. We know of no exception to the rule that admissions made by a principal in the course of the business, for his performance of which his sureties are liable, are binding on the surety."

The confession of fiat has been held only prima facie evidence of the sufficiency of assets as against the sureties on an administrator's bond, and in a suit on the bond they may show the true condition of the estate at the time of the confession, and the amount of assets in the hands of the administrator properly chargeable with the payment of the same. Kearney v. Sascor, 37 Md. 264.

A judgment by confession against an executor, while binding upon him, is prima facie evidence only against his surety. As to the latter it is nothing more than a declaration or confession of his principal clothed with legal solemnities, and should be deemed in all respect correct only until the contrary is made to appear. Iglehart v. State, 2 Gill & J. 235.

The confession of judgment by an administrator does not preclude his sureties in an action on the bond from showing that, at the time of the confession, the administrator had fully administered to the estate and had no assets in his hands. Seat v. Cannon, 1 Humph. 471.

The record of a judgment confessed by an administrator is not even prima facie evidence of the amount of the debt, or of the fact that the administrator had assets to pay the same. Vanhook v. Barnett, 15 N. C. (4 Dev. L.) 268.

But a judgment nil dicit against an administrator was held to be a finding of assets in his hands, and binding upon his sureties as well as himself. Grace v. Martin, 47 Ala. 135.

Where a plaintiff in replevin suffers a voluntary dismissal or nonsuit, and judgment of retorna habenda is awarded, in a suit on the replevin bond, the defendant cannot, in bar of the action or in mitigation of damages, show property in the plaintiff in replevin, under a statute providing that "in any action upon any bond given as required by the provisions of this chapter, where the merits of the case have not been determined in the action of replevin in which such bond was given, the defendant may plead such fact, and also their title, or the title of any one or more of them, to the property in dispute in such action of replevin, except in cases where the plaintiff, in such action of replevin, shall have voluntarily dismissed his suit, or submitted to a nonsuit therein" (§ 14, replevin act, Rev. Stat. p. 540). Clark v. Howell, 3 Colo. 564.

In Louisiana it is held that a confession of judgment by a principal has, as to the surety, only the force of a private agreement between the principal and his creditor. Allison v. Thomas, 29 La. Ann. 732.

VIII. Fraud and collusion.

It is almost universally held that the surety is not prevented by the judgment against his principal from setting up the defense of fraud or collusion.

The surety may show fraud or collusion, or a mistake in the amount of the judgment. Berger v. Williams, 4 McLean, 577, Fed. Cas. No. 1,341.

A surrogate's decree obtained by fraud and collusion does not conclude the sureties. Thayer v. Clark, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 391, affirming 48 Barb. 243.

A plea that the judgment in the principal action was entered by collusion between the original parties with a view to defraud bail may be set up in an action on the recognizance. Parkhurst v. Sumner, 23 Vt. 538, 56 Am. Dec. 94.

Collusion between the parties in the original suit, to enter up judgment for the purpose of defrauding the bail, is available as a defense in an action on the bond. Mott v. Hazen, 27 Vt. 208. The court said: "As against the bail the judgment is void; it has no legal effect, and is the same in legal contemplation as if no judgment had been rendered. . . . This rule is of universal application, and equally affects judgments, recognizances, debts of record, as well as instruments under seal and simple contracts. Wherever fraud exists, the party injured can find redress at law, as well as in equity. If it is a defense in one tribunal, it is equally so in the other."

The sureties may contest the conclusiveness of a judgment against a sheriff obtained by fraud or collusion. Dane v. Gilmore, 51 Me. 544; State ex rel. Parker v. Woodside, 29 N. C. (7 Ired. L.) 296.

The sureties on a cost bond may, in an action thereon, impeach the judgment in an original action on the ground of fraud. 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Worster, 45 N. H. 110.

But where the fraud alleged was that of the guardian alone, in charging himself with more money than he had received, it was held that the surety could not question the decree rendered upon the settlement of the guardian's account, in the absence of collusion between the guardian and the ward. Corbin v. Westcott, 2 Dem. 559.

It has been held that the decree of a surrogate on an accounting of an administrator ordering him to pay the persons entitled a certain sum cannot be attacked on the ground of fraud in an action against the sureties on the bond. There must be a direct application for that purpose. People v. Downing, 4 Sandf. 189.

And that, in an action on the bond, the surety will not be allowed to show that a decree in equity against an administrator was fraudulently obtained. Norton v. Wallace, 2 Rich. L. 460.

Where the sureties were made parties to an administrator's accounting, which was dismissed as to them on an objection by demurrer to being joined in that suit, they cannot afterwards be heard to say that the decree was not binding upon them on the theory that they were not parties thereto. Chaquette v. Ortet, 60 Cal. 594.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

IVA C. NESBIT

v.

CITY OF TOPEKA, Appt.

(— Kan. —, 124 Pac. 186.)

Municipal corporation — notice of injury — promptness.

A person injured by the negligence of a city failed to give a notice as required by the act governing cities of the first class (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 1218). He died from such injuries after the time limited for such notice had expired. His widow gave a notice within four months after his death, and then commenced an action under the statute giving a right of action for damages for death caused by wrongful act. It is held that the action may be maintained, notwithstanding the failure to give the pre-

Headnote by BENSON, J.

Note. — Does time of notice as condition of municipal liability begin to run from the accident or from the injury or death.

As to physical or mental incapacity as an excuse for failure to give notice of injury required as a condition of municipal liability, see note to Touhey v. Decatur, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 350.

The sufficiency of the description of an injury in a notice given as a condition of municipal liability is discussed in Spear v.

liminary notice within four months after the injury.

(June 8, 1912.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Shawnee County overruling a demurrer to a petition in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's husband alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. O. Ralston and James W. Clark, for appellant:

The filing of a statement giving the time and place of the happening of the accident or injury received, and the circumstances relating thereto, within the required time, is a condition precedent, and must be alleged in the petition and proven at the trial, before any recovery can be had against the city for personal injuries.

Cook v. Topeka, 75 Kan. 534, 90 Pac.

Westbrook, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 804, and the note appended thereto.

A number of cases hold that the requirement of notice to a municipality does not apply to actions by the administrator for the death of an injured party in behalf of the next of kin, under the so-called death acts, and therefore no notice is necessary in such cases. Prouty v. Chicago, 250 Ill. 222, 95 N. E. 147; Perkins v. Oxford, 66 Me. 545; Orth v. Belgrade, 87 Minn. 237, 91 N. W. 843; Senecal v. West St. Paul, 111 Minn. 253, 126 N. W. 826; Brown v. Salt Lake City, 33 Utah, 222, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 619, 126 Am. St. Rep. 828, 93 Pac. 570, 14 Ann. Cas. 1004; Laconte v. Kenosha, — Wis. —, 135 N. W. 843.

And it was so held in Clark v. Manchester, 62 N. H. 577, and Jewett v. Keene, 62 N. H. 701, which were actions under a survival statute for damages sustained by the injured party.

In Barnes v. Brooklyn, 22 App. Div. 520, 48 N. Y. Supp. 36; Conway v. New York, 139 App. Div. 446, 124 N. Y. Supp. 660 (affirmed without opinion on second appeal in 148 App. Div. 915, 133 N. Y. Supp. 1116); and Crapo v. Syracuse, 183 N. Y. 395, 76 N. E. 465, reversing 98 App. Div. 376, 90 N. Y. Supp. 553, it is held that a statute providing that notice must be given within six months after the action shall have accrued applies to accidents resulting in death, but the cause of action does not accrue until an administrator is appointed, and the time for serving notice begins to run from the date of such appointment.

In Nash v. South Hadley, 145 Mass. 105, 13 N. E. 376, under a statute providing for notice within thirty days by the injured person, or someone on his behalf if disabled, within ten days after removal of the disability, "and in case of his death without having given the notice and without having been, for ten days at any time after his in-

No written statement by plaintiff was required.

Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Martin, 59 Kan. 437, 53 Pac. 461; McCarthy v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 18 Kan. 52, 26 Am. Rep. 742; Hulbert v. Topeka, 34 Fed. 513; Parish v. Eden, 62 Wis. 272, 22 N. W. 399; Maylone v. St. Paul, 40 Minn. 406, 42 N. W. 88; Brown v. Salt Lake City, 33 Utah, 222, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 619, 126 Am. St. Rep. 828, 93 Pac. 570, 14 Ann. jury, of sufficient capacity to give the notice, his executor or administrator may give such notice within thirty days after his appointment,"—it was held that where the person injured lived more than ten days in a condition in which it was possible for him to have given the notice, but failed to do so, his executor was not entitled to serve the notice within thirty days after his death.

But under the same statute, where the injured person died upon the twelfth day after the injury, and before the expiration of ten days from the time of the accident she became delirious and remained in that condition until death, it was held that her administratrix was entitled to give the notice. Barclay v. Boston, 173 Mass. 310, 53 N. E. 822.

In McKeigue v. Janesville, 68 Wis. 50, 31 N. W. 298, it is held that where an injured party dies before the expiration of the time for giving notice, without having given it, suit may be brought by his administrator for the wrongful death without giving notice; but the court intimated that the rule might be different in case the injured party lived for the notice period without having given it.

In Dodge v. North Hudson, 188 Fed. 489, under a statute requiring notice to the municipality within a certain time after the right of action accrued, the court said that the right of action by an administrator for the death of the injured party accrued when the death occurred.

In Crocker v. Hartford, 66 Conn. 387, 34 Atl. 98, it was held that a person who fell on an icy sidewalk was barred from recovery by failure to give notice within fifteen days of the accident, though the internal injury complained of did not develop, and plaintiff was unaware of it until after the period for notice had elapsed.

Benson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question to be decided in this case is whether a notice, as provided by § 1218 of the General Statutes of 1909, is a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action for damages for death caused by the wrongful act or omission of another, under the provisions of § 6014 of the General Statutes of 1909 (Code Civ. Proc. § 419); the death having occurred more than four months after the injury. A demurrer to a petition alleging such negligence and resulting death, but failing to allege the notice referred to, was overruled, and the defendant appeals.

The statute relating to notice declares: "No action shall be maintained by any person or corporation in any court for damages on account of injury to person or property, unless the person or corporation injured or damaged shall, within four months thereafter, and prior to the bringing of the suit, file with the city clerk a written statement, giving the time and place of the happening of the accident or injury received, and the circumstances relating thereto." Gen. Stat. 1909, § 1218. This statute is mandatory, and in a case within its purview, if the notice is not given, an action cannot be maintained by the person sustaining the injury. Cook v. Topeka, 75 Kan. 534, 90 Pac. 244.

The statute under which this action is brought provides: "When the death of one is caused by the wrongful act or omission of another, the personal representatives of the former may maintain an action therefor against the latter, if the former might have maintained an action, had he lived, against the latter for an injury for the same act or omission." Gen. Stat. 1909, § 6014. A later statute allows the widow to maintain the action in her own name in cases like the present. Ibid. The damages recoverable by a widow in such an action are for her loss caused by the death of her husband. A cause of action accrued to him when he was injured. A cause of action accrued to her at his death. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Martin, 59 Kan. 437, 438, 53 Pac. 461; Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Clarke, 152 U. S. 230, 238, 38 L. ed. 422, 424, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 579. She was not the person injured, and so was not required to give the notice provided by the statute within the four months' period. Before her right of action accrued, the time for giving it had elapsed. A construction that would bar the widow in such a situation should not be given unless imperatively required. It is said that it is required by the express terms of the statute giving the remedy, that the action can only be maintained by the widow "if the former (the person injured) could have maintained an action, had he lived . . . for the same act or omission;" and as notice was required as a condition precedent to the maintenance of his action, in the absence of such a notice her action must fail. But the husband might have maintained the action by giving the notice, filing a petition, and causing a summons to issue. His failure to take these steps, or any of them, cannot bar her right even under the letter of the statute.

In referring to a similar situation, the supreme court of Utah said: "The statute must receive a reasonable construction, and such as will make it possible to present a claim. If, therefore, a claim may not arise until the time has elapsed in which it must be presented, the statute should not be held to apply, unless the language used therein permits of no other construction." Brown v. Salt Lake City, 33 Utah, 222, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 619, 126 Am. St. Rep. 828, 93 Pac. 570, 14 Ann. Cas. 1004.

It is true that in that case the period for giving notice had not elapsed at the time of the death of the injured person; but the language quoted is nevertheless applicable. In another court, in a case where the time for notice had elapsed, it was held, affirming a prior decision, that a statute requiring such a preliminary notice in an action for negligence against a city did not apply to an action brought under a statute giving the next of kin of a deceased person an action when his death had been caused by wrongful act. Orth v. Belgrade, 87 Minn. 237, 91 N. W. 843, followed in Senecal v. West St. Paul, 111 Minn. 253, 126 N. W. 826.

It is argued that the failure to receive notice within the four months deprived the city of an opportunity to examine into the nature and cause of the alleged injury while the means of doing so were available, thus working hardship. It may be observed, on the other hand, that the construction of the statute contended for would strike down a right of action before it accrues,—if that were possible.

These views are in substantial accord with an opinion filed by the District Court in overruling the demurrer, and the judgment will be affirmed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.
(Division No. 1.)

JAMES R. WOOLDRIDGE et al., Appts.,
v.

D. H. SMITH, Resp't.

(— Mo. —, 147 S. W. 1019.)

Cemetery — private burial — conveyance without restriction — effect.

1. The conveyance without restriction or establishment as a private burying ground, as provided by statute, of a parcel of land on which burials have taken place, destroys the right of the relatives of the deceased to protect the graves from desecration.

Note. — Prescription or adverse possession of grave or burial lot.

As to character of estate or property of owner in burial lot, see note to Waldron's Petition, 67 L.R.A. 118.

As to prescriptive right to maintain a public nuisance, see note to Leahan v. Cochran, 53 L.R.A. 891.

The title to an easement in a burial lot may be acquired by prescription, where adverse possession for that purpose is held for the statutory period. Hook v. Joyce, 94 Ky. 450, 21 L.R.A. 96, 22 S. W. 651.

One who enters upon, sets apart, and asserts an exclusive right to a plot of land as a family burial ground, and who from year to year for a series of years, as death in his family occurs, or when the members of a friend's family die, buries them on that plot, and erects monuments to mark the spot of interment, has an adverse possession sufficient under the statute of limitations to give title. Mooney v. Cooledge, 30 Ark. 640, wherein it is said that in such cases neither actual residence upon nor continuous occupancy is necessary; Conger v. Weyant, 3 Silv. Sup. Ct. 588, 28 N. Y. S. R. 745, 7 N. Y. Supp. 809; El Paso v. Ft. Dearborn Nat. Bank, 96 Tex. 496, 74 S. W. 21. And this same holding is recognized in Illinois Steel Co. v. Billot, 109 Wis. 418, 83 Am. St. Rep. 905, 84 N. W. 855, 85 N. W. 402.
